

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

A propos de ce livre

Ceci est une copie numérique d'un ouvrage conservé depuis des générations dans les rayonnages d'une bibliothèque avant d'être numérisé avec précaution par Google dans le cadre d'un projet visant à permettre aux internautes de découvrir l'ensemble du patrimoine littéraire mondial en ligne.

Ce livre étant relativement ancien, il n'est plus protégé par la loi sur les droits d'auteur et appartient à présent au domaine public. L'expression "appartenir au domaine public" signifie que le livre en question n'a jamais été soumis aux droits d'auteur ou que ses droits légaux sont arrivés à expiration. Les conditions requises pour qu'un livre tombe dans le domaine public peuvent varier d'un pays à l'autre. Les livres libres de droit sont autant de liens avec le passé. Ils sont les témoins de la richesse de notre histoire, de notre patrimoine culturel et de la connaissance humaine et sont trop souvent difficilement accessibles au public.

Les notes de bas de page et autres annotations en marge du texte présentes dans le volume original sont reprises dans ce fichier, comme un souvenir du long chemin parcouru par l'ouvrage depuis la maison d'édition en passant par la bibliothèque pour finalement se retrouver entre vos mains.

Consignes d'utilisation

Google est fier de travailler en partenariat avec des bibliothèques à la numérisation des ouvrages appartenant au domaine public et de les rendre ainsi accessibles à tous. Ces livres sont en effet la propriété de tous et de toutes et nous sommes tout simplement les gardiens de ce patrimoine. Il s'agit toutefois d'un projet coûteux. Par conséquent et en vue de poursuivre la diffusion de ces ressources inépuisables, nous avons pris les dispositions nécessaires afin de prévenir les éventuels abus auxquels pourraient se livrer des sites marchands tiers, notamment en instaurant des contraintes techniques relatives aux requêtes automatisées.

Nous vous demandons également de:

- + Ne pas utiliser les fichiers à des fins commerciales Nous avons conçu le programme Google Recherche de Livres à l'usage des particuliers. Nous vous demandons donc d'utiliser uniquement ces fichiers à des fins personnelles. Ils ne sauraient en effet être employés dans un quelconque but commercial.
- + Ne pas procéder à des requêtes automatisées N'envoyez aucune requête automatisée quelle qu'elle soit au système Google. Si vous effectuez des recherches concernant les logiciels de traduction, la reconnaissance optique de caractères ou tout autre domaine nécessitant de disposer d'importantes quantités de texte, n'hésitez pas à nous contacter. Nous encourageons pour la réalisation de ce type de travaux l'utilisation des ouvrages et documents appartenant au domaine public et serions heureux de vous être utile.
- + Ne pas supprimer l'attribution Le filigrane Google contenu dans chaque fichier est indispensable pour informer les internautes de notre projet et leur permettre d'accéder à davantage de documents par l'intermédiaire du Programme Google Recherche de Livres. Ne le supprimez en aucun cas.
- + Rester dans la légalité Quelle que soit l'utilisation que vous comptez faire des fichiers, n'oubliez pas qu'il est de votre responsabilité de veiller à respecter la loi. Si un ouvrage appartient au domaine public américain, n'en déduisez pas pour autant qu'il en va de même dans les autres pays. La durée légale des droits d'auteur d'un livre varie d'un pays à l'autre. Nous ne sommes donc pas en mesure de répertorier les ouvrages dont l'utilisation est autorisée et ceux dont elle ne l'est pas. Ne croyez pas que le simple fait d'afficher un livre sur Google Recherche de Livres signifie que celui-ci peut être utilisé de quelque façon que ce soit dans le monde entier. La condamnation à laquelle vous vous exposeriez en cas de violation des droits d'auteur peut être sévère.

À propos du service Google Recherche de Livres

En favorisant la recherche et l'accès à un nombre croissant de livres disponibles dans de nombreuses langues, dont le français, Google souhaite contribuer à promouvoir la diversité culturelle grâce à Google Recherche de Livres. En effet, le Programme Google Recherche de Livres permet aux internautes de découvrir le patrimoine littéraire mondial, tout en aidant les auteurs et les éditeurs à élargir leur public. Vous pouvez effectuer des recherches en ligne dans le texte intégral de cet ouvrage à l'adresse <http://books.google.com>

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c.

1856-57.

WINTER SESSION.

LORD GRAY AND OTHERS, Petitioners.

MESSRS DUNDAS AND WILSON, Compearers.—D. F. Inglis—Gordon.

CHRISTOPHER DOUGLAS, W.S., Petitioner.—Penney—Baillie.

ANN BAILLIE AND OTHERS, Petitioners.

THOMAS MACKENZIE, W.S., Compearer.—Patton.

THE ACCOUNTANT OF COURT.—Sol.-Gen. Maitland.

Nov. 12, 1856.*
Lord Gray
and Others.

Whole Court.

Agent and client—Trust.—A private Act of Parliament, in reference to an entailed estate, was obtained by trustees, one of whom was a partner of a law firm which conducted the proceedings, both prior and subsequent to the passing of the Act. The account for professional business done by the law firm was approved of by the trustees, and also by the heir in possession;—Held (by a majority of the whole Court), that a trustee is not entitled to transact in reference to the trust-estate under his charge, or to employ a firm, of which he is a partner, to do so; and that the right to payment of a business account so acquired is null, and not merely voidable at the instance of some person having an interest to state the objection and to void the right: Therefore, the business charges disallowed, except to the extent of costs out of pocket.

Judicial factor—A factor may not act as agent for the estate.—A factor, locoutoris, who was the partner of a law firm, employed his own firm to conduct certain professional business, which they did beneficially for the estate under his charge, and at less expense than if he had employed a separate agent, and not his own firm to transact it;—Held (by a majority of the whole Court), that the factor was not entitled to his business charges, except to the extent of the costs out of pocket.

Curator bonis.—Opinions expressed to the same effect in regard to a curator bonis.

LORD GRAY, Captain Paterson, and John Dundas, C.S., the surviving Dundas. trust-disponees of the late George Paterson of Castle Huntly (the elder), obtained a private Act of Parliament, for certain purposes connected with the entailed estates, and to give them power to purchase, and add to the entailed lands, the estate of Pilmores, belonging to George Paterson (the younger)—to borrow money for the price, and for the expense of obtaining and carrying the Act into execution,—all which were to be done under the authority of the Court of Session. They now applied to the Court for various powers in connection with this Act; but the only point of interest had reference to the expenses, with regard to which, Mr W. R. Baillie, W.S., to whom the Lord Ordinary remitted, reported as follows:—

“ The account of expenses which was lodged with him by the agents, together with an additional account, which he has more recently been supplied with, have been carefully audited by him, and he has ascertained the expenses of applying for, obtaining, and passing the Act, and carrying the same into execution, to amount to the sum of L.2227, 12s. 4d.

“ It is right, however, that the reporter should notice that, to a very considerable extent, these accounts are composed of charges for business incurred eight years ago to Messrs Dundas and Wilson, W.S., a firm of which one of the partners is Mr John Dundas, a trustee under the trust-deed of George Paterson the elder, and who, in that capacity, was one of the petitioners who applied for and obtained the Act in question, and who was also a trustee of George Paterson the younger,—a trust which was concerned in none of the proceedings under the Act.

“ The Reporter is aware that, in certain cases, it has been held that, where a trustee is agent for a trust, he is not entitled to make charges for professional trouble. In this case, however, as the Reporter is informed and believes to be the fact, the statute was got very much for the benefit of, and at the instigation of the heir of entail, into whose hands the trust-estate ultimately falls. Messrs Dundas and Wilson have been for many years the agents for the family, and are, and were when the Act was passed, the agents for the heir, the beneficiary under the trust. That gentleman is desirous that the present objection should not be raised or given effect to.

“ If the Court shall be of opinion that the firm cannot make any charges for business performed for the trust in consequence of one of the partners being a trustee, the sums which will fall to be struck off amount to L.850, 12s. 2d.”

Messrs Dundas and Wilson sisted themselves as parties, by a minute stating—“ The professional charges referred to have been incurred to the compearers as a firm composed of several partners,—a separate person by the law of Scotland,—and the individual members of which may incur liability for professional business done by the firm on account of any of them; while one only of the partners is a trustee under the Act.

“ The general objection, that a trustee, or other such administrator, is not entitled to transact in reference to the trust-estate under his charge, is one which requires to be pleaded by some party having an interest. A right acquired by a trustee under such circumstances is not null, but merely voidable at the instance of some person having an interest to state the objection, and to void the right. In the present case, no party appears to urge such objection. On the contrary, the trustees apply for a warrant to enable them to pay the amount due to the compearers, while the party having an interest to object to the charges, the heir of entail in possession, has intimated that he approves of a warrant being granted for the full amount of the compearers' account as reported on by Mr Baillie.”

Mackenzie.

II. The circumstances of the case of Mackenzie are thus stated by the Accountant of Court:—“ The Accountant now reports to your Lordship a case where a factor has taken credit for a business account incurred to Messrs Mackenzies and Fraser, W.S., of which firm the factor is a partner. The circumstances are briefly these:—

“ Mr Thomas Mackenzie, W.S., is curator bonis to Mr William Baillie of Dunain. The rental of the estate for the year under audit (31st December 1853 to 31st December 1854) was L.819, 13s. 11d., and the revenue from other sources L.590, 19s. 2d. The Accountant has fixed the factor's commission at L.75, 17s. 3d., being five per cent on the revenue realised by him. No. 1.

" In addition to this allowance, the factor seeks credit for an account of L.14, 8s. 2d. paid to the firm of Mackenzies and Fraser, W.S., which has been incurred in proceedings adopted by him to obtain special powers from the Court to let a portion of the lands of Dunain. The Accountant herewith produces the business account referred to, which he has analyzed, and he finds it to be composed of—

" 1. Professional charges,	-	-	-	-	L.10	19	0
" 2. Cash outlay,	-	-	-	-	3	9	2

Together, - L.14 8 2

" The Accountant has only to remark in regard to the business performed, that it humbly appears to him to be of a beneficial character for the estate, and such as a law-agent must have been employed to perform."

III. Christopher Douglas, W.S., was in February 1853 appointed factor loco tutoris to Sylvester Reid. At the first audit of his accounts, the Accountant of Court allowed him credit for a business account incurred to the firm of Douglas and Monilaws, W.S., of which he was a partner, reserving for future discussion, when the amount of commission to be allowed came to be fixed, the propriety of its being sustained as a charge against the estate.

In rendering his account for the year ending 31st March 1853, he again took credit for business done by the firm; and, as at March 1856, there was a farther charge.

The Accountant disallowed these sums till the Court should have disposed of the case of Mackenzie, supra.

The charges in these accounts consisted partly of fees to counsel and clerk's charges for writing, and partly of professional charges by Messrs Douglas and Monilaws for business which had arisen out of the position of the pupil's estate.

The factor gave in a report, in which he still claimed to have the charges allowed, on the following special grounds:—

" II. Special considerations.

" Apart from the above specialty applicable to the first account, the factor urges in his objections the following specialties with regard to both accounts, viz:—

" 1. That the factor in this case was not the nominee of any of the parties interested, nor connected with them or the pupil in any way; but he accepted office on the special nomination of the Court, the person suggested for the office by the petitioners having been objected to by the respondents.

" 2. That the factor understood at the time of his appointment that he was selected because he was a professional person, and with a special view to his fitness to deal with the legal questions which it was known would arise, owing to the complicated and involved position and nature of the pupil's rights and estate.

" 3. That the interposition of a professional agent was absolutely indispensable in this case, and great additional expense would have been entailed upon the pupil's estate if the factor had employed a separate agent, and not his own firm, to transact the legal business of the estate.

" 4. That the accounts in question are confined in the strictest manner to the purely legal business which must necessarily have been done in this case, and which would be alone performed by a law-agent; and they contain no charge whatever for anything that can be considered in any sense as the ordinary business of a factor.

" 5. That the accounts are entirely composed of three branches, viz:—
1st, Counsel as to the question of legal difficulty arising out of the pupil's rights; 2d, Thereafter presenting an application to the Court for special powers to sanction and carry out a conditional settlement of these questions, which the factor had effected very favourably for the pupil; and, 3d, Carrying into effect the special powers which were granted by the Court under said application, and completing titles to the property thereby acquired; and that these proceedings having been all conducted by the firm of which the factor is a partner, and also sanctioned and approved of by the Court, the necessary expenses of such procedure ought not to be disallowed.

“The Accountant has no hesitation in reporting that these specialties all occur in the present case; and that, had there been no doubt about the rule of law, he would have sustained the business accounts as incurred beneficially for the estate. In consequence of the naked direction of the Court, however, and the subsequent decision in the case of Flowerdew, the Accountant feels debarred from allowing weight to equitable considerations; and his only course, therefore, appears to be, to bring the whole circumstances under the consideration of your Lordships.”

The Accountant, in reporting to the Court, said, “That had there been no doubt about the rule of law, he would have sustained the business accounts as incurred beneficially for the estate,” and he suggested to the Court that, after disposing of this point, they should remit to him to determine the amount of commission, as it would be different in the event of the business account being sustained, from what it would be otherwise. The Court, “in respect of the general importance of the questions raised as to the charges competent to be made for agency and outlay by men of business acting as factors or curators appointed by the Court, and of the views expressed by some of the Judges as reported in the case of Flowerdew and others, 22d December 1854,” appointed the cases to be argued before the whole Court.

At the argument before the whole Court, it was contended,—

I. For Lord Gray and others;—That, although there was a general rule of law that a party in a fiduciary position had no right to perform and charge for business connected with the trust, there were exceptions to that rule, as when the employment was acquiesced in by the beneficiaries, as here. Where a body of trustees determined that one of their number should be so employed, and the beneficiary consented, it was impossible to prevent remuneration, and his right to it was not void, though it could be challenged by any one having an interest, but here there was no contradictor. The case was different from that of a judicial factor, who was an officer of Court, and directly under its control.¹

II. For Mackenzie;—That the fact that he was an officer of Court was a specialty in favour of allowing the charges in question. As everything connected with his office was done under the superintendence of the Court, there was that perfect check against abuse, to supply which was the object of the rule of law laid down as applicable to ordinary cases of trust. The main part of the charges made were for an act specially authorised by the Pupils Protection Act—an application to the Court for special powers necessary to improve the estate, and the proceedings themselves had been approved of by the Court already. Such an application could be more easily, efficiently, and cheaply made by the curator or the firm of which he was a member than by any one else.

III. For Douglas;—As in the case of the curator bonis, the control of the Court was a specialty in favour of the charges being allowed to a factor loco tutoris, an office to which, unlike an ordinary trust, claim for remuneration in the shape of commission necessarily attached. The account here was for business of a very delicate nature, performed to save the estate committed to the factor, and which had been successfully carried through. To disallow these charges would be to establish an inflexible rule contrary to the spirit of the Pupils Protection Act, which in section 13 left it to the Accountant to audit accounts "on the general principles of good management."

and Others.

For the Accountant of Court, it was replied,—That though the characters of all the agents stood high, and the business had in each case been necessary, the rule that a party holding a fiduciary office could not be auctor in rem suam could not be evaded. In England, even costs out of pocket were not granted as a matter of course.¹

The consulted Judges returned the following opinions :—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is best at once to fix the principle applicable to this case.—Ld. Gray.

In New v. Jones, 1 Hall and Twells, p. 632, on the then equity side of the Exchequer, Lord Lyndhurst said, when the argument began, "that it was the duty of a trustee to watch over the solicitor in all proceedings connected with the trust, and to take care that he did only that which was proper, and that his charges were not unreasonable; he was also bound to tax the costs of the solicitor, if necessary. The trustee being appointed for this duty, the question was, whether a court of equity would allow a trustee, acting as a solicitor to the trust-estate, his charges for work and labour in that capacity."

At the close of the argument Lord Lyndhurst gave this weighty declaration of his opinion :—"The sole question to be decided is, whether or not a solicitor who was an executor or trustee is entitled to be paid his bill of costs for business done by him as a solicitor in the execution of his trust. There is no point more clearly established as a general rule by the case of Robinson v. Pett (3 P. Wms. p. 249), and other decisions, than that an executor or trustee is not entitled to be paid for his trouble. If the accounts of the deceased are complicated, and the executor takes upon himself to settle and arrange those accounts, although it may take up much of his time and attention, the principle of equity is, that he is not entitled to compensation for his time and trouble; if he chooses to employ an accountant to settle these accounts, and for the expenses so occasioned, he is entitled to be remunerated out of the estate. The principle is this :—It is the duty of an executor and a trustee to be the guardian of an estate, and to watch over the interests of the estate committed to his charge. If he be allowed to perform the duties connected with the estate, and to claim compensation for his services, his interest would then be opposed to his duty, and, as a matter of prudence, the Court does not allow the executor or trustee to place himself in that situation. If he chooses to perform those duties or services on that estate, he is not entitled to receive compensation. The case applies as strongly to an attorney as to that of any other person; for if an attorney, who is an executor, performs business that was necessary to be transacted,—if this attorney, being an executor, performs those duties himself, he, in my opinion, is not entitled to be paid for the performance of those duties; it would be placing his interests at variance with the duties he has to discharge. It was said that the bill might be taxed, and that this would be a sufficient check. I am of opinion that it would not; the estate has a right not only to the protection of the taxing-officer, but also the vigilance and guardianship of the executor, in addition to the check of the taxing-officer. There might be cases (I do not speak with reference to the present case) where a trustee, placed in the situation of a solicitor, might, if he was allowed to perform the duties of a solicitor, and to be paid for them, be so placed that he might find it very often proper to institute and carry on legal proceedings which he would not do were he to derive no emolument from them, and were to employ another person. In point of prudence, proand Others. to the present case."

An attempt has been made to limit this general principle, and to restrain its application by the case of Craddock v. Piper, decided by Lord Cottenham. The facts here present no such case as that which Lord Cottenham seems to sanction as an exception. But the authority of that case (itself not very clear) cannot be relied upon at all, for, in the number of the House of Lords' Reports (distributed since this case was argued), the present Lord Chancellor, Lord Cranworth, said, in Manson v. Sir William Baillie and others (2 Macqueen, -p. 82),—"I am inclined to think that the true principle was considerably trenched upon by Lord Cottenham, when he said, that a solicitor might act as a solicitor for his co-trustee, and be allowed professional charges. I apprehend that the true principle is, that each trustee shall be a check and control on each and all of the co-trustees, a principle which is placed in danger by the allowance of pecuniary profit."

Lord Brougham, concurring in that opinion on appeal, seems to have added a few words for the sake of alluding to Craddock v. Piper, and said,—“My Lords, a case has been referred to, more than once, in the course of the argument, especially on the part of the appellant, I mean that of Craddock v. Piper, before Lord Cottenham, I think. If that case had been at all adopted in any of the decisions of your Lordships' House, I should be very slow to express any doubt which I might have upon it; but if it has never been so adopted, or countenanced in decisions here, then I may be permitted to state that I have great doubts respecting the soundness of that decision to the length to which it goes.”

This opinion is conclusive against the claim of the trustee for agency business. That a partner may share in the profit can make no difference. I refer, on that point, to my remarks in my opinion on the cases of C. Douglas and T. Mackenzie (infra).

That the trustee is a Parliamentary trustee under a private Act of Parliament to carry it into effect militates greatly against the claim for profit. The Act contemplates that he is to act gratuitously. By promoting the Act, he represented himself to be on the same footing as Lord Gray and Captain J^r. Paterson. The Act having passed on that footing, it is quite incompetent to go back upon the matter, or introduce the competency of doing anything which does not fall within the special duties and obligations of the Parliamentary trustees.

I lay aside, as immaterial, in my opinion, on what footing and risk these parties acted in obtaining the Act of Parliament, or whether they could throw the expense, if unsuccessful in the attempt to obtain the Act of Parliament, on either or both private trusts, or must have borne the expenses themselves. We can only deal with them as parliamentary trustees.

If they had wished to obtain any particular accounts to be expressly sanctioned by the statute as part of the arrangement proposed, as has been done in some of these statutes (Dugaldston and Others), they might have tried that.

One of the intended trustees acts as agent, first in the business of preparing and carrying through the Act. Whether chargeable against any other parties, is not a question now before us. This is an application solely (as the minute of comparence states) in the petition of the Parliamentary trustees to carry the Act into execution, and the expenses claimed must be legally brought under the statute. And they apply to us to fix the expenses in terms of the Act of Parliament.

That there is no contradictor can in no degree relieve the Court from the faithful and strict discharge of their duty, under (in particular) the 15th section of the statute. On the contrary, the fact that there is no one opposing the claim, only increases the onus laid on the Court. The parties interested in the estate, or the private trustees, do not propose to pay the accounts. Their non-opposition or assent, even if directly given (which is not proved), would be of no avail. I say even if directly given, for I see no evidence that Lord Gray or Captain Paterson, in the full knowledge that there is a claim for professional profit by one of their number, and in the knowledge further of the legal objection to a claim for such profit, have sanctioned that claim. But I repeat, no assent by them would avail the other trustees, or relieve us of the duty of examining the accounts on the legal principles applicable to trustees. No. 1.

The trustees, under one of the private trusts, are empowered to sell a property to the other set of private trustees, and the latter to borrow money for the price of such estate, and for the expenses of applying for, obtaining, and passing this Act, and carrying the same into execution. Nov. 12, 1856.
Lord Gray and Others.

Then the trustees may apply to the Court, who are directed to "inquire into, ascertain, and fix, by interlocutor or judgment, the amount of the expenses of applying for, obtaining and passing of the Act, and carrying the same into execution." Various other powers are then introduced for the benefit of the estate, and the trustees are specially described as acting in "the trusts hereby created." And the Court has power to appoint one or more trustees in room of trustees dead, discharged, or incapable. And further, the existing trustees, or others so named, may apply from time to time to this Court, "for a discharge and exoneration of their actings and proceedings, by virtue of this Act, prior to the date of any such application; and the said Court is hereby authorised and required to order evidence to be laid before them of such actings and proceedings, and after consideration thereof, and if the same shall be found to be correct, to exonerate and discharge the said trustees of such actings and proceedings, and to declare them acquitted and discharged thereof for ever."

Then, in February 1852, the trustees of the two private trusts, and in virtue of, and as acting under the Act of Parliament, present the petition before the Court, in which they drop the title of Parliamentary trustees, or as trustees under the Act of Parliament, more correctly given to them in the minute of appearance.

But it is only as the Parliamentary trustees that they apply to the Court. And the prayer of their petition is, in terms of the Act, "to inquire into and ascertain and fix, by interlocutor or judgment, the amount of the expenses of applying for, obtaining, and passing the said Act, and carrying the same into execution; and to order payment of the same to the petitioners, to be applied by them in defraying the expenses of applying for, obtaining, and passing the said Act, and carrying the same into execution, and to issue an order for payment accordingly."

This petition will, at the close of the transactions, be followed up, I presume, by another petition for exoneration and discharge, in terms of the clause of the statute already quoted.

Thus we have the case of proper Parliamentary trustees coming before us to account for part of the actings, and praying for inquiry into the expenses they have incurred, and for payment of the same. And (independently of L.839 of what is termed outlay, but no way explained) there is claimed as profit to one of the trustees L.230.

This I hold to be perfectly incompetent in the case of a Parliamentary trustee.

That this trustee was well acquainted with the position, burdens, and value, of the estate, and was more easily able to carry on the proceedings under the Act of Parliament, may be very true. But having accepted the office, and had its acceptance in view from the first, he was to give his aid gratuitously, and as agent he could not act with a view to profit.

Besides, it is not alleged, that on account of his previous knowledge of the affairs of the family, any abatement is made from the full rates of professional charges for the whole business done, and it is not shown how, in any way, expense was saved by his acting as agent. In truth, the execution of the Act of Parliament, both as to the sale contemplated, and as to the borrowing of money, were matters which an agent might have caused them; and, at all events, Mr Wilson might easily have done so, he deriving the full profit. It is the trustee making profit which causes the objection.

There may be some specialty as to part of the very large sum stated for outlay. For instance, if this trustee went to London at the time of obtaining the Act of Parliament, his expenses may, I think, be fairly charged. But as the Parliamentary solicitors would pay, I presume, the fees in London to counsel, or officers of Parliament, out of the L.620 paid to them, the sum stated for outlay under this branch, L.230, seems to be a very great sum.

No. 1. On the charges for outlay I think there should be a detailed report by the Auditor of Court.

Nov. 12, 1856. This case does not fall under the functions of the Accountant of Court; and that being the case, I apprehend that, in ascertaining and fixing the amount of the expenses to be settled by our judgment, we ought to have an examination and audit by the proper officer of this Court, the Auditor.

Lord Gray and Others.

The ground for remitting accounts to another Writer to the Signet I do not understand. We have not yet had the aid and assistance which the Court ought to have in such cases. This was a proper matter for the Auditor of Court, as much as any ordinary account of expenses. And I can never, on the report of another agent, when there is no special ground for such remit, concur in sustaining, in the discharge of our statutory duty, Scotch accounts of expenses, without examination by our Auditor. In principle I think the course adopted, of the remit to Mr Baillie (well known to us as very high in his profession, was yet) objectionable. Accordingly, he went wrong to the extent of L.620. But as to what he assumes, by his approval of the abstract prepared by the parties, to be outlay, L.839, I cannot take his opinion as satisfactory or conclusive. I have looked over the accounts which were sent to me, and I am not prepared to hold any such sum to be outlay, in the proper sense of the term used by Lord Lyndhurst, viz. "costs out of pocket." I object entirely to a remit to another agent, when we have an officer appointed for the purpose of strict examination of these matters. And therefore, after the principle is fixed, I think these accounts should be sent to the Auditor in the usual form, but with the direction to distinguish specially what are costs out of pocket. I am very jealous of that duty being done by any one who is not in the independent but most responsible office of Auditor.

LORD WOOD.—By the private Act obtained in 1847, on the application of the trustees under the trust-deed of George Paterson the elder, the trustees under the trust-deed of George Paterson the younger were empowered to sell the estate of Pilmore, part of the trust-property, to the trustees of George Paterson the elder, who, on the one hand, were empowered to purchase the same:—And it is provided that the trustees may apply to the Court, who are directed to inquire into, ascertain, and fix, "by interlocutor or judgment, the amount of the expenses of applying for, obtaining, and passing of the Act, and carrying the same into execution." The Act contains various provisions for carrying the objects in view into effect by the parties who were trustees under the trust-deed of George Paterson the elder, and they are specially described as trustees acting "in the trusts hereby created." Then there is a clause (sect. 14) providing for their exoneration and discharge by the Court.

Mr Dundas—one of the trustees under both private trust-deeds, and one of the intended Parliamentary trustees, and who is a Parliamentary trustee—or, as it is said, the firm of Dundas and Wilson, of which he is a partner—acted as agent or agents in the business of preparing for and procuring the Act, and subsequently in carrying its purposes into execution; and it is for the expenses of performing the business so done that the present claim is made.

Now, although the petition is titled as a petition for the trustees in the two trust-deeds, it is in reality an application, in the petition of the Parliamentary trustees, to carry the Act into execution; and the expenses claimed are expenses which must be shown to be chargeable in virtue of its provisions. Accordingly, the Court is applied to to fix the amount to be allowed, in terms of the provisions already cited. The question is, to what extent the claim for expenses is well founded—that is, well founded against the fund allowed to be provided by the Act, and as such, can be sanctioned by the Court. Whether or not there is any other quarter from which the expenses may be recoverable is not the matter at issue.

Now, the principle applicable to the case of a trustee acting as agent in the business of the trust may be held to be completely fixed by the authorities mentioned in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk; and were it necessary, others might be cited both in England and from our own books. A trustee so acting is not entitled to charge for his labour. He is entitled only to be paid his costs out of pocket. The rule, and the grounds of it, are fully explained by Lord Lyndhurst in the case of New v. Jones:—And that it is not subject to the limitation which was supposed to have been sanctioned by Lord Cottenham in the case of Craddock v. Piper is shown by the opinions of Lord Cranworth and Lord Brougham in Manson v. Sir William Baillie and Others. But in addition to these cases, I am anxious to refer to that of Broughton v. Broughton, cited in the number of the Law Review for the month of February 1856, which contains a valuable and instructive judgment of the present Lord Chancellor upon the point under consideration, which I shall take the liberty of quoting.

No. 1.

Nov. 12, 1856.

“Trustee acting as Solicitor not entitled to his costs.—An executrix and trustee under a will employed her co-trustee, who was a solicitor, to transact the necessary business of the trust. It was held by Lord Chancellor Cranworth, that the solicitor was only entitled to costs out of pocket. ‘The rule,’ said his Lordship, ‘applicable to the subject has been treated at the bar as if it were sufficiently enunciated by saying, that a trustee shall not be able to make a profit of his trust, but that is not stating it so widely as it ought to be stated. The rule really is that no one who has a duty to perform shall place himself in a situation to have his interests conflicting with that duty, and a case for the application of the rule is, that of a trustee himself doing acts which he might employ others to perform, and taking payment in some way for doing them. As the trustee might make the payment to others, this Court says he shall not make it to himself; and it says the same in the case of agents where they may employ others under them. The good sense of the rule is obvious, because it is one of the duties of a trustee to take care that no improper charges are made by persons employed for the estate. It has been often argued, that a sufficient check is afforded by the power of taxing the charges, and the answer to this is, that the check is not enough, and the creator of the trust has a right to have that, and also the check of the trustee; the result therefore is, that no person in whom fiduciary duties are vested shall make a profit of them by employing himself, because in doing this he cannot perform one part of his trust, namely, that of seeing that no improper charges are made. The general rule applies to a solicitor acting as a trustee; and the only question is how far the circumstances of the present case take it out of the rule.

It is, in the first place, sought to take this case out of the rule on the authority of Craddock v. Piper; and here I must own, speaking with all deference, and not meaning to decide anything upon the point, that I cannot see any distinction between costs incurred in administering an estate without a suit; the danger may probably be less in the former case than in the latter, but the principle is the same. As every trustee is bound to protect the estate against improper charges, there must also exist the same difficulty in principle in acting for himself and others, as in acting for himself alone.’”

If, then, the business, the expenses of which are claimed, had been transacted by Mr Dundas as agent, I am not aware of any ground on which it could—as respects that portion of the claim consisting of his proper accounts, as distinguished from those of the parliamentary agents, &c.—be found that he was entitled to anything beyond costs out of pocket. The claim must have been limited to that; and this, whether when acting as agent, he were held to have been acting, and to have combined with it the character of private trustee or Parliamentary trustee. In the latter case, I think he would, if possible, be even in a less favourable position than the former. But in any view the material point is this, that the expenses are expenses which are here sought to be made good against the fund allowed to be raised by the private Act of Parliament, in order to provide for expenses, and that the amount of all such expenses must, by the Act, be fixed by the Court. The case truly is one in which the Parliamentary trustees come before the Court stating the actings which have been had in the matter embraced by the statute, and praying for inquiry into the expenses incurred, and for payment of the same. And it appears to be very clear indeed, that looking to the rule, and the principle and policy on which it rests, it is impossible that the Court could sanction a charge for any expenses for business that had been done by Mr Dundas as agent, except to the extent of costs out of pocket.

But then the statement is, that the business was not done by Mr Dundas, the trustee, individually as agent, but by the firm of Dundas and Wilson, of which he is a partner. I agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk, that the fact that a partner may share in the profit can make no difference. That it cannot do so consistently with the principle and policy of the rule, and without countenancing what would resolve into an invasion of it, is I think perfectly manifest. Upon this point I refer to the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk, and also to his Lordship's opinion in the cases of C. Douglas and T. Mackenzie. And I farther agree with his Lordship, for the reasons he has given in these opinions, that no weight can be attached to the allegation in regard to the saving of expense, by the business having been transacted by a trustee as agent, who had a previous knowledge of the affairs to which it relates, or by the firm of which he was a partner.

But then it is said that it was with the authority and approbation, not only of his co-trustees, that Mr Dundas's firm was employed to do the business, the charges for which are in question, but also with the knowledge and sanction of Mr Paterson, the heir of entail in possession, and the existing heirs-substitute, the parties beneficially interested, and that in that state of matters the objection to a claim for the ordinary remuneration for the business done does not hold. To this there are two answers. In the first place, there is no evidence produced of the alleged employment by the co-trustees upon the footing alleged, at least there is none of its having been given in the knowledge of the objection to which any charge beyond costs out of pocket would be liable, and upon the understanding that no such objection was to be taken. Certainly there is no evidence of any approbation by the heirs of entail other than Mr Paterson; and I do not know that even as to him any proper evidence has been furnished. Then, with regard to the heirs-substitute, their consent cannot be taken for granted from their not appearing as contradictors, which is all that is asserted as to them—and they are parties who have an interest in the fund from which payment is craved, whose interest cannot be overlooked in fixing the amount of expenses to be allowed. But, in the second place, even if there were evidence of the alleged consents, it does not appear to me that the Court, in discharging the duty devolved upon it by the Act, could sanction any expenses as chargeable, which by the rule applicable to a trustee acting as agent in the trust-business, would fall to be disallowed. The Court in fixing the amount of expenses to be paid, are bound to see that they are stated in terms of law; and no consent of parties can absolve them from that obligation, whatever effect it may have in reference to a claim made against the parties by whom the consent may have been given, and their separate funds. The assent of co-trustees must, I apprehend, be altogether unavailing. They cannot relieve their co-trustee from a part of his duty, or place him (or, which is the same thing, his firm) in a position conflicting with that duty, and which the law says he is disqualified from holding, or, at all events, disqualified from holding to the effect of more being allowed than costs out of pocket. And as respects the heirs of entail, I cannot see how, in such a case, where the whole body of the heirs of entail, existing and future, are interested, adequate consents—supposing all objection could be thereby removed—could be obtained. It may be true that there is no contradictor to the claim made by the petitioners, but that, in a case like the present, seems to me only to call upon the Court, in the discharge of its duty, to be the more strict and watchful in seeing that no expenses are permitted to be charged to which there is any legal objection. The only way, I apprehend, in which the objection which has arisen could have been obviated, and the Court enabled to fix the amount of expenses at the ordinary rate of remuneration, as the same might be taxed by the auditing officer, would have been to have had it so provided in the Act itself.

Whether or not, by any arrangement for employing Mr Wilson individually in the trust business—he being to draw the full profits—the force of the objection would have been removed, I give no opinion.

LORDS COWAN and MACKENZIE.—Upon the general question as to the competency of professional charges for agency by a trustee, or by a firm of which he is a partner, against the trust-estate,—we concur in the views and principles stated by the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Wood, and are of opinion that the charges for agency in the accounts of Messrs Dundas and Wilson, in so far as they are of that description, ought to be disallowed. We hold the general rule which prohibits such charges to be now clearly established; and, so far as we can see, there is nothing in the present case which should prevent that rule from being applied.

With respect to the claim for outlay, we are of opinion that Messrs Dundas and Wilson are entitled to all such charges and expenses actually paid by them out of pocket as shall appear to have been properly incurred and paid. No. 1.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—In so far as regards the professional charges for agency by Mr Dundas, or Messrs Dundas and Wilson, I concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Wood. Nov. 12, 1856.
Lord Gray and Others.

I cannot, however, do so without feeling that there is hardship in refusing this remuneration, because there is no room to doubt that the charges are for business conducted for the benefit of the estate, on reasonable and even moderate terms, and by gentlemen of the highest character, acting in bona fide. But the rule which forbids such charges by a trustee, or by a firm of which a trustee is partner, is now settled by the highest authority, and on solid grounds of principle, and it must be applied.

To the reimbursement of outlay, or “costs out of pocket,” I am of opinion that the compearers are entitled; and I concur with the Lord Justice-Clerk in thinking that the amount of such outlay should, as a general rule, be ascertained by the examination and report of the Auditor of Court.

In the present case, the accounts have been examined and reported on by a highly respectable and intelligent man of business; and I am not disposed to disturb his report, or put the estate to the expense of a new audit.

LORD HANDYSIDE.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk; with this qualification, however, that, along with Lord Wood, I reserve my opinion as to whether or not Mr Wilson, one of the partners, could have been employed individually, under an arrangement for his deriving the full profit of the employment.

LORD MURRAY.—I have the same feeling with Lord Ardmillan, that there is some hardship in refusing the professional charges for agency by Mr Dundas, because there is no reason to doubt that the charges are for business performed for the benefit of the estate, on reasonable and moderate terms, as his Lordship has observed. But the Court is not entitled to allow such circumstances to sanction a deviation from a rule which applies to all trustees, and to all men of business who are trustees, however respectable they may be. No trustee is entitled to place himself in a situation in which he has an interest different from the performance of his duty as trustee. The circumstance that he may be much too honourable a man to abuse the mixed duties which he endeavours to perform, cannot affect the case.

I therefore concur in the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Wood, as well as those of Lords Cowan, Mackenzie, and Ardmillan.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of opinion that the petitioners, the Castle Huntly trustees, are entitled to payment of the expenses incurred in obtaining the Act of Parliament in question, as reported by Mr Baillie. I consider that, in taking steps to obtain that Act, the trustees acted as individuals without the power or right, in the first instance, to bind the trust. In that position they were entitled to employ Messrs Dundas and Wilson as their agents, and they became personally responsible to them for the expense incurred. The Act was obtained, containing a clause entitling the trustees to take payment of “the amount of the expenses of applying for, obtaining, and passing this Act,” and under that clause I consider the trustees entitled to be reimbursed or indemnified for the expenses which I think they legally incurred to their agents. I think that any other result would be unjust, and contrary to the Act of Parliament.

I am of opinion, that in so far as any of the expenses of carrying the Act into execution have been incurred to Messrs Dundas and Wilson, as agents for the trustees of George Paterson the younger, these expenses ought to be allowed, as reported on. They are not to come out of the trust-estate of George Paterson the younger, but out of that of George Paterson the elder; and I do not see how the trust of Paterson the elder can escape from payment of a fair charge, because the trustees of another estate have employed one of their number as agent. The objection, in point of principle, in such cases, appears to me to apply only to transactions by which a trustee on his own employment, or that of his co-trustees, obtains profit out of the trust-estate under his charge. But in so far as Messrs Dundas and Wilson acted for the trustees of Paterson the younger, they were not employed by the trustees of Paterson the elder, although that trust-estate is to pay them.

I am of opinion that Messrs Dundas and Wilson, in so far as they have acted in

No. 1. the execution of the Act of Parliament, as agents for the trustees of Paterson the elder, have no claim to remuneration from that trust-estate beyond expenses out of pocket. I think here that the rule against a trustee being auctor in rem suam directly and properly applies.

Nov. 12, 1856.
and Others.

I think that the Court is bound to take cognisance of that matter now, and to disallow this part of the charges under the present petition. It has been argued that this case resembles that of a purchase by a trustee, which is good unless challenged, and which those who have the beneficial interest can alone set aside. But in that case an election has to be made. The purchase must either be adopted as it stands, or repudiated with all its benefits. Here the trust-estate has no election to make. It is entitled to take the labour bestowed by one of its trustees and his firm, and is entitled to that labour gratuitously.

II.—Douglas
& Mackenzie.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is no distinction between these cases.

The point raised is of very great importance, and I look to the result with much anxiety, as I should deprecate, for the sake of the strict and steady government of trusts, any departure from the principle involved in the discussion, and which I hold to be finally fixed.

In one of the cases I see a sort of quotation, as if from some interlocutor of Court (interlocutor in case of T. Mackenzie), in the matter of “law business incurred to partnerships, of which the factor is a partner.” No such expression is in the interlocutor appointing the hearing; and the question was argued without special reference to partnerships, in which such officers of Court are interested. Nor do I see any relevancy in this incident in the cases. The interlocutor of Lord Neaves, reporting the case of Mackenzie, seems to be limited to that matter; but the interlocutor of the Court is not. The question before us is the propriety of factors locoutoris and similar officers, acting as agents in the business of the estate committed to them, and making thereby professional profit. In the case of partnerships, if the factor does not personally conduct the agency, then he must make his partner acquainted with the matter, and might just as well have instructed another agent. And one main argument in support of the competency of the factor acting as agent would then fail, viz. that the factor already knows the business, and that thus some advantage and saving (how saving, has not been explained) are gained, if another party is not employed.

But I have noticed this point as to partnerships, for even in the argument there did seem to glide in some allusions to such cases.

The first consideration which strikes one in regard to the point raised is, that the competency of the course contended for is for the special advantage and benefit of law agents appointed as factors or curators, &c., in order to enable them to make profit over and above the proper commission and charges belonging to the character of the office to which they have been appointed. Other factors are paid by an satisfied with commission, and the repayment of the expenses incurred by them in the course of the management.

But if the Court once sanction the competency of agency on the estate being taken up for profit by the factors, how can the Court stop short? Many cases have been seen as to house property, of the appointment of builders. Builders, too, in the country, are often employed to act as factors for small proprietors, as understanding well the state and condition of steadings, and well qualified for such employment. Other tradesmen and merchants are often appointed when an estate is to be wound up. In old house property requiring repairs, or the rebuilding of houses, is the builder to be allowed to execute repairs and rebuild? and why not on the principle contended for? An extensive ship-builder or carpenter is appointed, say at Greenock, on the sequestration by the Court of a ship-building concern, which there have been disputes on the death of one partner, or on the death of a ship-builder, leaving ships partly built, and useless (it may be said) unless finished. Are such parties to be allowed to be themselves, at their own hands, the ship-builders? Many other cases may be put, in which such work, just as fair as agency may be carried on, perhaps with less temptation and less favourable means of creating work, and between which and agency no distinction in principle can be drawn.

That others than law-agents will find out opportunities for extra work, we have an example of, in the case of Robertson, 26th May 1843. It had become necessary to wind up and sell off a very considerable stock in trade, and the factor, a merchant (at the request, too, of friends), had acted, being a good man of business, as an accountant, and charged L.60 for that work. Lord Wood, to whom we twice remitted the case to obtain information on the point, at last reported favourably, on the ground that it was a very special case. The extent of special services was proved to us, and with great difficulty, and with much hesitation, we pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect of the special report by Lord Wood, as to the services of the factor, sustain the charge in the special circumstances of this case," with a warning that the same course would not be again followed, which warning entered both sets of reports. But if agency is to be actually sanctioned, we shall have extra charges in numerous cases.

and Others.

The question is therefore of very wide application, and becomes a very grave matter when properly considered.

The case of law-agency by the factor I regard with peculiar distrust. Law-business is easily created, and it is seldom that, on a review of the matter, its inexpediency or recklessness can be ascertained, so as to make it a ground of forfeiture of the account.

It was on the same ground of distrust that the Act of Sederunt 1710, 23d November, declared "all writers, and other dependers on the session, wholly incapable of any such trust or office" as that of "factors on bankrupt and incumbered estates," lest, it is said, they may increase or prolong litigation.

The Court must be prepared to go far beyond the case of law-agents, if professional profit is allowed to be made over and above a full and adequate commission for all the proper duties belonging to the office of factor, of which law-agency is no part at all.

Further, this suggests a consideration of great weight. Although unfortunately there were no proper means for enforcing the regulations of the Act of Sederunt 1730, February 15th, yet that valuable set of regulations sets forth very anxiously, and with great foresight, the duties of the office of factors.

First, After describing the importance and objects of judicial factors in such circumstances, in particular, as the present (loco tutoris and legal incapacity), it proceeds to set forth certain regulations "for the faithful and punctual fulfilling of their trust." The factory is thus declared to be a trust. And in principle, it is eminently a trust, and that of the highest order—of great confidence on the one hand, and, being derived from the appointment of Court, of a very distinct kind, having, moreover, official responsibility attached to it. Factors are officers of Court with specific duties, in regard to what is declared to be a trust. Agency is no part of such duties—it does not belong to the office.

The undertaking of any such agency being wholly voluntary, is an act beyond the office, and cannot be recognised as undertaken under it. As factor, the officer has no right so to act.

Further, the Act of Sederunt 1730, does allude to remuneration for the duties of the factor, and distinctly holds that the factor is to be paid by salary. The clerk to the process or act of appointment was directed to be in truth the accountant in each case, and if the duties of the clerks had been enforced, the recent office of the Accountant of Court would not have been necessary. And I infer, that the salary in each case was to be judged of by the clerk. In older cases, a sort of salary is often mentioned as the mode of remuneration. When a commission came to be the more ordinary mode of remuneration, I have not seen materials for ascertaining, and have not time to examine. The Pupils' Protection Act assumes, that the duties appertaining to the office of factors and other such officers, are to be remunerated by "commission" (see sect. 6), which the accountant is to fix "according to his opinion of what is just in each particular case." I see no authority whatever in the statute for the Accountant or Court receiving and entertaining any account whatever in the name and behalf of the factor, except what falls under his proper factory business. If he has employed an agent for business done, then the claim of the agent is a charge against the factory estate, in the same way as repairs on buildings, or any other charges. And the Accountant, of course, in that way will call for such account, and deal with it as with any other claim against, or any item of discharge by, the factor, taken credit for in the factory account. But any account or claim by the factor himself, in his own name, and for his own behoof, in a separate character from that of factor, viz., as employed by himself as an agent, so as to make a charge for himself personally, I can find no warrant for the Accountant or Court receiving as competent. I think any such account is utterly incompetent under the statute. If work of any kind is to be done for the estate, whether law business, reaping a crop, mending panes of glass, or any other thing, it can only appear as a charge against the factor, as an item of discharge, and not as an account by itself, and for his behoof, over and above payment for the performance of his factory duty. On this ground alone, I hold any such account to be incompetent.

Such is the plan for the office of factor.

The office being declared to be a trust, by an Act of Sederunt, recognised and quoted in the recent Pupils' Protection Act, and which certainly must now be held to be the law of the land, it necessarily follows, that every rule, restraint, or obligation applicable to the character of trustees, must be binding and enforced as to such judicial trustees, so far as such can apply.

It does not appear to me to be competent for the Court, sitting in individual cases, to dispense with, or break through, any such rules and obligations, which the character of trustee implies and imposes.

This seems to me to be the only safe and sound principle.

Taking, then, factors to be trustees, with this only difference (unfavourable for this claim) that a certain payment or allowance is sanctioned for the performance of all the duties involved in the discharge of the trust committed to them, I hold that principle to be at once decisive of the present claims. Trustees cannot make profit by agency in the management of the trust; therefore factors cannot.

What Lord Lyndhurst has emphatically said as to law-agents who are trustees or executors, acting as solicitors in the proceedings connected with trusts, is most strictly applicable to factors and other officers of Court in the discharge of the trust committed to them, and for which they are to be fully paid.

In New v. Jones, 1 Hall and Twells, p. 632, on the then equity side of the Exchequer, Lord Lyndhurst said, when the argument began, "that it was the duty of a trustee to watch over the solicitor in all proceedings connected with the trust and to take care that he did only that which was proper, and that his charges were not unreasonable; he was also bound to tax the costs of the solicitor, if necessary. The trustee being appointed for this duty, the question was, whether a court of equity would allow a trustee, acting as a solicitor to the trust-estate, his charges for work and labour in that capacity."

At the close of the argument, Lord Lyndhurst gave this weighty declaration of his opinion:—"The sole question to be decided is, whether or not a solicitor who was an executor or trustee, is entitled to be paid his bill of costs for business done by him as a solicitor in the execution of his trust. There is no point more clearly established as a general rule, by the case of Robinson v. Pott (3 P. Wms. p. 249) and other decisions, than that an executor or trustee is not entitled to be paid for his trouble. If the accounts of the deceased are complicated, and the executor takes upon himself to settle and arrange those accounts, although it may take up much of his time and attention, the principle of equity is, that he is not entitled to compensation for his time and trouble; if he chooses to employ an accountant to settle these accounts for the expenses so occasioned, he is entitled to be remunerated out of the estate. The principle is this:—It is the duty of an executor and a trustee to be the guardian of an estate, and to watch over the interests of the estate committed to his charge. If he be allowed to perform the duties connected with the estate, and to claim compensation for his services, his interest would then be opposed to his duty, and, as a matter of prudence, the Court does not allow the executor or trustee to place himself in that situation. If he chooses to perform those duties or services on that estate, he is not entitled to receive compensation. The case applies as strongly to an attorney as to that of any other person; for an attorney, who is an executor, performs business that was necessary to be transacted,—if this attorney, being an executor, performs those duties himself, he, in my opinion, is not entitled to be paid for the performance of those duties; it would be placing his interests at variance with the duties he has to discharge. It was said that the bill might be taxed, and that this would be a sufficient check. I am of opinion that it would not; the estate has a right not only to the protection

the taxing-officer, but also to the vigilance and guardianship of the executor, in addition to the check of the taxing-officer. There might be cases (I do not speak with reference to the present case) where a trustee, placed in the situation of a solicitor, might, if he were allowed to perform the duties of a solicitor, and to be paid for them, be so placed that he might find it very often proper to institute and carry on legal proceedings, which he would not do were he to derive no emolument from them, and were to employ another person. In point of prudence and propriety, and as a guard over the estate, I am of opinion, that it would not be proper that a solicitor, who is a trustee, should be distinguished from an ordinary trustee. If a trustee, who is a solicitor, acts as a solicitor, he is not entitled to charge for his labour; he is entitled only to be paid his costs out of pocket. This rule applies to the present case."

An attempt has been made to limit this general principle, and to restrain its application by the case of Craddock v. Piper, decided by Lord Cottenham. The facts here present no such case as that which Lord Cottenham seems to sanction as an exception. But the authority of that case (itself not very clear) cannot be relied upon at all, for in the number of the House of Lords Reports (distributed since this case was argued), the present Lord Chancellor, Lord Cranworth, said, in Manson v. Sir William Baillie and others (2 Macqueen, p. 82)—"I am inclined to think that the true principle was considerably trenched upon by Lord Cottenham, when he said that a solicitor might act as a solicitor for his co-trustee, and be allowed professional charges. I apprehend that the true principle is, that each trustee shall be a check and control on each and all of the co-trustees, a principle which is placed in danger by the allowance of pecuniary profit."

Lord Brougham, concurring in the opinion on the cause under appeal, seems to have added a few words, for the sake of alluding to Craddock v. Piper, and said:—"My Lords, a case has been referred to, more than once in the course of this argument, especially on the part of the appellant—I mean that of Craddock v. Piper before Lord Cottenham, I think. If that case had been at all adopted in any of the decisions of your Lordships's House, I should be very slow to express any doubt which I might have upon it; but if it has never been so adopted or countenanced in decisions here, then I may be permitted to state that I have great doubts respecting the soundness of that decision to the length to which it goes."

Is there in reality any ground for a distinction?

I see none. A factor is a trust. The Act of Sederunt settles that point. Profit is made by the person holding that trust. Are these two things compatible?

As the result will be, that in all instances where agents of this Court, or of inferior courts, are named factors, they may make profit by agency in the business of the factor, I am of opinion that such agency must be disallowed—being carried on for profit over and above the proper remuneration for the duty of factor.

The middle course pointed at apparently by the Accountant, viz., that in respect of such agency, the factor's commission should be diminished, I do not understand at all, if agency by the factor is competent and legitimate. The agency is something over and above the performance of the whole duties of factor. All these are fulfilled, and ought to be paid for. And there is no principle whatever that I can see for diminishing the commission, as the whole charges for agency would have been paid to another agent if the factor had not acted as such. And if it is fitting and competent for the factor to act as agent in the business of the trust, and if nothing wrong is detected, I cannot see why, on any consistent ground, his commission should therefore be diminished (having done all the duty for the performance of which it is to be adjusted), because he has done other work which, ex hypothesi, it is competent for him to do, and payment for which must have been made to another: Then why not to him, without diminishing his commission separately and fully earned—if such work, ultra of his duties as factor, can competently be done by him consistently with his office as factor?

Any such middle course, in truth, would involve an admission that the agency is against the duty of factor, and beyond the character of the office. Either the

No. 1. propriety of charge by the factor for law-agency, and other work done for the estate, must be sustained in every case, unless where it has been detected to be mala fide carried on, or it must be disallowed on a general principle.
 Nov. 12, 1856. Lord Gray and Others.

An attempt was made to defend the propriety on a general ground, which was stated to take the case of factors out of the rule admitted to be applicable to trustees, and the result will be, if that ground is given effect to, that all factors who are law-agents may conduct all the law business of the estates which they manage.

That ground was the protection said to be afforded by the review by the Accountant of Court.

I could not give effect to that ground for exception—1. Because the Act of Sederunt declares the office to be a trust;—2. Because it is plainly unsound. The control by the review of the Accountant of Court was applied to offices which had long existed in the law, and therefore cannot change the character of such offices, or make that competent now which is in principle incompatible with the character of the office; and accordingly the Act of Parliament (sec. 32) states that it is not to affect the remuneration or responsibility of parties; the rubric says of factors. I rather understand the clause to apply to proper tutors, but the principle is plainly the foundation of the statute; and, 3. This ground really fails as to that large class of factors who are not amenable to the more efficient control of the Accountant than any which the Court can exercise. And agency surely is not to be held competent in the one class and not in the other? But, 4. A number of officers are brought under the control and review of the Accountant of Court, who, not being proper officers of Court, could only be dealt with formerly at common law in a very uncertain and unsatisfactory manner—such as tutors-at-law, nominate, or to insane persons. I suppose the rule as to them cannot be disputed. But if the control of the Accountant is such a security against abuse as to afford a reason for allowing the factors of the Court to make profit over and above their commission, why should not such control enable those to do so who have no commission at all? In fact, the general character of the enactment convinces me that all the cases were to be regulated by the same principles, except where remuneration was previously recognised.

But neither the control of the Accountant nor of the Court could check the evil intended to be guarded against.

That evil is, that the exercise of the unbiased judgment of the factor, with a view to save expense, cannot be secured to the estate, if he is allowed, because he is an agent, to carry on law business for his profit.

It is matter of relief in stating one's opinion, in the cases now before the Court, that the question occurs in all these cases in regard to gentlemen whom we all know cannot possibly have been under the operation of any such temptation to create expense. And therefore I shall state my opinion, without the least risk of personal imputation being inferred. But the character of these gentlemen calls on us not to be thereby influenced in a matter which ought to depend wholly on principle.

One great duty of a factor—perhaps the most important—is to avoid expense. The estates to which factors are appointed are generally so situated in many respects as to be very frequently exposed to great risk of expenses. The pupil (as here) may be left in a position in which there may be deeds to challenge, claims to vindicate and enforce, or to resist,—complicated matters in trade, or general debts to wind up and settle with adverse parties,—or matters to be carried through owing to legal incapacity,—questions of marriage and legitimacy to try or to resist. In short, all the difficulties incident to family affairs, to trade, to succession, and disputed rights and interests, may be said to be of very frequent occurrence in the cases which require the appointment of a factor loco tutoris or curator bonis, and of cautious selection for such offices. The expectations from successful lawsuits may be large. The funds to defray such are uncertain, or scarcely adequate, with a view to the future maintenance and means of the pupil. Hence the unbiased judgment of the officer in charge of the estate is most essential. He is to disburse the funds of a ward, if lawsuits are to be carried on. That is a most delicate trust.

Now, there are many very keen, zealous agents, on whose judgment as to institating an action which he is to carry on, a client may not be very safe to rely, who may yet be most discriminating and provident as to the propriety and safety of legal proceedings, if compelled to view the matter in a wholly disinterested light, and when no possible temptation can bias the mind. There are others who, unconsciously to themselves, will be biased by the prospect of litigation, in the animation of which they take real interest, as much as in its profits, and who look to increased reputation by the prospect they think they see in the distance of securing great benefit to the pupil's estate, and who will enter into the lawsuit with the keen feelings of an actual litigant, and get keener and keener as the stake becomes greater or more doubtful.

Others, again, have but an obtuse sense of responsibility, not such as to overcome the desire for a lawsuit, the profit of which they think (and justly) that they are sure of, whether successful or not.

There are a multitude of cases in which there may be no mala fides, but in which agents, when free of all control at the time, will be easily led into law business as to the trust-estate, which, if they were not to conduct it, they would view in a more dispassionate light, and with a view to save expense—an object which cannot, as the minds of men are constituted, be sufficiently secured, if the expense is to be a source of regular and competent and fair profit to the person who ought to study economy and prudence. I hold it to be not only a rule of prudence and propriety, but a sacred principle in regard to every sort of trust, especially in reference to property committed to the trust of another by reason of the inability of the owner to act for himself, that if money is to be expended in the business of the estate, he who is to expend it is not to make profit by reason of and through such expenditure.

It was said the check was sufficient when the factor is under the control of the Court, or Accountant, or both. The probability of detecting proof that a lawsuit was instituted mala fide, or even recklessly and rashly, is very slight indeed. If the factor is entitled to act as agent, he has the benefit of an opposite presumption in his favour. If not entitled to that presumption, then clearly he ought not to be allowed to act as agent. He will often have ample evidence apparently to show that it was a fair litigation; while, if not interested in instituting it, he would have more fully and cautiously examined that information, and reflected more on his responsibility in undertaking it on such materials. Then his statement, seemingly fair enough to counsel, easily obtains the sanction of an opinion on his case; and it will be a very rare case indeed in which such misconduct as to the institution of the action can be detected so fully as to infer the forfeiture of all charges of agency which he was entitled to conduct.

Now, against the risks of such influence on the mind of their own officers the Court are bound to guard. They can guard. And it seems to me quite inconsistent on the part of the Court recognising and giving effect to the hazard of such temptations in other cases, to permit unnecessarily their own officers to act in matters presenting such temptations.

It is of no avail to point to the instance of a factor of the name of Flowerdew, in which the impropriety of litigation was detected. The evidence happened to be flagrant. But the materials can seldom be obtained for such review of the grounds of a lawsuit and proof of mala fides. But that case was imperfectly known, when the credit of such a result was given to the Accountant, who hardly ever can arrive at any such conclusion, at least without a contradictor; and the misfortune is, that the estate is in most instances unrepresented and unprotected, except by the factor. Flowerdew was dead. And on the application of some of the beneficiaries, another factor had been appointed, one of whose most important duties was to bring Flowerdew to account, and examine into his whole management. Aided by the ~~previous~~ ^{present} conversant with the proceedings, and in possession of all the materials for judging of the propriety of Flowerdew's actions, viz. all the materials which Flowerdew himself was in possession of, the new factor, in bringing his management to account, had means for detecting recklessness, and for testing honesty or common prudence, which the Accountant can never possess. It is useless, indeed, to refer to the Accountant's means of inquiry as sufficient to ascertain the propriety of actions carried on by the factor, of which failure is no fair test by which to decide the matter, especially if he has the presumption in his favour, to which he is entitled,

No. 1. if agency by him is not only competent but fair and legitimate. And if we are to enter into such specialties, the rule will, in regard to factors who are law-agents soon altogether be frittered away. Indeed, some of the supposed specialties, or others equally good, might easily be the result of management by the factor, without such connivance being apparent to the Accountant.

Nov. 12, 1856. Lord Gray and Others.

Further, when the advantages of checks and control are founded upon, I must say it would be very strange for the Court unnecessarily to allow factors to act as agents (for it is wholly unnecessary), in the hope that they may be under such control as may check the abuse to which such a permission may be turned. The wiser, the more consistent, and the safer rule is, to withhold the permission which requires such control.

But then it was contended that there were a variety of specialties in the present cases, particularly in the case of the factor loco tutoris, which entitled him here to act as agent, assuming the general rule to be against him. I cannot admit that the rule ought to admit of any exceptions, and I will venture to say that, in nine out of ten cases, the same or similar pleas might be urged. Indeed, some are equally applicable to any case, and are no specialties at all.

First, it was said that the factor loco tutoris was not suggested by either party but named (as is often done) by the Court, because in the prospect of the various matters, in reference to the interests of the heir, to be considered by the factor, the selection of a professional person was desirable. And so it was;—but in order to have the unbiassed judgment of such a person. Now, to turn round on the Court and to urge (independently of anything being said by the Court at the time of the selection), You must have intended me to carry on law-suits (a very different matter from the consideration of the true interests of the pupil), is really absurd. If the factor, being, as I understand, suggested by the Court, undertook the office in the view of such agency, the reply is clear, — he should have stated that as a condition of acceptance. And would the Court have accepted that condition? In truth, the fact of selection by the Court strikes me in the very opposite light. Being asked by the Court to undertake the office, he was more especially bound to be guided by the strictest rules applicable to the office, and to abstain from agency.

The second specialty alleged involves just the same point. The judgment of a professional person was the ground of selection for the office; the agency was the object of the selection.

The third and fourth alleged specialties involve, in truth, the general point, and may be referred to, so far as correct in point of fact, in every case in which a law-agent is appointed factor, and law business occurs. But they deserve special notice for the same circumstances are often urged — I may say always — in support of exceptions to the individual case.

It is said that the accounts are strictly confined to proper legal business, and contain no charges for any business which belongs to the office of factor. Of course not; for that would be objected to as double payment. Now, that is exactly what will occur in every case of the kind; and on that account, if the factor is allowed to conduct legal business, which is over and above all the proper business of the factory, for which a certain commission is the proper, and only the proper, remuneration,—on that account it is that I cannot comprehend why he should not receive full commission, merely because he also has (legitimately, ex hypothesi) done some other business, which some one else must have done. That the charges as agents do not include any of the business and trouble belonging to the factory, and that which he gets his commission, seems to be an observation without point or pertinency to the question, whether it is allowable for the factor to conduct the business, and does not advance one step the argument in support of the claim; it does so.

Then it is farther urged that great expense is saved by not employing another agent but himself or his own firm. So far as any point occurs as to a "firm," that observation really can make no difference. If the factor does not personally conduct the business, but hands it over to a partner, then that partner must be constructed as much as a separate agent, and the factor will share in the profit with the alleged advantage to the estate. If it is said—which, however, cannot legitimately be said—that the partner may be, as it were, partner in the factory, and that is most objectionable. The factor, and he alone, ought, by the duty attached to his selection, to perform all the duties which give him knowledge of the material interests of his pupil or of the estate. And that point is the same in principle with the question decided many years ago from Glasgow (Bannantine, I think, was the name of the case), where it was held to be illegal for a trustee on a sequestrated estate to be in a private partnership, as to the performance of the duties of such trustee. Whether the profits of factories and similar employments are shared between partners, is a separate matter, which involves no point in which the estate is interested. But the duty and trust of the office must be performed by the person selected for that office. I lay aside then the point as to the factor being a partner of a "firm," which seems to me to be utterly immaterial. But I should wish to have it explained—for in none of these discussions has it been explained—what is the saving to the estate, and wherein it consists. It is not stated that the full amount of legal charges are not included in the agency accounts for law business. All is charged that could be charged, I understand, exactly as if another agent had been employed. At least it is not stated that there is any abatement or different rates charged.

No. 1.

Nov. 12, 1856.

There are some cases—such as this as to the pupil Reid's interests,—in which it may be said that the function of the agent could not well be discharged without full knowledge of the matters in which he was intrusted, and that another agent would have to examine and make himself acquainted with the facts. Let it be so; but that would be a very trifling charge if, as in this instance, the factor had done his duty as factor fully and faithfully, as we see that Mr Douglas did, and made himself well acquainted with all the circumstances on which he was to exercise his own judgment in considering whether lawsuits were expedient or necessary. And in proportion to the responsibility and trouble of that duty (here apparently an important duty for the factor to perform) ought to be the amount of the commission—which ought to include an ample consideration for the benefit to the pupil of the deliberate but unbiassed judgment of an experienced professional man in examining carefully the interests of the pupil in such matters as occurred here, and the prospects of success in instituting any actions at the instance of the pupil. I should say that is a case for a very high commission, and it was for the benefit of such judgment, I have no doubt, that the factor, in Reid's case, was selected as a cautious, prudent, and experienced professional person, trained up under admirable direction.

But after all, saving of some expense—if there was any in an exceptional case—is not to be put in the balance for a moment with the great importance of the general principle already stated—adherence to which is the true way to save expense, and study the real interests of the estate—viz., that if there must be expenditure in law business, or in other ways, he who is to sanction the expenditure, shall not have the profit that will be made in the course of such expenditure.

But really, after all, what was the business done in the cases before us? As stated as can occur, and in which the instruction and employment of a separate agent could here imply no extra expense: In the case of the factor loco tutoris, the business done was—1. In consulting Counsel; 2. In making application to the Court for authority to carry out a settlement which the factor, in that character, had to adjust; and, 3, In carrying out that settlement and making up titles; And in the case of the curator bonis, the law business was to obtain special powers to dispose of some land—of the propriety of doing which, the curator was to inform himself, make reports, and form his own judgment, and to put that in writing. Any stranger could then, at once, draw out the petition. Hence, in these cases before us, it is in vain to say that there was any advantage or saving in not employing a separate agent.

While noticing these facts, to show how easily such a representation is made, I do not dispose of the cases wholly on a general principle.

In a case where the work has been done, one listens more favourably to the representation here made. But that is a very false view on which to proceed.

What, I ask, is the necessity for allowing a factor, who happens to be a law agent, to do that which no other factor is allowed to do? The Court are now asked to sanction for law agents a departure from a most sacred and salutary principle.

What reason, then, is there for such a course? None has been stated. The

No. 1. question has principally been argued in favour of the work actually done. But
 Nov. 12, 1856. really, after the views stated in the House of Lords, and in this Court, the warning

As to outlay, I think the fees to counsel ought to be allowed. I think a factor, in such a case as that of Reid—indeed in any case—may himself consult counsel—and I have often seen it done. And though the statement for counsel ought not to be charged at the rates of agency fees, yet that should be fully taken into account in fixing the amount of the factor's commission. But other outlay is a very questionable matter indeed. A great part of such supposed outlay, say clerk's copying, &c., goes to support the general expenses of an agent's office. The whole charges for copyings are not paid over to that amount to clerks, but go to contribute to certain salaries, generally to clerks, and similar expenses, and from such charges the agent has thereby personal profit.

As to the case of the curator bonis, I apprehend that several of the largest items in the account fall within the proper duties of the office of curator, and in reference to which the commission should be fixed; such as making out his report to the Accountant of Court—communications as to the property with the sub-factor and the reporters. Except the fees to the accountant's office, I doubt whether any part of the account of Mackenzie and Fraser out of Court ought to enter any agent's account at all. But by putting it into the hands of an agent, an account of L.14, 8s. 2d. is made up, of which L.9, 9s. 6d. is admitted to be agent's profit. A large portion should have fallen within the trouble for which commission was adjusted. And one sees how easily numerous expenses may be run up, if the characters of factor and agent may be played off, and turned as easily as "the convertible coats" which are turned out and in with every appearance of sunshine or a shower. The account thus framed states,—The Accountant directed us to do so and so. No. The direction is necessarily to the curator, not to the agent.

However, the main object of this consultation is to lay down a general rule—as to which I trust there can be no doubt. If the Court say we will pass these accounts, but lay down a different rule as to the future, they must be prepared to pass all others in town and country for agency prior to this date.

I have adverted to the specialty urged by the factor loco tutoris to S. Reid, that he understood that he was selected in order to conduct the agency. If the First Division think that such a notion was in any way sanctioned by them by his selection, then his case is special, and no general question at all occurs. But as, with this point urged to them, the argument was ordered, I suppose such was not their understanding. If, however, it is, then on that most special ground, I would leave that case to the First Division, and would concur in sanctioning the agency on this occasion, if the Judges think that what passed gave the party ground to believe it was so intended.

It is quite plain that the accountant did not finally pass the first account in the factor's case. I concur with him in thinking that the accountant would not be precluded from revising a prior account (there being no exoneration), if objections afterwards occurred to him. And the Court cannot be precluded when they have pronounced no exoneration, but are asked to sanction such account.

LORD MURRAY.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk in these cases; but as he has stated very fully, both the authorities and the principles on which the general rule ought to be applied to factors loco tutoris and to curator bonis, it is unnecessary for me to add anything to his opinion.

LORD HANDYSIDE.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk, the grounds and reasons of which appear to me irresistible both on general principles and in their application to the particular cases before us. I had felt inclined to endeavour to find some foundation on which to support the allowance of the charges for agency in these cases, believing the understanding of law-agents appointed factors to have been, that their office did not disentitle them to charge for such business as is found here. But by the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Rennie v. Morrison, April 1849, factors were thereafter at least instructed, from the highest quarter, of the incompatibility of the office with their acting as law-agents in the business of the estate. The judgment in that case appears to have a direct bearing on the present cases, and to have promulgated a rule in accordance as I think, with sound principle, although in its first application it may have borne hard on the party who was then brought under it.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I am unable to perceive any satisfactory ground of distinction between the claim for professional agency by a judicial factor and a similar claim by a trustee. Even irrespective of the use of the words “their trust,” in the Act of Sederunt 15th February 1730, to which expression indeed I am not disposed to attach much weight, it appears to me that the office of judicial factor is eminently of a fiduciary character. The duties, the responsibilities, the relations, which are inherent in the office, are in all respects those of a trustee. The protection of the estate, its safe and economical management, and the independent and disinterested exercise of his own judgment in its administration, are intrusted to the factor by the Court; and the appointment of an officer of Court for the discharge of such duties implies the constitution of a trust.

It is true that the office of judicial factor is not gratuitous. But the remuneration which the factor receives is for the discharge of the proper duties of the office, and is by a “commission” to be fixed by the Accountant of Court. I do not think that either the Act of Sederunt of 1730, or the Pupils Protection Act, contemplates a charge, by a factor, for professional agency, in addition to his commission. If no charge whatever for trouble is contemplated in the case of a trustee, no charge beyond the commission is contemplated in the case of a judicial factor.

It is also true that the proceedings of the factor are subject to the review of the Accountant of Court. This circumstance might indeed mitigate the evils, or diminish the hazard, of allowing such charges; but it does not affect the question of principle. If the judicial factor is, in truth and substance, a trustee, whose unbiased and disinterested judgment in the administration of the estate is intended to be secured by his appointment, then the circumstance that his factorial administration is subject to review by the accountant, cannot affect the fiduciary character, nor the fiduciary responsibilities imposed on him. If he can act and charge as a professional agent in the management of the trust, then his judgment in engaging in law business cannot be said to be absolutely free from bias or self-interest. He may be—as I am satisfied the gentlemen who are now before the Court are—so conscientious and upright, as to be above the temptation to create expense. But, to the hazard of individual character, the law cannot leave the interest of pupils and others under incapacity. The protection of these interests is the province and the duty of the Court; and the matter must be disposed of on principle, and by the adoption and enforcement of a general rule.

If, therefore, there is no ground for distinguishing, in regard to agency, between a judicial factor and a trustee, it only remains to be considered whether a trustee, acting as agent, could make this claim for professional remuneration. On that point I agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk in opinion, that the claim should not be sustained. The point is settled; the decisions place it beyond doubt; and I think that the rule now recognised as to trustees is sound and salutary, as well as authoritative, and that it ought to be applied to the case of judicial factors.

The professional services rendered by the factors, in both the cases before us, appear to have been judiciously performed, and beneficial to the estate. I understand that their commission remains to be fixed, or is still open for adjustment; and I am inclined to suggest that, under all the circumstances, a more than usually liberal commission should, in these cases, be allowed, as there may have been some misapprehension on the subject, and as the estates have been put to no cost which could have been avoided, and have obtained from the factors the beneficial services which could not have been dispensed with, and which must otherwise have been remunerated.

I am therefore of opinion, on the whole matter, that the factors’ charges for professional agency ought not to be allowed, but that they are entitled to reimbursement of their outlay, and to such commission as may be fixed by the Accountant of Court sanctioned by the Court, as just and suitable under all the circumstances. I have not explained at any length the reasons which have led me to this conclusion, as I concur generally with the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORDS COWAN & MACKENZIE.—We are of opinion that the charges for agency contained in the accounts of the curators on these estates ought to be disallowed; and to that effect we concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk, and in his exposition of the principles which ought to be followed in the decision of this question.

Although it is unnecessary for us to add anything to the views stated by his Lordship, we think it right to observe that the decision in the House of Lords in the case of Rennie, although heard ex parte, is entitled to the greatest weight, because the general principles which, as we think, ought to rule this case, were there held to be applicable in circumstances precisely similar.

The nature of the question raised in the case of Rennie will be best understood from the report of the decision in this Court, Morison v. Rennie, 14th July 1847, and in the House of Lords, 29th April 1849. The curator bonis, Mr Morison, was a Solicitor of the supreme Court, and the question was, whether agency and other business done by him could be competently charged against the estate? the ground of objection being, that a curator was in this respect in the same situation with a trustee. The judgment of this Court was reversed; and it was declared that Mr Morison was not entitled to state against the estate any professional charges, or charges for loss of time, or other profits or emoluments, save and except his commission; but that he was entitled to all such charges and expenses actually paid by him out of pocket as should appear to have been properly incurred and paid, and not to be covered by his commission.

The Lord Chancellor, in moving the judgment of the House of Lords, stated, that the rule which ought to be acted on was, "that a party in a fiduciary character should not be allowed to charge anything in the way of profit;" and, apparently with special reference to the office of curator being remunerative, he added,—“Such a party cannot make his office one of profit beyond the profit which is incident to that office.” And Lord Campbell, in stating his concurrence in the judgment, put his opinion upon the same general grounds.

We think this decision proceeded on sound principles of law, and not on a specialty. It appears to us to have given authoritative sanction, as applicable to cases of this kind, to a general rule, which, in our opinion, is well founded, and ought not to be departed from on any of the special grounds which were urged in the argument.

LORD BENHOLME.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

I shall only add, that, like my brethren Lords Cowan and Mackenzie, I am inclined to place great reliance on the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Morison v. Rennie, 29th April 1849.

LORD NEAVES. — I consider it to be fixed as a general rule, that a trustee should not enter into no contract or arrangement by which he is to derive profit out of the trust-estate, except where this is either allowed by the trust-appointment, or authorised or sanctioned by the beneficiaries.

I am of opinion, however, that this principle cannot be applied to cases like the present, except under considerable modification. A curator bonis, or judicial factor, is so far a trustee, that he holds and acts for behoof of others. But, properly speaking, he is a manager,—the servant or officer of the Court, and the funds or estate under his charge may be said to be in manibus curiæ. The Court, as the supreme tribunal of the country, exercises a jurisdiction for protecting the interests of able or incapable persons who have no other protector, and in doing so, has long been in use to appoint a factor or curator to take the necessary management. As one of the only means of securing the services of proper persons, the Court has thought it its duty to allow a remuneration to the parties so appointed,—a condition unknown in ordinary trusts, but recommended by the plainest expediency in such cases in reference to the interests of those concerned.

A judicial factor, therefore, under which name I here include a curator bonis, is not in the situation of a mortis causa trustee, acting under the mandate of a deceased person who cannot be consulted or appealed to. The Court is his constituent, and the Court can deal with his actings in any way that they may think best for the behoof of the person or estate whose interest is involved; and the Court will order that he should be remunerated according to what may appear to be just and reasonable in the circumstances.

In this situation, I conceive, that while the factor cannot by his own act derive the benefit of any employment of a different nature on himself or on a copartner with which he is concerned, it is within the power of the Court, in reviewing his proceedings, to judge whether anything so done has been done beneficially, and whether it ought or ought not to be remunerated. The office not being grat but remunerative, I think the party holding it has a competent and reasonable claim to be paid for everything that he does, or assists in doing, in a manner beneficial to the estate. The remuneration of the factor is frequently by a commission on intromissions, but this may sometimes be insufficient and inappropriate. It is spoken of in the Act of Sederunt of 1730 as a salary, but it may and I think ought to vary from year to year, according to the trouble occasioned. I do not think it incompetent in any case where such a course is thought safe, to pay the factor specially by a quantum meruit on special work done.

No 1.

Nov. 12, 1856.
and Others.

Though it may sometimes be natural and advantageous, no favour is due to the position of factors employing themselves or their partnerships in conducting professional business for the factor, and I think that wherever there is any doubt of the work so done having been necessary or useful, no remuneration for it ought to be given. But, on the other hand, there may be cases where the matter is clear the other way, as where the factor or his firm act as agents in defending the estate against a serious and formidable action, and are successful in doing so, but cannot recover expenses from the other party; or where they consult counsel and effect an advantageous compromise or transaction as to some doubtful question. Even as to making up titles, while there may be cases to be regarded with great jealousy, I do not see that the same feeling is always necessary, as where an ordinary title is made up in the usual way for a necessary object. In all such cases, considering it to be within the power of the Court to remunerate the officer for whatever he does, I see no reason why a sufficient allowance should not be made to him for his whole trouble, including the professional part of it; or why the estate under his care should be saved from a fair charge which was otherwise inevitable. Nor do I think it of any importance whether the business charges are sustained specifically as such, or whether their amount is taken as a reasonable measure of the additional allowance thus to be given, provided always, 1st, that no allowance be made except for useful or proper services; 2d, that no allowance be made in a double form, for the same work or trouble; 3d, that the total allowance to the factor in every shape, shall not exceed a fair and reasonable remuneration for his total services.

The delicacy and difficulty which may attend such enquiries, may make it expedient for the Court to pass an Act of Sederunt, defining and fixing the duty of their officer in this respect, but until that be done, I see no legal incompetency in awarding to the factor the fair worth of his services; and I think it would be unreasonable to refuse to do so, wherever it can be safely done.

In the individual cases now before the Court, I see no ground for doubting that the business done by the curators was proper and beneficial; and I see neither any legal nor any equitable grounds for a fair remuneration being withheld.

I do not consider that the views now stated, are at variance with the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Robertson v. Morrison, 6 Bell's Appeals, p. 422. That case was decided ex parte, and the peculiarity of it was, that the curator, as alleged and assumed, had made specific charges for the very work for which his commission was payable; the Lord Chancellor observing, "Here is an office under which a party has charged five per cent. for the trouble belonging to the office of curator bonorum. He has, besides that, brought in a bill, in which he seems to charge for everything he has done, in addition to the five per cent. referable to his office. But if he is paid for every act he does, what is the five per cent. for?"

On the whole, I am of opinion, that, in these cases, a remit of new should be made to the Accountant of Court, to consider the trouble had, and professional work done, and to report what sum ought reasonably in each year to be allowed to the factor and curator respectively for their whole services of every kind.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In the case of Lord Gray, the opinions of the consulted Judges have all been given in, and they are nearly unanimous on the subject. They are of opinion that Mr Dundas, being in the position of a trustee, cannot be allowed to make any profit by the agency in connection with the trust-estate; and the principles on which that judgment rested are very forcibly put in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk, in which the other Judges consulted all concurred, with the exception of Lord Neaves. Lord Neaves appears to distinguish between the expenses incurred in obtaining the Act of Parliament, and the expenses

No. 1. incurred by the trustees in the proper character of trustees. I cannot see anything in this distinction on which I can rest any part of my judgment. I think the principle on which the other Judges proceeded is a sound one, and I see no reason to differ from them. It is suggested that the accounts should be audited again by the Auditor of Court, as he is the proper officer to separate the sums which are out of pocket from the other charges, although the account has been already audited by Mr Baillie, whose capacity for doing these things is unquestionable. As the other Judges have concurred in that view also, I think we must take that course ; and we must remit to the Auditor to separate that part of the account which consists of money paid out of pocket from the ordinary professional charges, allowing only that part which is paid out of pocket.

The next case is the case of Mr Douglas, who stands in the same position as Mr Mackenzie. We cannot deal with Mr Mackenzie's case in point of form, as his representatives are not here ; but, in regard to Mr Douglas, his case is not in all respects the same as that of Mr Dundas. It involves this distinction, that, holding his office under an appointment of Court, he discharges his duty, not as a trustee, but as a party entitled to remuneration. It appears that Mr Douglas has in that capacity performed all the duties of a factor loco tutoris, and also, over and above these, the duties of an agent. The Judges are nearly unanimous in the opinion that the principle extends and applies to that case also, and that Mr Douglas can receive no part of his account as law agent, which is not for money paid out of pocket. That opinion has been given by a majority of the Judges, and must, of course, rule this case. I must, however, confess, for myself, that I think in these opinions the same weight has not been given which I should be disposed to give to a principle which their Lordships do not seem to have much adverted to,—I mean the principle that a party who has not undertaken a gratuitous office in any sense at all, has here done certain services, the benefit of which accresces to the estate, and yet he is to receive no recompense for them. I confess I think that has been a little lost sight of. To what extent the principle should go—what amount of these services we should allow if we entered into an investigation of the kind, is a matter we need not go into, since a majority of the Judges have decided that it is not to be gone into. I think there is a good deal in the principle which should have been given effect to ; but it is only my individual opinion, and the opinion of a majority of the Judges is the other way. Therefore we can only allow costs out of pocket.

There is a minor point connected with this, as to which I am not sure that we have any very decided opinion,—that is, what constitutes costs out of pocket ? One part of a writer's business consists in paying clerks who copy certain papers. Now I see an opinion is given, in which a majority of the Judges concur, that where clerks are paid by a salary it is impossible to separate that from the fees and profit of the agent. But this is not the general rule. I should think, if the copying is actually paid for, it is the same as employing a law stationer. I would rather hear that matter reported on.

LORD IVORY. — The case being decided by the opinion of the majority of the consulted Judges, I was inclined to submit by simply expressing my concurrence in the opinion of the minority ; but, as it is thought right that we should all express our views in regard to an important matter in practice, and in reference to the precise principle on which the practice is to rest, I shall endeavour to throw out the ideas which have occurred to me, and which I have arrived at with great hesitation, in reference to the questions that are raised in this case.

I do not disagree, generally speaking, with the doctrine on which the opinion of the majority of the Judges rests ; and if the case is to be decided on mere authority, I am not very sure whether, since English authorities have been imported into our law on the matter, the opinion of the majority of the Judges could have been different from what it is, whatever their individual opinions may have been. But, when I look to the principle laid down in the different cases, I am at a loss to extract what that principle is, and how far it goes. I rather think there has been some looseness in the analysis of the different points of liability, and too much mixing up of characters entirely distinct, where the liability rests on principles altogether different.

There have been at various times various elements of principle laid down dealing with cases of this sort. In the first place, it has been said that the office of a trustee is one which implies the performance of the duty gratuitously. In the second place, that a trustee is not to make profit of his office, or place himself in a situation in which he could make a profit. In the third place, that there is a conflict between interest and duty, and that he is not to place himself in a position extraneous to the trust, which shall place him in conflict with his duty as trustee; and lastly, it is said that the right principle after all is, that a trustee is to be held as a party who stands in a situation where it is his primary duty to act as a check on his co-trustees, and to keep himself in such a situation as to be a check on everybody connected with the trust; and, therefore, that the duty of an agent is incompatible with the office of a trustee, inasmuch as the party holding both offices cannot be an impartial check on himself.

No. 1.

Nov. 12, 1856.
and Others.

Considering all these things, and looking to the varying aspects of the principle, I am afraid that even yet it has not come to any proper legal consistency, and that there is a good deal of looseness in regard to these matters both in England and here. I see that in the case of Broughton, Vice-Chancellor Stuart, while he yields to the authority of cases, strongly expresses himself to the effect that that case had introduced something of novelty in English practice,—so much so, that if the cases were to be opened up, he thinks a different conclusion might be come to.

The Lord Chancellor, in reviewing that judgment, does not go on that view, but reasserts the principle, and fortifies it with additional authority. Now, looking to the various elements thus introduced into the case, I do not think that the principle derived from the character of a trustee, in strictness, goes farther than this, that the person who is trustee shall not charge for that which he does qua trustee. He undertakes an office, which is by the law gratuitous; and if in the performance of the proper duties of a trustee he gives labour or skill, he is not to make a charge for that qua trustee. That will afford us very little assistance, however, when you come to engraft on the proper office of trustee the separate and proper office of agent, for it is the precise doctrine of all the cases, that what he does as agent is not done as trustee, but as something extraneous—a new function, which may be incompatible with the office of trustee, or which may not, but which certainly would not come within the category of non-liability, because he had undertaken to do the proper duties of the office of trustee gratuitously.

Then it is said that a trustee shall not make profit of his office, or take advantage of it, to place himself in a situation to make profit; that is to say, not to make profit at the expense of the estate. It is much the same thing as the principle in our law in regard to a tutor, that he cannot be auctor in rem suam. If, in the execution of his office of trustee, a gain results, that gain results not to himself, but to the estate. What is the proper meaning of making profit? The estate is entitled to the benefit of his gratuitous exertions, and he cannot keep any profit to himself.

But certainly we come nearer to the precision of principle, when we say that a trustee shall not place himself in a situation where his duty and interest may be brought in conflict,—that it is his duty to be a check on all others who deal with the trust, and to keep himself in a situation that he may call them to account,—that he is not to place himself in a situation which creates a direct or indirect incompatibility between himself and his co-trustees. And it is there that the principle is sound. But what is that? and how is it to be applied to his undertaking a separate office, for which he will be accountable? It is said that he shall not employ himself as agent, nor by his own act place himself in a position in which he shall be at once the party accountable, and the party accounted to. But that is a rule of practice rather than otherwise. It is an equitable interposition to protect the estate under his charge. It is not an absolute irregularity, nor a thing which makes it absolutely incompatible for him to discharge the duties of trustee. It is a rule founded on expediency, that having undertaken, in addition to the duties of trustee, the separate duties of the office of an agent, he shall not be allowed to make his charges against the estate in that character. Now, the principle there does not apply merely to the case of an agent or solicitor. There are cases in the books where the labour of an accountant has been objected to. But if there be anything at all in it, it must embrace the case of every man holding the office of trustee who does anything for the benefit of the estate at all. If he

No. 1. be a clothier, and gives his pupil a coat—or if he be a grocer or baker, and furnishes his pupil with bread and maintenance—or if the tutor does anything for the pupil in the way of his trade or calling, he shall have everything which can be resolved into elements of profit on his trade struck off his account under the above principle, because he has thereby placed himself in the situation of not sufficiently keeping himself pure. He is, in short, both debtor and creditor in the account.

Nov. 12, 1856.
and Others.

That being so, it is very necessary that we should see exactly how far that principle is to go. Is it to be made the ground—as it seems to be, according to the decision now to be pronounced—for an unbending absolute rule to be applied exactly in all cases, favourable and unfavourable, where the management has been beneficial, as well as where it has been prejudicial? Is the same procrustian rule to be applied in every case? I see no equity in that, nor common sense. There may be great expediency from the difficulty of getting at what is the sound sense and justice of the case in particular instances; but it seems to me to come under the expression, “applying the broad axe” to the thing which shall operate most prejudicially in some cases, although in others it may operate beneficially. I do not say that the rule is bad in itself, but only that, when it is made so absolute and unbending, it is capable of being made an engine of considerable injustice; and, therefore, while I would not give any countenance to a party putting himself in a situation in which he would destroy his impartiality, or his ability to fulfil with purity the duties of his office, still, when it can be shown that what he has done has been well done, and at half the expense any extraneous party would have required, and when it is admitted that his management has been in rem versam of the estate under his charge, I would have all the presumptions against him, and I would throw the onus of proving the beneficial management upon his shoulders; but when that is the admitted situation of matters, or where it is proved to be so, is it justice to say in such circumstances that the factor’s charges are not to be paid? There is no equity in that. It is only a way of getting rid of a difficult case; but, if we can get at a more equitable rule, it is right not to shut the door against it, and thus possibly to do injustice to other cases, and not to force on a pupil, who cannot speak for himself, a plea which his honour would shrink from, if he had been major, dealing in an accounting with this party. Therefore, it seems to me that there has been a straining of this principle till it has been reduced to a technical rule, which destroys all the elements of soundness in it. You obtain all that is desirable when you hold all the presumptions against the factor. But that being so, it is not equitable that you shall exclude him from the fair reward of his labour. It is a common saying that, if you demand equity on one side, you must give it on the other. Now, if the estate is saved by the acting of the trustee, is it equity that he should not get any compensation, when perhaps he has saved the estate at his own expense? If there be, confessedly, beneficial management, which has resulted from great labour and loss of time, shall you establish a rule which shall exclude proper compensation to the party who has not only acted most honourably but most liberally, in favour of his ward? But the rule, if it is to be laid down at all, must be carried that length. Where is it to stop? It is said that you may give costs out of pocket. Why? If the trustee has been vergens ad inopiam, or has been doing what the law cannot recognise to be right; if he has gone recklessly into a lawsuit which results in loss to the estate, why shall the estate bear the result of his acting, and not only his own costs out of pocket, but the costs of the adverse party? If a trustee places himself in a situation which is incompatible with doing his duty, then he is guilty of breach of trust, and is in the position of paying his expenses out of pocket. He must take the consequences of his own culpa.

Looking to the cases, they are open to very great observation. I do not yet see the footing on which they rest, especially the English authorities. Lord Cottenham says, in the case of Craddock, in speaking of the plea offered, that the party was one of several co-trustees, and he defended them in a suit—that he should not be allowed any part of his account at all, because, even if that were the rule, it would have a mischievous tendency; and the only effect of it would be, that a solicitor would appear for his co-trustees in another person’s name, and as not appearing for himself. In other words, the rule is such, that it can easily be evaded. Look to one of the cases before us. I am made judicial factor, and cannot do that business of the estate; but you, another agent, shall allow me to use your name, and in that way we shall play into each other's hands. I think that the rule will lead to greater danger than that we are avoiding. No honourable man would go into such a plot; but what is to prevent less scrupulous men doing so? No. 1.

Nov. 12, 1856.
and Others.

Then Lord Cranworth says in the case of Broughton: "The rule appears not to be generally understood, though it is better understood now than it was formerly, for one continually sees provisions introduced into wills and settlements enabling a solicitor acting as trustee to receive remuneration, just as if he had not been appointed trustee, and it is very often convenient to make this arrangement." Why is it very convenient? It is convenient on the assumption that a man placed in that situation cannot perform his duty. Is this not another evasion forced upon its plain meaning because the Courts have run riot in applying the principle?

In the case of Lincoln v. Windsor, Vice-Chancellor Turner says there is a marked difference between costs incurred in a suit and costs incurred in the administration of an estate without the intervention of the Court. Where a trustee is brought into Court in a suit, he is necessarily made a party, and allowed his costs. The rule does not seem applicable to such cases, but this does not extend to cases of administration out of Court. In Court you have costs, out of Court you have not, and there you are tossed from pillar to post, and I know not where the principle is to rest. But I draw this conclusion from it, with reference especially to that class of cases now before us, and, in particular, the case of Lord Gray, where the expenses are ordered to be paid by the Act of Parliament, that you are totally out of the case where a trustee could be tempted from the path of purity, or is endeavouring to bring grist to his own mill by prosecuting a particular course. There has been nothing done but benefit to the estate, and yet somebody must suffer for it. That is a proposition very difficult to maintain; and that the party getting the benefit of the act of the trustee shall have all the benefit of the act, and yet shall take it for nothing—I cannot conceive there is any equity or sound principle in that. It goes beyond the punishment that a party acting indirectly should suffer. The rule should be, that whatever is in rem versam or beneficial to the estate, and whatever the ward adopts as good for himself, he shall pay for—he shall not adopt the benefit, and refuse the expense. Here a party gets an Act of Parliament through the exertions of a factor, and on the footing that the factor's expenses should be paid. But when they come to be taxed, he says, "No, you shall only get costs out of pocket." I could understand that, if he said this was so ill done I will have nothing to do with it. Take back your Act of Parliament. But there must be something loose in what leads to a conclusion such as I have arrived at, and still more if it happens under an application in which the factor comes to the Court for special power to make up titles to the estate to meet exigencies, and not doing it on his own responsibility. I do not see any right in saying that the party in such a case shall be excluded from all remuneration. It is very true, it may be said that the factor gets his powers from the Court, but in no other way where he is a professional man than where he is not a professional man. There is a great deal in that. The two things are separate. There are many things that a curator, who is a professional man, may do, which does not fall within his duties as curator. His cautioner, for example, would not be answerable for the acts he performs in the extraneous office, and that is, perhaps, a very good element for testing the separation between the two characters. But, however marked the separation of the two characters, all that is excluded when you say that the office of a trustee is gratuitous, and that you are not to make a profit of it, because the profit is made not as trustee, but as agent. Therefore, the question comes to be, what is necessary to check abuse? But, if there is no abuse to check, why should the Court force it upon the party. Is it a penalty, or is it a punishment? If the latter, I can understand it where a solicitor is deprived of his office for entering into a pactum de quota litis. But where it is merely a rule of practice for the sake of expediency, in order to get out of a difficulty—a rule of office machinery—I am not for creating a machinery which shall equally act against everybody favourably and unfavourably, whether there is abuse or whether there is none; or whether the abuse be large or small.

Applying this principle to the case in hand, I can draw no great distinction

No. 1. between the one and the other—between the office of gratuitous trustee or the office of a judicial factor. The distinction rests not on principle, but on degree. There is the same temptation to walk aside from the fair function of the office of trust but in the office of curatory there are two conditional elements of great importance. In the first place, the office of judicial factor is not a gratuitous office, and, therefore, that element does not apply to it. It is to be paid for, and by commission and I make that remark in order to suggest a remedy. There is a remark by Lord Cranworth of some importance, that it is not to be paid for beyond that which is incident to the office—that is to say, you are to make the separation, and confine yourself to the proper functions of the trust. Now, it has been proposed in some of the opinions, that as one factor does a great deal more duty than another factor would do, if he is not to be paid either by his account or upon the principle de iure rem verso, he should at all events have a larger commission. I should be very willing to agree to that, but I do not see how it is to be got at, for the commission is one thing, and the duties of the agent another, and these latter are not part of the statutory functions under the Act of Sederunt, or the Pupils Act, or the private Act of Lord Gray; and, therefore, I think we should be rather getting quit by a side wind of a principle which cannot be got rid of in any other way if we were to pay him in the shape of a commission for what he has lost in legitimate course. I am for paying him in the direct way. If he is entitled to recompense for what he does, give it him, but do not indirectly recompense him for what he is not legitimately entitled to do.

Nov. 12, 1856.
and Others.

Upon the whole, therefore, if the case had been open, I should have been for giving expenses to all of those parties, in so far as they could shew, or it was not disputed, that their functions had been performed for the benefit of the estate. I should presume against the party holding the office so far, that I would throw upon him the onus of proving that his duties had been beneficial to the estate; but if he could do so, then I should not deprive him of the benefit due to his labours.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—In the first case of Lord Gray, the question is, whether or not the business accounts of a trustee acting as agent to the trust are to be allowed? The objection is founded on the principles that such a trust is a gratuitous office, and that it would be dangerous to allow a trustee to employ himself as his agent, as the interests of a principal and agent in such cases are adverse to each other in some respects. These are salutary principles, and must be allowed full operation in so far as they do not create injustice. But they may come in collision with another principle, nemo locupletandus est detrimento alterius, and injustice would often be done by a beneficiary getting gratuitously from the trustee professional service, which he would have been bound to pay for, if it had been done by any other person. And if the question had been open for our consideration, I should have entered on it with the view of resolving it in a manner which would give due effect to all these principles. The principle to which I have last adverted should have been allowed to modify the operation of the others. But after giving full attention to the judgments pronounced, not in England only, but I should not have held myself much bound by them, but in this Court and the House of Lords sitting on Scotch cases, I think that the question is no longer open, and therefore I feel myself compelled, whatever views speculatively I may have, to assent to your Lordship's view,—that we cannot sustain the account except to the extent of money paid out of pocket.

The other class of cases relates to judicial factors appointed by this Court. These are not exactly in the same predicament, and the rules upon which the other case is founded are not altogether applicable to them. Judicial factors are appointed by this Court. They are officers of this Court, subject to its control, and directly responsible to it. In this respect their position is different from that of a trustee under a marriage-contract or testamentary settlement, or tutors or curators. The Court is their constituent. They cannot retain any part of the curatorial funds for any purpose whatever without the authority of the Court, nor apply any part of the funds in remuneration of their own services, without obtaining that authority. Further, they are not gratuitous functionaries, but are appointed on the footing that they are to be fairly remunerated for their office. Thus they are more like trustees appointed to manage a sequestrated estate, or a trust created voluntarily for behoof of creditors. The Act of Sederunt of 1730 assumes that they are he remunerated, for it says that they are to lose a half year's salary in the event of negligence. So also the Pupils Protection Act recognises their right to commission, according to "what is just in each particular case;" and accordingly, in practice they have always been remunerated by being allowed a commission. I do not care what is the name of that remuneration. The principle of the appointment is that they are not gratuitous officers, but to be fully and amply remunerated for what they do. They are to be paid on the principle quantum meruit. There is no fixed rate, and in practice it varies. I have seen the commission as low as one-half or one-fourth per cent, but in general it is five per cent, or even more. But remuneration is the condition of the factor's appointment, and therefore he is not in the predicament of a trustee under a mortis causa settlement.

If a demand were made by a judicial factor, not as in the present case, for the payment of a business account, on the footing that he stands to his constituent in the relation of client and agent—but that the Court, in fixing his commission, should inquire how far the estate had been benefitted by his professional labours, and fix his remuneration on the principle of quantum meruit, and of allowing it to be commensurate with the benefit derived by the estate from his services—I would hold myself, even under the decisions as they stand, quite open to consider that question. I do not think it is foreclosed by any decision. But even a judicial factor is not entitled just to say, I was the agent, I employed myself to do this business, and I must be paid without inquiry, whether or not it was injudicious to perform it.

I think that the decisions would bar a claim made on that footing. Yet if made on the footing which I have stated, I think it may be fairly maintained that it is open for the Court to go into such an inquiry; and, so far as the estate may be benefitted, to fix the remuneration of the trustee for his professional trouble. On that footing the estate would not be liable to those risks which the Courts in England and Scotland have contemplated might arise from a trustee being placed in the position of being both client and agent. For there is this check, that the Court is the constituent of the trustee, and he cannot get payment until he satisfies the Court that what he demands is well founded, and in rem versam of the estate. I cannot see why such a claim can be refused, upon the principle that the factor may be acting improperly, or contrary to his duty; because, if that were the case, he would not be entitled even to his outlays. But as he is held to be legally entitled to his outlays in his actings as agent for the benefit of the estate, such acting is not held to be illegal on his part. And therefore I do not see why his own services, as well as his own disbursements, should not fall under the operation of the principle, that he is to be remunerated for what he does beneficially for the estate.

There is no decision adverse to the principle which I hold myself open to consider when the case shall be presented to us. But on the footing on which the accounts are here presented to us, I cannot sustain them. I concur with the conclusion to which your Lordship has arrived; but I make these remarks in order to save myself when the question of remuneration in the shape of commission shall be presented to us.

LORD DEAS being a party (as administrator for his children) to the case of Douglas, did not judge in any of the cases, which were heard together.

D. F. Inglis.—There has been here considerable expense incurred for printing for the purpose of settling a general principle, and it would be a hard thing that the agent who loses his account should also lose the expense of the discussion. We only wish our actual outlay.

LORD PRESIDENT.—No doubt this case was taken to settle other cases; but should the estate bear that? I think that expenses must follow the usual rule.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutors:—

Bankruptcy—Sale—Evidence—Hypothec—Mora.—The trustee on a bankrupt estate, in accordance with a resolution of the creditors, agreed to sell, to a third party, furniture belonging to the bankrupt, at a valuation price; and with consent of two of the commissioners, he executed an assignation. The purchaser paid part of the price, but did not receive delivery of the assignation. In the interim the trustee was removed, but retained possession of the assignation, and having thereafter obtained payment from the purchaser of the balance of the price, he delivered the assignation. The purchaser allowed the bankrupt to remain in possession of the furniture. The new trustee repudiated the sale,—Held, reversing the judgment of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, (1), that the purchaser having paid the price in bona fide, the assignation, although not delivered till after the trustee was removed, was good evidence of the contract of sale, and having been allowed by the creditors to remain in the hands of the ex-trustee, it made him creditor of the purchaser, and therefore that the sale was completed, and the new trustee could not repudiate it; (2), that the purchaser was entitled to retain from the price sufficient to clear the furniture of the landlord's hypothec for rent, for which the furniture was liable.

WILLIAM DODDS, trustee on the sequestrated estate of Gibb and Company, in Glasgow, sold Gibb's furniture to John Mitchell for the cumulo price of L.61, conform to assignation by Dodds as trustee, with consent of two of the commissioners on the sequestrated estate. Dodds was afterwards removed from the office of trustee, and John W. Major was appointed in his stead. The new trustee, Major, repudiated the sale, and gave instructions for again selling the effects by public roup. Mitchell thereupon presented a petition to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire for interdict against the proposed proceedings. He produced the assignation, which was dated 15th and 16th June 1855, and also a receipt for the Martinmas rent of the house occupied by the bankrupt, and for which the furniture was liable, he having allowed the bankrupt the use of the furniture.

Major, the new trustee, denied that there was any bona fide sale of the furniture, and averred that the price stated by Mitchell was never paid to the former trustee Dodds, or at least was paid after Dodds had been removed from the office, or when Mitchell knew that a meeting had been called for the purpose of removing him.

The Sheriff allowed a proof. It appeared that L.61 was the valuation price agreed upon between Dodds, the former trustee, and the purchaser Mitchell, but that before Mitchell had made any payment, the creditors of the bankrupt called a meeting upon the usual Gazette notice for the removal of Dodds from his office, and that a meeting was held on 2d July, at which the creditors did remove the trustee, and in which removal he acquiesced. Mitchell, the purchaser, deponed, that on the day after the valuation, or very soon thereafter, he met Dodds by appointment, and gave him a letter, saying that he would take the furniture, and become bound for the money. That he then considered the furniture was his—that he first paid a sum of L.20 to account, after which he got delivery of the assignation, and then a few days afterwards, a sum of L.28, being the balance of the price, except L.13, which he retained, in order to pay the rent. That the first notice he saw as to Dodd's removal was in the "Trades' Protection Circular," which he received on 13th July—that he had heard nothing of the matter previously, and that it was not before, but after he had made the second payment to Dodds, that he saw that notice.

The Sheriff-substitute (Steele) pronounced an interlocutor, containing various findings in fact, inter alia, that the defender threatened to sell the household furniture de plano, without offering the pursuer any relief or indemnification whatever: And finding, in point of law, "that the original agreement was not legally deliverable, except unico contextu with payment of the price to a party legally qualified and authorised to receive the same: That, notwithstanding the pursuer's bona fides in the transactions, he was bound to see that he did at the time, and from time to time, transact with a party legally so qualified, the more especially as the creditors appear to have prosecuted, with all due diligence, the measures for the removal of the trustee and the election of his successor, and not to have been aware of the late trustee's intention to uplift the money from the pursuer: Finds, for that reason, and also because the pursuer never attained the natural possession of the furniture, that he is not entitled in law to vindicate his alleged title to possess under the assignment obtained by him a non habente potestatem, to the effect of either absolutely preventing the present trustee from now taking possession thereof, or even of requiring him, before taking such possession, to refund the two payments made to his predecessor after he was deprived of his office: Finds, however, in regard to the rent paid by the pursuer, after the present defender had been appointed, and the demand for which formed a serius upon the furniture available against all concerned, that the defender ought, in any view, to have offered to indemnify the pursuer against that payment, which was evidently in rem versam of the bankrupt estate: Therefore, to that extent, and until the defender shall repay to the pursuer the foresaid sum of L.13, and interest, interdicts, prohibits, and discharges, in terms of the prayer of the petition, and, quoad ultra, assoilzies the defender from the conclusions for interdict: Finds the defender liable in expenses, in respect of his having refused all indemnification, but subject to modification in respect of the pursuer's having failed upon certain of the main conclusions of his action; allows an account," &c.

On appeal the Sheriff-principal adhered, "with this variation, that the expenses found due to the pursuer are hereby modified to one-half of the costs incurred by him."

Both parties advocated.

For Mitchell it was pleaded;—That there was no plea that he was not in possession of the furniture, nor statement of fact to that effect. The interlocutor of the Sheriff, therefore, did not go far enough. Judgment ought to be pronounced in terms of the original petition, with expenses.

For Major, the trustee, it was pleaded;—That the interlocutor of the Sheriff went too far. There had been no mora on the part of the creditors in appointing a new trustee, and on the facts as narrated in the interlocutor Mitchell v. Major.

LORD IVORY.—It is not necessary to hear farther. This is a question between seller and purchaser. There is here no competition for the real right of property. The question is one where a completed contract of sale raises all the rights in the parties which are necessary to solve the question. A meeting of creditors authorised this sale at a valuation, under the authority of the then trustee Dodds. There is an assignation executed on the 15th and 16th June with consent of the commissioners carrying out the sale previously entered into. It is true the assignation was not then delivered. But it is evidence of the contract of sale, and of the right of the purchaser to have delivery on his payment of the price. The question comes to be, whether the price has been paid. Now, if there had been no change of trustee, it is perfectly clear that the receipt given by Dodds would have been a good one, and delivery of the assignation would have compensated for the want of the price. Dodds was removed, but it is clear that there is soundness in the finding of fact, that the payment made by Mitchell to Dodds was in perfect good faith. No doubt at that time there had been an advertisement calling for the removal of Dodds, the trustee, and there was an actual removal of the trustee by the creditors before the payment of the price, and, if known to Mitchell, that would have put him in mala fide to pay to Dodds. But why did the creditors allow this document to remain in his hands, if they did not intend that it should remain with him? Mitchell is without blame. But the creditors cannot be said to be free from blame, for they left in the hands of Dodds, who was no longer trustee, a document which made him creditor of Mitchell, and they must take the consequence.

There only remains the matter of L.13, retained by Mitchell for the rent. Now, it appears from the date of the assignation, that the bankrupt had remained in possession of the house, and that the furniture had been in it subsequent to the term of Whitsunday. Liability to the landlord was therefore incurred, and attached to the furniture in the shape of hypothec. No purchaser would have paid the price before getting quit of the landlord's claim. That seems to me to be the whole case. It is needless to go into the question, whether there was delivery to one party or another. The obligation is sufficient, and the creditors must bear the loss of their own negligence. Therefore, I think we should advocate the cause in both advocations, and pronounce judgment in favour of Mitchell, with full expenses.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I entirely concur. I would only remark, that I think this assignation is an article of legal evidence. It certainly would have been competent evidence if it had been delivered. The objection taken is, that although dated 15th June, it was not delivered. But I think it was effectual without delivery; for this reason, that it appears from the evidence that there had been a previous contract of sale, and the seller was bound to deliver the assignation in implement of that contract; and one of the cases stated in Erskine, in which a deed is effectual without delivery, is that where the granter is under an anterior obligation to grant it. Therefore, I hold that it is an important part of the evidence in the case. And there being a contract of sale, the seller is not entitled to lay hands on the articles and sell them a second time, even if the price had not been paid. His right in that case would be only a right of retention. He cannot sell without judicial authority. So that, although no part of the price had been paid here, I would have been of opinion that the interdict should be granted.

LORD DEAS.—This is a somewhat suspicious transaction. But suspicion is not proof. The creditors allege that Mitchell knew the meeting was called for Dodds' removal, before he paid any part of the price. But they lead no proof, except by adducing Mitchell himself, who denies all such knowledge. I take the transaction, therefore, as a bona fide one; and the whole question then comes to be, which party was most to blame for the payment being made to the wrong person? I think the creditors were most to blame. They had authorised the trustee, Dodds, and the commissioners, to sell by private bargain, and the commissioners, as representing the creditors, sign the assignation and entrust it to Dodds; thus giving him the power to deliver the assignation, and get payment of the price, which he did. The creditors empower the commissioners to act for them, and for any rashness on the part of the Commissioners, whereby Mitchell, the purchaser, was misled, the creditors must be responsible. Actual delivery of the furniture by getting it into his own possession, might have been material or conclusive for Dodds; but it does not follow that his jus ad rem is not sufficient without such delivery in a question with the creditors, the sellers, acting through those they had empowered to represent them.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—" Having heard counsel for the parties in this advocacy, and in the counter advocacy Major v. Mitchell, conjoins the said two advocations, advocate the cause, and recall the interlocutor submitted to review: Find it proved, in point of fact, 1st, That early in June 1855, there was a concluded agreement between John Mitchell in the Court below, and William Dodds, the trustee on the sequestrated estates of T. B. Gibb and Company, and as having full authority to that effect from the creditors and commissioners for the purchase and sale of the household furniture belonging to and then in the possession of William Gibb, one of the bankrupts, at the price of L.61, 18s. 6d., which agreement was subsequently embodied and set forth in a deed of assignation executed by the said William Dodds, as trustee foresaid, and by the said commissioners, of dates the 15th and 16th June: 2d, That under and in respect of this agreement, two payments to account of the price were made by the said John Mitchell to the said William Dodds, viz., one of L.20 on the 5th July 1855, and the other of L.28 a few days thereafter; that a third sum of L.13, which was at first retained by the said John Mitchell in respect of the half year's rent due for the bankrupt's house for the Martinmas following, and for which the said furniture stood subject to the landlord's hypothec, was afterwards (7th December 1855) paid by the said John Mitchell to the landlord, in satisfaction and extinction of the said half year's rent: 3d, That although, at the respective dates of the said two payments to William Dodds, it now appears that the said William Dodds had been removed by the creditors from his office of trustee, yet no notice or interpretation to that effect was either at or prior to said payments made by the creditors to the said John Mitchell; and, on the contrary, the said William Dodds was still ostensibly accredited as trustee in the matter of the said sale, having been left by the creditors in possession of the documents connected with the sale, and especially of the foresaid deed of assignation executed by authority of the creditors, and with concurrence of the commissioners, in favour of the said John Mitchell; and the said assignation was accordingly, upon occasion of the foresaid second payment, delivered by the said William Dodds, still holding the ostensible character of trustee, to the said John Mitchell, as in implement and execution of the sale: 4th, That the payments of L.20 and L.28 made to the said William Dodds by the said John Mitchell as aforesaid, were made by the said John Mitchell in the bona fide belief that the said William Dodds did still actually hold the office of trustee, and as such was entitled to represent and act for the creditors, and that the said John Mitchell was in utter ignorance either that the said William Dodds had been removed from his said office, or even that any steps had been taken by the creditors with that view: Find, in these circumstances, in point of law, that in respect of the bona fides of the said John Mitchell, induced as it was by the proceedings of the creditors themselves, the two payments made by him to the said William Dodds, are to be held as having been made to one duly entitled to represent the creditors and the bankrupt estate, and consequently are, in this question, to be imputed pro tanto in satisfaction and extinction of the price of the furniture; that as to the remaining L.13 (being within a few shillings of the balance of said price), the said John Mitchell was entitled at first to retain the same in security and relief as against the landlord's claims, and afterwards to pay the same to the landlord in satisfaction of his hypothec, and in discharge of the rent, for which the creditors would otherwise have been liable; and generally, that in the whole circumstances, the creditors and their new trustee, the advocator, John William Major (respondent in the Court below), were not entitled to dispose, by a second sale or otherwise, of the household furniture in dispute, and that the said John Mitchell was entitled to seek protection by interdict against any such threatened or attempted proceeding: Therefore, interdict, prohibit, and discharge, as craved, and decern: Find the said John Mitchell entitled to expenses of process, both in this Court and in the Court below: Allows an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same, when lodged, to the Auditor of Court to tax and report."

THE pursuers, as trustees of a friendly society or lodge in Greenock, raised an action of declaratory adjudication against John Kerr, residing in Linkinvalley Mills, Birmingham county, Pennsylvania, in the United States of America, eldest son and heir of the deceased John Kerr, merchant in Greenock, and the Officers of State for Her Majesty's interest, as ultima hæres of former office-bearers of the society, the object of the action being to complete a title in the persons of the pursuers to certain heritable property in Greenock, the title to which had been taken to the deceased John Kerr, and the other office-bearers named, for behoof of the society. The pursuers obtained decree in terms of the conclusions of their action, which decree they extracted.

The extract bore, adopting the words of the partibus, that decree was pronounced against John Kerr, residing at Linkinvalley Mills, Birmingham county, Pennsylvania, in the United States of America, and Her Majesty's Officers of State for Scotland, as representing Her Majesty as ultima hæres of Josiah Ritchie, shoemaker, Greenock, and Archibald Munn, cooper there, wardens, and John Graham, coppersmith there, treasurer of the said lodge Greenock Mountstewart Kilwinning, all now deceased, defenders. And the extract also bore that the heritable right to the subjects in question, "which stood in the persons of the said deceased John Kerr, Josiah Ritchie," &c. now pertains and belongs to the pursuers.

The extract did not in this way shew the connection of John Kerr, defender, with John Kerr, deceased, his father, master of the lodge, though it was only in the character of his father's heir that he was called as party; and the father was, in the extract, styled "the said deceased John Kerr," without being previously there named.

The pursuers now presented this petition, stating that as purchasers or others dealing with the pursuers might object to the extract on the ground mentioned, they considered it advisable to obtain authority to amend the partibus and roll, and to the extractor of Court, and deputy-keeper of the records, to amend the extract and the record to the effect of adding after the words "John Kerr, residing at Linkinvalley Mills, Birmingham county, Pennsylvania, United States of America," the following words, "eldest son and heir of the deceased John Kerr, merchant in Greenock, master of the said lodge, Greenock Mountstewart Kilwinning;" and they referred as authority for this application to cases cited, 2 Shand's Practice, p. 1017, ^{sect. 5.}

On the report of the Lord Ordinary, the Court appointed the extractor to report on the matter involved in the petition.

The extractor reported as follows: — "In 1788 the friendly society or lodge of free masons, mentioned in the petition, acquired some real property in Greenock, and took the conveyance thereto in the names of John Kerr, merchant in Greenock, then master, and of certain others, being the wardens and treasurer for the time being of the society, 'for behoof of themselves and their successors in office.' Infestment immediately followed in favour of these parties, and the title was afterwards confirmed by the superiors. The property has ever since been possessed and enjoyed by the society.

The whole of the office-bearers mentioned in the disposition of 1788 having died without executing a special conveyance to 'their successors in office,' the petitioners, with the view of completing a feudal title to the subjects, and following the course adopted 'in all cases of the like nature' (Dalziel, 11th March 1756), raised, in January 1850, a summons of declaratory adjudication, calling 'as parties to this action,'—1st, The heir of line of John Kerr, the master; and 2dly, Her Majesty's Officers of State, for Her Majesty's interest, as ultima hæres of the wardens and treasurer of 1788. This form of summons, requiring no preliminary charges to enter heir, contains, of course, no personal conclusions against parties so called. They are cited, as in the case of Renunciation to be heir, merely as nominal defenders. The property is not to be adjudged from them, but 'adjudged, decerned, and declared to pertain and belong to the pursuers.'

Defences having been lodged by a party, compeerer, who alleged, that as a member of the society, his name ought to have been conjoined with those of the pursuers, a supplementary summons was raised in June 1850, and conjoined with the previous action, to have it found and declared that the pursuers were the sole and only members of the society. The defence was ultimately repelled, with expenses, and decree pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the conjoined actions.

"In the course of the narratives of both summonses, which are in the old form, and therefore do not contain the names and designations of pursuers and defenders in gremio, as now required (13 & 14 Vict., c. 36), the heir of John Kerr of 1788 is described as 'John Kerr, residing at Linkinvalley Mills, Birmingham county, Pennsylvania, in the United States of America, eldest son and heir of the said deceased John Kerr.'

"The messenger's executions on both summonses bear that he cited 'John Kerr, residing' (&c., as above), 'son and heir of the deceased John Kerr, merchant in Greenock,' and that he had served copies of the summonses upon him in these terms.

"It also appears from the printed record of Edictal Citations, of 16th January and 14th June 1850, that he was cited by the same designation and character of 'son and heir.'

"It is an old established rule that a partibus or roll, where one is necessary, shall contain the 'names and designations' of all the defenders—A. S., 10th December 1687; (Watson's New Form of Process, 2d Edition, pp.

 M'Kellar.

53—4; Beveridge, p. 245; and A. S., 11th July 1828, sect. 27.) It is from the principal partibus or roll, thus prepared and lodged in process, and authenticated by the clerk's office mark, that every decree against defenders is entered in the minute-book of Court. And, in like manner, it is to it that the extractor must look when preparing an extract of the decree. Neither the extractor nor the clerks of Court are entitled to make, or permit any alteration or correction whatever to be made, on a partibus or roll after the cause has been called, and more especially after decree has been pronounced. —(Shand's Practice, p. 268, and cases there referred to.)

“Where the name of a defender happens, by some oversight, to be omitted in preparing the roll, and the omission is discovered before extract, the cause is called de novo on a separate partibus as against that defender, and a new decerniture is taken against him, and put up in the minute-book. Slight changes or additions are also sometimes made in framing a partibus before the cause is called; as, where a defender may have changed his residence between the date of raising and executing the action and the date of calling in Court, thus:—‘Against A. B., formerly residing in Edinburgh, now in Glasgow.’ There are frequent instances of summonses being raised and executed against two or more defenders, conjunctly and severally, but which, when brought into Court, are purposely called against, perhaps, only one, without being accompanied by a minute of restriction. In those cases, when decree is pronounced ‘in terms of the conclusions of the libel,’ extract goes out against one only, as if he had been the only defender cited; and the proceedings are thereupon sent to the record as in an exhausted cause. There are many other specialties in connection with a partibus or roll, all tending to shew its binding and important character when decree is pronounced, and extract is required. As another instance, besides those mentioned, it is not unusual for practitioners, when preparing the roll of defenders, and notes for the printed calling list (where the names and designations of defenders, as given in the summons, appear to be unnecessarily long and minute), to abridge these, but so as to make no material difference, or leave any room for doubt or question, that the party called to enter appearance is the party described in the summons, and who has been cited by the messenger.

“The several rolls prepared in these conjoined actions give the name and designation of John Ker, junior, as contained in the summonses, viz. :—‘John Ker, residing at Linkinvalley Mills, Birmingham county, Pennsylvania, United States of America.’ The link of relationship, or his character of son and heir of John Kerr, the master of the mason lodge, does not seem to have been considered necessary. At all events, it is omitted (as is sometimes done in other cases) in the roll; and of course his character of son and heir could not appear in the printed minute-book, nor in what is called the instance and against in the commencement of the extract, as descriptive of pursuer and defenders.

“It was not for the extractor, even if he had noticed the abridgment, to presume to give any opinion on the subject, or to say whether he thought this omission important or unimportant. All he could do in the discharge of his ministerial duty was to have recourse to the rolls as his sole and only guide; and in reading these rolls as they stand, with the name and residence of John Kerr Junior so fully expressed, it would have been difficult for him to have said that there was not apparently a full ‘name and designation,’ as required by the acts of sederunt, sufficiently identifying John Kerr. Had there been a palpable error in the roll, the extractor might, and probably would, have pointed it out to the agent for his consideration. But he considers himself in no way responsible for an erroneous partibus or roll in any case. Before it reaches him it has passed through the Court unobjected to, and he can neither alter, abridge, nor amplify it, nor allow it to be interfere with. He is humbly of opinion, therefore, that the extract in this case could not have been prepared in any other terms than those in which it was issued, without a very serious and dangerous deviation from the known and only safe course of practice.

“With regard to the statements contained in the petition, the reporter has examined and compared these with the proceedings in the conjoined actions, and finds them to be accurately stated. And, in conclusion, he has humbly and respectfully to state, that if the Court shall be of opinion, 1st, that the character of relationship of John Kerr to the Master of the Mason Lodge in 1788 ought to have appeared in the extract, in order to enable the petitioners to obtain charters of adjudication from the superiors, and complete a good and valid feudal title; and 2d, that there are precedents of a similar nature, or circumstances in this particular case sufficient to induce their Lordships to grant the prayer of the petition, there can be no difficulty in complying with the authority as craved.”

THE COURT, on 19th July, pronounced the following interlocutor:—

“Having resumed consideration of this petition, with the report of the extractor, Find it unnecessary to amend the partibus, and quoad ultra grant the prayer of the petition, and decern.”

Procur—Diligence—When it may be competently granted.—In an action on a bill the general defence was, that in the circumstances the bill could not be taken as conclusive of the sum claimed. The record was closed, and put to the debate roll to consider the mode of proof; and a general diligence was, before debate, then craved by the defenders for the recovery of various documents, many of them not the writ of the pursuer;—Held (altering judgment of Lord Ordinary), that before hearing parties such a diligence ought not to be granted; without prejudice, however, to a diligence to recover writ of the pursuer, to instruct his non-onerosity as holder of the bill, or to a more general diligence, if, after hearing parties, the Lord Ordinary should see cause to grant it.

PATERSON, a writer in Dumbarton, brought this action against Mrs Baxter and her husband for payment of a bill for L.190, payable one day after date, and alleged to have been granted by Mrs Baxter before her marriage. The defenders denied that Mrs Baxter was due the pursuer so large a sum; and they explained that she had signed a blank bill stamp for the purpose of raising a previous bill of smaller amount granted by her for certain advances made on her behoof by the pursuer.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Ardmillan.
C.

On 24th June 1856, the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor closing the record, and appointing parties to debate. Thereafter the defenders moved for a diligence to recover the books of the late Mr John Paterson (the pursuer's father) and of William Paterson, the pursuer, and all letters addressed by them to the defenders, all bills and vouchers for sums paid by them on behalf of the defenders, and the disposition and deed of settlement of the late Mr John Paterson, with the states of his affairs relating in any manner to sums due to him by the defenders, and the inventory and confirmation of his estate, and the relative lists of debts due to him.

On 25th June the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor, “under reservation of all the pleas of the parties, granting diligence against havers for the recovery of the documents contained in the specification.”

Against this interlocutor the pursuer reclaimed, and pleaded;—That the defence amounted to a plea of non-onerosity, and therefore the presumption of course should only be overcome by the writ or oath of the pursuer.

No. 5.

 Paterson v.
 Baxter.

The mode of proof was therefore limited; but the specification of writs here called for by the defenders included many writs not the writ of the pursuer, and which it was therefore incompetent to call for. Farther, a diligence to recover writs was incompetent at this stage of the process. The record was closed, and the case put to the debate roll for the purpose of considering the mode of proof; but until that was determined, it was premature to grant diligence against havers.

The defenders pleaded;—That it must be shown that this diligence was incompetent at any stage, otherwise it was now competent. It not unfrequently happened, that when after a long delay a case came out for debate there was farther delay by a diligence, then for the first time asked, which might have been asked, and would have been granted at an earlier stage. Some of the documents were unquestionably the writ of the pursuer. The others had a material bearing on the case, and should it come to be determined by the pursuer's oath, might competently be shown to him in order to refresh his memory. He had therefore no interest to object.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This diligence, being asked for after closing the record, in a much more favourable position than if asked before closing the record. Again it is asked in a case belonging to a particular class, where the proof is of a limited kind. This is an action on a bill, and the pleas of the pursuer are founded on his privilege as holder of the bill. The first defence is, "In the circumstances stated, the bill cannot be taken as conclusive in support of the sum now claimed;" and then follow a number of defences which proceed on that assumption. It is in that state of matters that the defenders ask for diligence to recover various documents, some of them said to be the writ of the pursuer.

It appears to me that this is not the stage at which this diligence can be granted. The first thing to be considered is, what is the mode of proof applicable to the case. If the party was to ask for diligence to recover the writs of the pursuer, to instruct the non-onerosity of the bill, that would be a different thing. But that was not asked, and therefore the course which I would suggest to your Lordships to recall in hoc statu the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; but, at the same time, to prevent him, before answer, granting such diligence as I have referred to.

LORD IVORY.—I am disposed to accede to that course, as perhaps most in consistency with strict pleading. But I must say that I am not satisfied with a party who stands on his privilege so abstractly as here. There seems to be enough in his own explanation to go into a question of accounting. He himself also calls for production of this bill, and, if both parties wish it to be produced, it is awkward to refuse a diligence to that effect. But all that is open. I think that the error of the Lord Ordinary is in granting this diligence, as of right, to the party demanding it, before hearing parties on the pleas of the case; but if that interlocutor is recalled in hoc statu, without otherwise fettering his Lordship's hands, that will be open to him, of course, subject to the correction of the Court, and I will reserve all expenses.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur.

LORD DEAS.—This is an action on a bill. If the pursuer had stood upon his bill, and said nothing as to how the value was made up, he would have been entitled to the benefit of the rule of law, that non-onerosity could only be proved by his writ and oath. Does he forfeit that benefit by entering into details about the value, which were unnecessary? I am not prepared to assume that. And if this be not assumed, then we could only grant the diligence, as the Lord Ordinary has virtually done before answer. The propriety of that course comes thus to be the question. I think the more correct course would be to limit the diligence to the pursuer's writ, which would include his books; and to allow the question as to a farther diligence to stand over till the competency of a proof at large should be determined. But your Lordships seem to think the specification is not properly framed for the limited purpose I have referred to, I do not object to the total recall of the interlocutor in hoc statu.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall in statu the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of the 28th of June last.

remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause, without prejudice to his Lordship's granting diligence to recover writ of the pursuer, to instruct his non-onerosity as holder of the bill sued for, or to his Lordship afterwards granting more general diligence, if upon hearing parties on the merits of the cause he sees cause to do so, and reserve all question of expenses."

JOHN ANDERSON AND OTHERS (Blaikie's Trustees), Pursuers.—G. G. Bell No. 6.

WALTER AND JOHN FIDDES WILSON, Defenders.—Penney—W. Watson.

Sale—Price—Delivery.—A purchaser offered to take delivery of the subject at what he said was the contract price. This was refused by the seller's trustees, who claimed a price entered in the books of the seller, who had died. The purchaser then wrote, declining to take the goods at any price. In an action for implement raised on their view of the price, the trustees put in a minute, tendering delivery at the price alleged by the purchaser;—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Handyside) that the purchaser had been entitled to annul the contract.

MR GEORGE BLAIKIE sold his clip of wool to the defenders, W. & J. Fiddes, Nov. 13, 1856. but owing to Mr Blaikie's illness, no settlement took place during his life, and a dispute arose with his trustees, which ended in their raising this action against the purchasers. The details of the case appear from the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, before whom it came by advocacy:—"Advocates the cause: Finds that a purchase of a clip of wool was made by the defender John Fiddes Wilson from the late Mr Blaikie, of whom the pursuers are the testamentary trustees: Finds that the terms of the bargain were not reduced to writing, and that the defenders and the pursuers differed as to the terms on which the purchase was made: Finds that the pursuers retained possession of the wool, offering delivery only on payment by the defenders of the price, according to an invoice sent by them, and the defenders refusing to take delivery, excepting on the terms on which they represented they had made the purchase: Finds that the pursuers not having acceded to the defenders' terms, they declined to take, and rejected the wool: Finds that the pursuers thereupon brought the process under advocacy, in which they concluded for a certain sum as the alleged price of the wool stated to be deposited in the warehouse ready to be delivered up to the defenders on payment of the said price, interest due thereon, warehouse rent, and expenses of process: Finds that the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor, which was acquiesced in by the pursuers, and became final, finding 'it admitted by the letter produced in process, and also by the statements in the record, that the defenders purchased the clip of wool in question from the late Mr Blaikie, and that there was thus a concluded bargain betwixt the parties to that effect; but Finds that this admission, being the only evidence of the contract, must be received with its qualifications, viz., that if the wool should fall in value, the price was to be 31s. 6d. per stone, and that the cotted fleeces were to be at half price, or half weight; and in respect parties were at issue as to the alleged fall in price, and alleged weights, before answer, allows them a proof of their respective averments, and to both parties a conjunct probation:' Finds that the pursuers did not lead any proof, but lodged a minute restricting their claim against the defenders to the price of 31s. 6d. per stone, and agreeing to accept half price for the cotted or padded fleeces: Finds that in abandoning the leading of any proof, and so restricting their claim, the pursuers accepted the terms of the bargain which were accepted by the defenders, and which they offered to implement: Finds that under these circumstances the pursuers failed to establish the terms of Anderson v.

Wilson.

The interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute (Craigie), pronounced after the minute of restriction, above referred to, had been lodged by the pursuers, was as follows:—"Finds that the pursuers have failed to prove that the fixed price of the wool was to be 32s. 6d. per stone, and that it is not denied, in answer to the statement in article 2 of the defender's answers to the condescendence, that there was a fall in the price of wool subsequent to the date of sale, so as to entitle the defender to the deduction of 1s. per stone: Finds that the pursuers have refused delivery, except on payment of the full price of 32s. 6d., and on other conditions, in which they were not entitled to insist, was equivalent to a refusal of delivery on the terms of the contract, and that the defender was therefore entitled, in terms of his letter of December 8, 1854, to annul the bargain altogether: Therefore, sustains the defences, and assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and finds him entitled to expenses."

The Sheriff-depute (Rutherford) recalled this interlocutor, and decerned in terms of the minute of restriction, on the grounds stated in his note,†

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary regrets that he is unable to adopt the judgment of the Sheriff, for the result is unfortunate to the trustees of Mr Blaikie, whose proceedings were quite natural under the circumstances. But he conceives that the previous interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute proceeds on a sounder view of the legal position of the parties. The short view of the case is, that the respondents found themselves unable to establish, by the necessary evidence, the terms of the bargain as represented by them, both when they withheld delivery, and subsequently under the summons raised by them. It appears to follow, that the advocates must be held to have been in the right as to the terms of the bargain, and, on the refusal of the respondents to give delivery except on their own terms, became entitled to throw up the bargain. The expenses of the action must, in the usual course, be allowed to the advocates."

† "NOTE.—It appears that the defenders purchased the wool from the deceased George Blaikie so long ago as in August 1853, the price entered in his book being L.1, 12s. 6d. per stone. The defenders admit this, but add a stipulation that there was to be a deduction of 1s. per stone if markets fell, and the cotted fleeces to be only half price. At the sale it was agreed that the defender was to pack the wool and return and settle the price. Accordingly, in February 1854, the defender, J. F. Wilson, packed the wool in his own sheets, and would then have settled the price had Mr Blaikie's illness not prevented him, and it was then arranged that he was to return for this purpose so soon as notice was given him by Blaikie. In consequence of Blaikie's death, no settlement took place. It then became necessary that Blaikie's trustees should arrange with the defenders to receive the wool and settle the price. Here much unnecessary delay took place on the part of the defender. Letters were written to J. F. Wilson, one of the defenders, on 20th March, 19th July, and 11th August 1854 (a period of five months), which he allowed to remain unanswered. He was again written to on 17th November, to which he replies that he is ready to take and pay for the wool, but had received no invoice. In the correspondence which follows, objections are first made in Wilson's letter of 2nd November to the price charged, and deduction claimed from price of 1s. per stone and cotted fleeces at half price; and on this being declined, he again writes, on 8th December, refusing to have any thing further to do with the wool. In the process the parties were allowed a proof of the terms of the bargain, when the pursuers gave the minute No. 15, proposing to allow the deductions claimed by the defenders, which were substantially those which the pursuers urged in support of their reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary's judgment. No. 6.

LORD COWAN.—In my view, there is no substantial difference between the parties as to the price; but then the pursuers, instead of asking for inquiry, as the defenders would not take delivery at their price, raised this action, in which they have adhered to a price which they could not prove. I concur with the Lord Ordinary. Nov. 14, 1856.
Keddie v. Gray.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—No doubt if the defenders had refused altogether to take the wool, the pursuers' position would have been different; but the pursuers had full notice that delivery would be taken on certain terms, and they write refusing these—only in the present action, for the first time, saying they agree to their terms. Had they acquiesced in the defenders' view at first, when it was made known to them, they might have been entitled to enforce implement, but it is too late now.

Process—Summons—Error in partibus.—The partibus of a summons erroneously designed the defenders, who founded on the irregularity as fatal to the action;—Question, whether, the defenders objecting, the partibus could competently be amended? and whether the objection could be sustained as a defence?

THE Lord Ordinary verbally reported the following point:—An action had been called at the instance of Keddie and Company against J. and J. Gray. The defenders were correctly enough designed in the body of the summons, and also in the printed calling list, as “proprietors and publishers of the North British Advertiser,” but in the partibus they were called “J. and J. Gray, proprietors and publishers of the Edinburgh Advertiser,” a paper with which they had no concern. They pled;—“The summons has not been regularly brought into Court, and will therefore fall to be dismissed.” His Lordship stated that he had been asked for authority to amend the partibus, but did not feel at liberty to grant it. Nov. 14, 1856.
1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Benholme.

Moir, for the defenders;—There is here an unquestionably erroneous partibus. In the case of M'Donnel,¹ the party in whose favour decree had been pronounced, presented a regular petition to the Court, which was not opposed, and the Court allowed the error to be amended; but here there is no such formal application, and at the first opportunity after the calling the defenders have taken the objection. The defect cannot now be remedied.²

Maidment, for the pursuers, moved to be allowed to make the necessary which the defender objects, and craves to be assoilzied. In considering the whole case, the Sheriff is of opinion that the bargain was completed with the deceased George Blaikie, and homologated by both parties when the wool was weighed and packed by the defender in his own sheets. That no invoice was necessary, as the contents of the sheets were known to the defender, and it was the duty of the defender to receive the wool from the executors of the deceased George Blaikie when applied to for that purpose, leaving only the question of the price as the proper subject of litigation. As the pursuers prosecuted for a larger sum than that admitted by the defenders, and which smaller sum they are now willing to receive, and for which they now crave decree, the Sheriff finds the defenders entitled to expenses, subject however to modification, as although they have been partially successful in their defence, their plea to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons has not been sustained.”

 Nov. 14, 1856. —
 Drummond and Others. LORD IVORY.—You have it in your own power to make this amendment. You have only to call the summons again. Do you insist upon a judgment?

Maidment.—If the Court indicate an opinion against us, we shall certainly not insist upon our motion.

LORD IVORY.—It will not be a judgment in the case, but only that the case is not properly before the Lord Ordinary. There is a case in the books, but the reference at present escapes me, where the summons having been unduly enrolled the objection was taken; and, in the meantime, various deliverances had been written as in the cause, and the result was, that all these deliverances, which had been written before the objection was taken, were held as pro non scriptis.²

LORD DEAS.—I think the parties ought to adjust this matter. I am not satisfied that this objection by the defenders to a defect in their own designation, if pushed to a judgment before the Lord Ordinary, ought to go any deeper than to induce the Lord Ordinary to continue the cause, so as to give opportunity for applying to the Court for authority to correct the error. But if the matter be arranged, it is unnecessary to go into this question. The party committing the error must of course be responsible for expenses caused by it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I understand the parties to be satisfied with the interlocutor we propose to pronounce.

LORD IVORY.—The enrolment not being good, the case is in the position of being coram non iudice.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, upon the report of Lord Benholme, Ordinary, Find that in respect the defenders are erroneously designed in the partibus on the summons, the calling and enrolling of the summons as against them have been irregular, and the cause ought not to be proceeded with on that partibus: And in respect the counsel for the pursuers has now stated at the bar that they do not intend to proceed farther under the calling and enrolments which have already taken place, Find the defenders entitled to the expenses of the present discussion; modify the same to L.2, 2s. sterling; and decern against the pursuers for payment thereof to the defender."

and Others.

His Lordship had no doubt that proceedings in sequestrations, awarded under the old Act, might be conducted under the old Act, unless there be an interlocutor by the Court that they shall be conducted under the new Act. But in regard to sequestration awarded after the date of the new Act, he stated that there was some awkwardness in the use of the word “shall” in section 3, which had given rise to a difficulty amongst practitioners, (1) whether, when sequestration is applied for after the 1st November 1856, it can be awarded without an interlocutor declaring that the proceedings shall be regulated by the new Act; and (2) whether, where the proceedings were commenced under the old Act, but sequestration had not been “awarded” till the date of the new Act, sequestration can now be awarded; and, if so, whether any interlocutor is required declaring that the proceedings shall be under the new Act. In one of the cases reported by his Lordship the induciae of the Gazette notice expired on the 31st October, and the minute for awarding sequestration could not be presented till the following day, the 1st November, when the new Act came into operation.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This third clause contemplates only two classes of cases, the one in which sequestration has been awarded after the date of the Act, and the other where the proceedings occur after the date of the Act, in sequestrations which have been awarded before the 1st November. Now this sequestration fell to be awarded after the date which would bring it under the new Act; but then application was made for it under the old Act. I think it is competent here to award sequestration under the new Act.

The second question is, whether it would require a deliverance to regulate that matter. Though not necessary, it may perhaps be proper to express that in the interlocutor.

LORD IVORY.—I see no objection to that course being followed ob cautelam; but I see no difficulty. I think the third clause includes all sequestrations, of whatever kind—those awarded both under the new Act and under the old Act. There is a saving clause at the end of section two, in regard to any act or deed done or granted prior to the new Act coming into operation, which removes all doubt on the subject.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I think Lord Ivory’s view is sound. There is no doubt of the validity of that procedure prior to 1st November. The procedure is saved by the concluding clause of the second section. What is to take place now is to award sequestration, which by the third clause may competently be done.

LORD DEAS.—I concur.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I understand the Court hold that it is not necessary to do anything more than merely to award sequestration.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is so.

The usual note was given in to the Bill-Chamber, detailing the procedure, and referring to the New Bankrupt Act; and Lord Mackenzie pronounced the usual interlocutor, awarding sequestration on the 16th November.

Murray v.
Donnelly.

Bankruptcy—Personal protection—Title to appear.—A bankrupt has a title, without concurrence of his trustee, to reclaim against an interlocutor by a Lord Ordinary in a question of personal protection.

Voting—Voucher.—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Mackenzie, abs. Lord Justice-Clerk), that brokers, holding no assignation from the underwriters, and not producing the policies of insurance, are not entitled to rank upon the bankrupt estate of the insured on an account for premiums, nor can they vote in a question of granting personal protection.

Voting—Writ—Vitiation.—The change of i into y, in the subscription of an affidavit and claim, where neither the altered spelling nor the hand-writing corresponded with those of a bill on which the claim was founded, is a vitiation in essentialibus, and cuts down the vote of the claimant in the sequestration.

2ND DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie
L.

THIS was a reclaiming note by a bankrupt, Thomas Donnelly, against a judgment by the Lord Ordinary recalling a Sheriff-court interlocutor granting him personal protection. One of the creditors had brought under appeal this interlocutor pronounced on the petition of the trustee, and he now objected to the reclaiming note, as it was presented in name of the bankrupt alone. But the Court held that as it was a creditor who had appealed, the bankrupt had been entitled to appear and defend the inferior court judgment, and, in a case of personal protection, was equally entitled to reclaim against the adverse interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Donnelly's estates were sequestrated in June, and (as stated by the Lord Ordinary in his note), "at the general meeting held 26th July 1856, three creditors voted that the personal protection to the bankrupt should be renewed for two years from that date. These creditors were—James Donnelly, the bankrupt's brother, who claims to be ranked under three separate affidavits for L.683, 7s.; Hugh Dempster, as mandatory for Seller and Robertson, claiming to be ranked for L.63, 3s., and the said Hugh Dempster as mandatory for Thomas M'Alindon, claiming to be ranked for L.28, 9s. 8d. On the other hand, James Murray, whose claim amounts to L.114, 0s. 3d., moved and voted that the bankrupt's personal protection should not be renewed. There was thus an apparent majority of the creditors, both in number and value, in favour of the resolution that the personal protection should be renewed for two years.

"It appears from the minutes of the meeting, that James Murray 'protested against the validity of the votes tendered for the motion of the said James Donnelly,' and this was followed by an appeal to the Sheriff against the resolution. At the same time, the trustee presented a petition to the Sheriff, to grant a renewal of the personal protection in terms of the resolution at the meeting of creditors.

"By the interlocutor of 26th August 1856, the Sheriff-substitute found that as no specific objections were stated at the meeting to the votes of the creditors who supported the resolution, it was incompetent under an appeal against the resolution, to advance any such objections, and therefore he granted the protection as craved. There is reason to believe that this interlocutor was intended to dispose both of the appeal at Murray's instance and of the petition for renewal of the protection. But in order to obviate any difficulty in point of form, the parties consented that both applications should be conjoined and disposed of by one judgment in this Court.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that it is competent under an appeal against a resolution of the creditors to object that it has not been carried by a legal majority in number and value of the creditors present and entitled to vote, although no special objections to the votes have been stated at the meeting, especially where the minutes bear, as they do here, that the dissentient creditor protested against the validity of the votes tendered in favour of the resolutions.

“ By the 58th section of the Bankrupt Act of 1839, which regulates this matter, the majority in number and value of the creditors present at the meeting ‘ may resolve that the personal protection of the bankrupt ought to be renewed for such time as they may think fit, and in such case the trustee shall apply to the Sheriff, who shall renew the protection.’ According to the construction put upon this clause, it is imperative on the Sheriff to grant personal protection to a bankrupt, when the application is duly made, and no objection is taken to the legality or regularity of the votes of the creditors who resolved to grant it. But, in the present case, James Murray, the objecting creditor, has appealed against the resolution, on the ground that it was not carried by a legal majority in number and value, or at least in number of the creditors present and entitled to vote—and the Lord Ordinary is humbly of opinion that the appeal is well founded, and must be sustained.

Murray v.
Donnelly.

“ Some formidable objections were stated to the claims of James Donnelly, the bankrupt’s brother, which greatly exceed in value the debts of all the other creditors. But supposing his vote should be sustained to the full extent claimed, so as to give a preponderance in value in favour of the resolution, this will not be sufficient unless there is also a majority in number. Now, the only other creditors who voted for the resolution were Sellar and Robertson, and Thomas M’Alindon. But it is objected by the appellant, Murray, that both their votes are bad.

“ As to Sellar and Robertson’s claim, it appears to be founded on an account for premiums of insurance on a vessel called the ‘ Druid,’ and incidents connected therewith, amounting to L.63, 3s. To this it is objected, that no documents are produced to instruct that Sellar and Robertson are creditors for the amount claimed. Along with the affidavit they produced merely an account, which gives no information of the character in which they acted, and it might have been supposed that they had acted as brokers or agents for the bankrupt, and had paid the premiums to the underwriters on his account. But if this had been their true position, they would have required to instruct their claim by a receipt or voucher, shewing that they had paid the premiums. It appears, however, from an unaccepted bill now produced, that Sellar and Robertson claim payment of this account, not in their own right as having paid the premiums, but merely as agents of the underwriters who signed the policy. But there is no assignation from the underwriters, and no authority of any kind from them to shew that Sellar and Robertson are entitled to sue, or to claim to be ranked in the sequestration for this debt. For this reason, it is thought this claim must be rejected as not duly vouched.

“ With regard to M’Alindon’s claim, the Lord Ordinary thinks it must be rejected, because, apart from other objections, the signature of the claimant to the affidavit, and the signature to the mandate, are both palpably vitiated and erased. These signatures are different in the spelling, and different in appearance from the signature on the back of the bill; and it is thought that documents which have been so tampered with, can make no faith in judgment.

“ If both these votes are bad, it follows that the resolution for renewal of the personal protection was not carried by a majority in number of the creditors present, and entitled to vote at the meeting.”

The following is the interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary:— “ Recalls the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute complained of, dated 26th August 1856: Finds that the resolution that the bankrupt’s personal protection should be renewed, was not carried by a legal majority in number of the creditors present and entitled to vote at the meeting held on 26th July 1856: Therefore, sustains the appeal at the instance of James Murray against the said resolution, and refuses the prayer of the petition for renewal of the personal protection to the bankrupt: Dismisses the counter appeal for James Donnelly and the bankrupt: Finds them liable in expenses to the appellant, James Murray, both in this Court and before the Sheriff."

I. As to Sellar and Robertson's claim, the bankrupt now contended that the Lord Ordinary had erred, that the brokers were fully entitled to claim on an open account, and that it was not necessary that the policy should be produced, for the policy always bore that the money had been paid to the insurer, and brokers stood to both parties as principals,—thus the relation of debtor and creditor existed directly between the insured and the claimants.¹

It was contended for Murray, that they were truly in a discussion as to whether or no the 11th section of 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41 had been complied with. All the vouchers to prove the debt had to be produced, and nothing which was not referred to in the affidavit could be adduced as a proof of debt, and if the proof were not in the party's possession at the time of the claim, the explanation of the reason had to be made in the affidavit, but in it no allusion was made to the policy,² and the whole of the account was,—

" Mr T. H. Donnelly, Greenock, Dr. to Sellar & Robertson in sequestration.

" 1853, Nov. 25, For premium of insurance, and stamp, per Druid, L.65 5

" 1854, Oct. 31, For interest and bill stamp for bill discd. - 0 18

LORD WOOD.—I am for adhering to the interlocutor. No doubt a party may claim upon an affidavit and an open account, where the nature of the claim and the position of parties is set forth. But a more unsatisfactory statement than we have here could not be,—if this were enough to satisfy the requirements of the statute then anything would be so. It is not indeed necessary to produce vouchers sufficient to prove the debt. It is sufficient, if what must reasonably be supposed to be in the party's possession be produced, with an explanation of the cause of his not having more. Now the claim here is for premiums of insurance, and all that is produced is the account: no explanation of any kind is given. If the party making the affidavit could have produced the policy, which ought to have been in his possession, that would have done. If he could not, he should have explained the reason; but neither has been done, and, for all we know, it may have been in his possession at the time the claim was lodged, when it certainly ought to have been produced.

LORD COWAN.—The view I take of this case is very much the same. There might have been some difficulty if we were dealing only with the description in the bill and the absence of an assignation; but what we must deal with is the affidavit and account, which are vague and general in the extreme. That, however, need not have proved a fatal objection, if the policy had been produced; but if the creditor's vote could be admitted without the policy, what would prevent any broker from claiming thousands on an open account? The mere affidavit, and this vague account, are quite insufficient to support the right to vote. It is clear that the creditors were in a position to produce some voucher or other in support of the claim. It is impossible to hold that they were not. Mr Bell (Com. vol. i. p. 60) lays down the whole law on this subject to the same effect as stated to us from the English authorities, and especially states that the policy is the proper evidence of the broker's claim for premiums against the insured.

LORD MURRAY.—I am entirely of the same way of thinking, and am for adhering to the interlocutor, though not on all the particular grounds set forth by the Lord Ordinary. I hold that the claim is not sufficiently vouched. What evidence is there that this man is a broker, or effected any insurance at all, if the policy is not produced?

II. The objection to M'Alindon's vote was, that the spelling of the subscription to the affidavit, and also to a mandate to a party to act for him, had been altered, and the letter i substituted for y, whereas it was spelt with y on a bill referred to in the affidavit, the writing of which endorsement on the bill was observed to differ considerably from the vitiated subscriptions. That there was any material difference was denied by the bankrupt, who farther said there was no allegation of fraud. The alteration had been made in presence of the justice of the peace, and at any rate it did not amount to vitiation, as enough remained unaltered to identify the signature.¹

It was replied that affidavits, like other documents, if tampered with, made no faith in judgment. Any alteration making a difference after the deed left the subscriber's hand was a vitiation. There was no evidence, and it was denied that this had been done in presence of the justice by the party, and the subscription differed from that on the bill on which it bore to be founded.

LORD MURRAY.—I regard signature as a solemnity of these affidavits, and look upon this one as wanting that solemnity. The question as to whether an alteration from i to y would deprive a document of all faith is a nice one; but I should hesitate to alter a judgment consistent, I think, with the appearance of the whole documents.

LORD WOOD.—I agree with your Lordship. The case quoted does not apply. There the signature was not legible, but it was argued, "the Justice of Peace tells you what it is." But here the signature is vitiated, and there is no resemblance between the signatures on the bill and on the mandate and affidavit. I cannot sustain this as a duly authenticated document.

LORD COWAN.—I am very unwilling to arrive at that conclusion, but it is the only safe one. A mere interchange of i and y I might not in such a name regard as a serious objection; but the radical and dangerous objection is to our looking at all at a signature altered and vitiated both in affidavit and mandate; and when, in addition, it differs from the one on the bill, I concur with the Lord Ordinary that a document so tampered with can make no faith in judgment.

Process—Procedure under the 9th Geo. IV. c. 58, and 16th & 17th Vict. c. 67 (for the regulation of public-houses).—A sentence and conviction for breach of certificate under the statutes passed for the regulation of public-houses, bore that certain witnesses were examined, and then proceeded—"The bailie convicts the said Robert Hill of the offence charged against him;" but it did not say that the witnesses were credible, nor that the case was proved by their evidence, nor that the complaint was proved at all;—Held (affirming judgment of Lord Ordinary), that these omissions were such a deviation from the form of procedure pointed out by the statute, that the judgment was null and void.

The suspender, Robert Hill, was, on 18th July 1855, convicted in the Edinburgh Police-court on the complaint of the respondent Dymock, procurator-fiscal of the burgh, of a breach of the regulations of his certificate as a grocer and spirit-dealer, and sentenced to pay a fine of L.5, with expenses, within fourteen days. He failed to do so, and was incarcerated. Thereupon he presented the present note of suspension and liberation, impugning the sentence on various grounds. The Lord Ordinary thus stated the point to which the attention of the Court was now directed:—

"The proceedings in this case took place under the 9th Geo. IV. c. 58, and 16th & 17th Vict. c. 67, passed for the regulation of public-houses. The suspender has been convicted of a breach or contravention of the condi-

 Nov. 18, 1856. " Various objections have been stated in this suspension to the regularity of the proceedings. But several of these appear to the Lord Ordinary to be unfounded. He thinks, however, that the sentence pronounced by the convicting magistrate is liable to one objection, which is fatal to its validity.
 Hill v.
 Dymock.

" By the 9th Geo. IV. c. 58, sect. 23, it is enacted that, under a complaint for breach of certificate, the accused party may be convened before the sheriff or magistrates therein mentioned, when 'it shall be lawful for such sheriff or bailie, or two or more justices of the peace, to inquire into the truth of the allegations in such complaint, and on the same being proved, either by the confession of the party complained against, or by the testimony on oath (or affirmation if a Quaker) of one or more credible witness or witnesses, or upon other legal evidence, to pronounce judgment and convict the party of the offence complained against, without any written pleadings or record of evidence, it being hereby provided that a record shall be preserved of the charge and of the judgment pronounced.' 'And all such records, to be so preserved as aforesaid, shall be in the form contained in the schedule annexed to the body of this Act therein designated by the letter D, or to such effect.'

" The form of conviction is framed to meet several cases. Thus: 'Compeared C D, and the complaint being read over to him, he confessed the offence therein charged;' then follow the signatures; ' (or) Compeared C D, and the complaint being read over to him, he denied the same; but it was proved against him by the oath of R S, a credible witness; (or) C D having failed to appear, and due proof, by the oath of constable, being made, that he had duly summoned the said C D, and the complaint being read over, the same was proved against him by the oath of R S, a credible witness, and therefore the justices (or sheriff or bailie) convict the said C D of the offence charged against him, being a first (second or third) offence, and find him liable in the sum of , ' &c.

" The procedure in the present case bears, that on the complaint being read over to him, the suspender denied the same. It also sets forth that, at the first diet, one witness was examined on oath in support of the complaint and at an adjourned diet another witness, and that certain witnesses were also examined on oath in exculpation.

" The sentence and conviction then proceeds as follows:—'The bailie convicts the said Robert Hill of the offence charged against him, being first offence, and finds him liable in the sum of L.5 of penalty.'

The complainer pleaded;—That the sentence did not bear either that the complaint was proved against him, or that it was proved against him by credible witness or witnesses, or whether it was proved by the evidence of one witness or both, but merely that the witnesses were examined in support of the complaint.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the judgment or conviction on which the warrant of imprisonment under suspension proceeded, is not framed in the form and manner required by the statutes applicable thereto, and that the said judgment or conviction, and warrant of imprisonment proceeding thereon, are null and inept: Therefore suspends the letters simpliciter, and decerns, and grants warrant of liberation as craved: Finds the suspender entitled to expenses, subject to modification," &c.*

* NOTE.—(After the narrative above quoted):—

" The Lord Ordinary feels that proceedings of this kind are not to be viewed with the strictness applicable to a proper criminal trial. But he conceives that these must be carried on with a due regard, in all substantial respects, to the statute."

The respondent reclaimed, and pleaded; — That the provisions of the statutes as to the forms of proceedings ought to be liberally interpreted, as authorising them. At common law, the evidence taken under such procedure would need to be reduced to writing. But the statute has dispensed with this solemnity, and has provided a substitute. It is sufficient if the Judge preserves a record of the charge and judgment in the form contained in the schedule, 'or to such effect.' It appears to the Lord Ordinary to be an essential part of that schedule to set forth, as the case may be, either that the accused confessed the offence, or that it was proved against him by such and such evidence. If there is no confession, the record ought to bear that the case was proved by evidence. There may be various ways of doing this. The statute has given one form — 'It was proved against him by the oath of R. S., a credible witness.' But equivalent expressions may be sufficient, as if the Magistrate found that the case was proved by the witness or witnesses mentioned, which would necessarily imply that they were credible, as they were believed. Here, however, there is nothing that seems to correspond with the requirement of the statute. It is mentioned that witnesses were examined on oath. But it is neither said that they were credible, which the schedule bears, nor is it said or found that the case was proved by their evidence. It is not even said or found that the complaint was proved at all. The Magistrate at once convicts the accused, which it is thought is not sufficiently specific, nor a sufficient compliance with the schedule. In the mouth of a jury, a conviction is a finding of guilty. But here, in the mouth of the Judge, the statute, with its schedule, seems to employ the term 'convict' not as a verdict on the facts, but as a condemnatory sentence. The intention of the Legislature is that the judgment shall bear that the complaint was proved in one way or other, and 'therefore the justices convict the said C. D. of the offence charged against him.' The conviction here takes place without any previous narrative of the complaint being confessed or otherwise proved, and thus there seems a substantial departure from that form of record which is to supply the place of the actual evidence adduced. It may be inferred that the Magistrate not only believed the witnesses adduced in support of the complaint, but that he considered it to be proved by that evidence, otherwise he would not have convicted. But inference, however natural, seems inadmissible where the statute has required an explicit statement. A Judge, ignorant of his duty, might convict upon evidence that was not legal, as upon notoriety, or upon his own knowledge, or he might possibly convict upon what was 'other legal evidence' than a credible witness or witnesses. It was therefore right that he should be required to state in his record, in such a case as the present, that the offence, when denied, was proved by the witnesses mentioned as adduced, or by other legal evidence, specifying what that was, if it existed.

Hill v.

Dymock.

* Giving every effect to the consideration that these are rather civil than criminal proceedings, and keeping in view that the statute does not require a literal transcript of the schedule, the Lord Ordinary has still thought that there is here too considerable a deviation from the form prescribed to admit of the sentence being sustained; and he will only farther observe, that this deviation is the less entitled to indulgence as it was wholly unnecessary and uncalled for.

* The Lord Ordinary ought also to state, that he entertains doubts of the regularity of the warrant of imprisonment. The sentence here adjudged the susper to pay to the complainer the sum of 'L.2, 10s., being a half part of said penalty, and the remainder to the Deaf and Dumb Institution, Edinburgh, and also to pay the sum of 18s. of expenses of conviction.' Thereafter, 'the Bailie, in respect that the above mentioned Robert Hill has not paid to the complainer the sums of penalty and expenses before mentioned, within the period allowed to him for doing so, which has now elapsed, grants warrant to constables of Court to apprehend him and incarcerate him,' &c., 'for the period of twenty days from this date, when the said sum shall be sooner paid.'

* As only one half of the penalty was payable to the complainer, and the other half to the Deaf and Dumb Institution, there is here a want of proper correspondence between the warrant of imprisonment and the previous sentence. The warrant appears to be granted to enforce the whole sums decerned for, but it seems necessary to observe that these should have been paid wholly to the complainer.

Nov. 18, 1856. Hume v. Magistrates of Edinburgh. The suspender was not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This interlocutor must be substantially adhered to. There is here a very palpable deviation from the course of procedure pointed out by the Act, and such as we cannot sanction. The conviction and judgment complained of must fall. It follows that the suspender is entitled to his liberation.

LORDS IVORY and CURRIEHILL concurred.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion. Leaving out of view, in the meantime, the paragraph about expenses, I concur in every word in the Lord Ordinary's note.

The suspender had also reclaimed against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, so far as it found him entitled only to modified expenses. Upon this point,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The suspender is entitled to his full expenses.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Alter the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, as reclaimed against by the suspender Robert Hill, in so far as that interlocutor finds expenses due to the suspender, subject to modification: Find the suspender entitled to full expenses of process: Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor: Find the suspender entitled to additional expenses," &c.

Process—Interdict.—A church originally belonging to an hospital was sold after having for many years been used as a parish church;—Interdict, pending a declarator, against building a new church with the price (affirming judgment of Lord Benholme) refused.

Nov. 18, 1856. THIS was a note of suspension brought in name of pensioners enjoying the benefit of the Trinity Hospital of Edinburgh against the Magistrates, both representing the community of the city, and as governors of that hospital.

2d Division. Bill-Chamber. I. The objects of the application are thus set forth by the Lord Ordinary of the Bills:—"The Trinity College Church, after the Reformation, was acquired from the Crown by the Magistrates and Council of Edinburgh.

"Within a few years of its acquisition, it appears to have been appropriated as a parish church to one of the ecclesiastical districts of the city; and at the debate it was admitted, that, for between two and three centuries, has, with some short interruptions, been used as a parish church down to the time when it was acquired by the North British Railway Company under the powers of an Act of Parliament.

"By this Act, the Railway Company were prevented from taking possession until they had agreed with the Magistrates on a plan for rebuilding the church upon a site equally convenient for the parish at the expense of the Railway Company. An alternative was, however, provided in these terms: 'Declaring that it shall be competent for the Railway Company to offer and the said Magistrates and Council are hereby authorised to accept of,

If, on the other hand, the warrant was only intended to enforce part of the sum due, it is loosely and ambiguously framed.

"The Lord Ordinary has only given expenses, subject to modification, as he considers several of the grounds of suspension to be frivolous as well as unfounded.

sum of money as compensation for the said church, and in lieu of the foregoing obligation.'

"It appears that, at first, it was intended that the Railway Company should build the church. But difficulties having arisen as to the performance of their obligation in this form, the parties resorted to the other alternative, and it was agreed that a sum of money should be paid by the Railway Company to the Magistrates in lieu of the obligation of rebuilding. The respondents are now in the course of employing this money in rebuilding the church themselves, which, under the original obligation, the Railway Company, in concert with them, would have been bound to rebuild.

"The suspenders have raised against them an action of declarator, in which they maintain that the money ought not to be applied in rebuilding the church at all, but laid out exclusively in supporting the Trinity Hospital, of which the suspenders are pensioners.

"The Lord Ordinary entertains grave doubts of the title of the suspenders. But he does not found his present decision upon that point, which, as well as the merits of the case, will form the subjects of deliberate consideration in the action of declarator.

"The note of suspension has for its object to interdict, in the meantime, during the subsistence of the other action, the steps resolved on by the respondents for rebuilding the church; and, by refusing the note, the Lord Ordinary does no more than announce his opinion, that, in the circumstances of the case, such interdict ought not to be granted. In a possessory action like the present, he considers that it is his duty to pay regard principally to the state of possession under which this church has for so long a period been used as a parish church, until that was interrupted by the proceedings of the Railway Company, under an Act of Parliament, which plainly imposed it as a condition and a duty upon all concerned that a price was to be paid which was to be sufficient to rebuild, and which was to be employed in rebuilding the parish church, which had been interfered with by the statutory arrangement."

Against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, which refused the note with expenses, a reclaiming note was presented, and in support of it it was argued;—The church was not ordinary property of the community, but was specially granted, along with a number of other subjects, for the erection and maintenance of an hospital, and "for no other use." The Magistrates had full power to dispose of the church, and of the rest of these subjects, as to them might seem fit; but then, if any was so disposed of, the proceeds must be applied to the purposes of the hospital, as in point of fact the proceeds of all other property sold had been applied. The church was the only part of the grant not applied to the use of the hospital. The Governors could not make a profit of it, and so they put it to the use of a parish church; and the question was, whether that long use would entitle the Magistrates to divert it or its price—now that they had been able to turn it to profit—from its original purpose. No apology even was offered for the proposal, except the long application of the subject which had taken place. A declarator had been raised, but unless interdict were granted, it might be too late to interfere, as steps were in course of being taken for carrying out the threatened misappropriation of the funds.

The respondents were not called upon.

LEW JAMESON-CLERK.—I never knew an application for interdict more extraordinary than the present. There was a church as well as other property conveyed to the Magistrates, to erect and maintain an Hospital. There were poor to be maintained in the Hospital, and there can be no doubt that the Church being there was to be devoted to those in the Hospital, and that one was required for them. But it was not to be limited to them, and its use was not so limited. It was used for three centuries, and was eventually sold to a railway com-

- Nov. 18, 1856. THERE were two actions of damages brought against the Monkland I and Steel Company by the widows and families of two workmen, who c going to leave the pit; but, in the first instance, Lenaghan returned where they had been working for a waistcoat, with a naked lamp in hand, whereupon an explosion took place. The two men, who were m injured, then went to the bottom of the shaft, and gave the usual signa have the cage taken up, but it was not raised; and for a good many h the men remained up to the middle in water which had accumulated. T were then taken up in a "kettle," and carried home; both of them within two days.

The pursuers alleged that the cause of the fire-damp accumulating, s to injure the deceased, was the carelessness of the defenders, or those whom they were responsible, in not having the ventilating apparatus in per order; and that the cause of their not being taken up out of the pit that the gearing of the cage was not in proper order, and that the engineman had neglected his duty, and not attended to the signal. No. 13.

The defenders did not admit any deficiency of ventilation, but maintained that the contractors for the mine were alone responsible, if there were any; and that the deceased had lost their lives by their own recklessness in not retiring whenever they perceived their danger; instead of which, Lenaghan had caused the explosion by going to where he knew the fire-damp to be with his naked lamp. Nov. 18, 1856.
Callaghan and
Others v.
Monkland
Iron Co.

The injury to the gearing of the cage, they said, was caused by the explosion itself, and was what made it impossible for the engineman to work it, although he heard the signal.

The two cases under a joint minute went to trial together before Lord Deas, at the Spring Circuit in Glasgow, on issues identical, except as to the amount of damages claimed:—

“It being admitted that the defenders are proprietors or lessees of a pit at or near Gartlee, near Airdrie, known by the name of Number Four, Brownsburn Pit, and that they were in the occupation thereof during the year 1852,— “Whether, on or about 23d or 24th March 1852, the said deceased James Lenaghan, when engaged in the service and employment of the defenders, in forming or driving a stone mine or road in the said pit, with the view of searching for ironstone on behalf of the defenders, sustained severe bodily injury in consequence of an explosion of fire-damp in said pit, caused by the fault of the defenders?

“And whether the said deceased, after being injured as aforesaid, sustained farther severe bodily injury from being detained for several hours at the bottom of the said pit, by reason of the person or persons in charge of the same, and of the engine and cage and apparatus connected therewith, in neglect of the proper signal to raise the same, and of his or their duty, unduly delaying to raise the said deceased from the bottom of the said pit, or by reason of the engine gearing and cage not being in proper working order, and fit for the purpose for which they were intended?

“And whether the death of the said deceased was occasioned by the said injuries, or by one or other of them, and by the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?

After the evidence had been led, and counsel had spoken upon it, “Lord Deas charged the jury, and the jury retired, but were recalled by the Judge to make an explanation to them as to the amount and mode of assessing damages; which having been made, the said counsel for the defenders did then and there require the said Lord Deas to direct the jury in point of law, that if the deceased James Lenaghan and Edward Callaghan sustained severe bodily injury in consequence of an explosion of fire-damp in the pit, caused not by the fault of the defenders, but by the negligence or recklessness of themselves, or either of them, the defenders were entitled to a verdict, although it should be proved that, after being so injured, they had sustained farther severe bodily injury from being detained for several hours at the bottom of the pit by reason of the engineman, in neglect of the proper signal, unduly delaying to raise them, unless it should have been proved that the said farther injury occasioned the deaths of the said James Lenaghan and Edward Callaghan. But the said Lord Deas did then and there refuse to give the said direction. And the counsel for the said defenders thereupon excepted to this refusal.”

The court returned the following verdict:—“In respect of the matters put before them, they find for the pursuers, and assess the damages at L.300.”

In the second case, they assessed the damages at L.300.

Callaghan and Others v.
Monkland
Iron Co.

The Monklands Iron Company now attempted to have both verdicts set aside—1st, on account of the presiding Judge having refused to give the direction craved; and, 2d, as contrary to the evidence.

I. Where the issues were so confused, it was impossible, from a general verdict, to discover what grounds the jury had gone upon. They might have held, 1st, that the cause of death was the explosion; or, 2d, that it was the detention in the pit; or, 3d, both combined; or, 4th, they might have held that the fault of the defenders caused the explosion; or, 5th, that it was the cause not of the explosion but of the detention. Such an issue as that sent to the jury required construction, and the refusal of the presiding Judge to give the direction sought, was equivalent to his declining to construe the issue. The direction they had asked for was essential to protect the jury, and it meant that the defenders were not to be held responsible even if the detention had been their fault, unless it were proved that, but for the detention, the lives of the deceased would have been saved; and its obscurity in its terms was caused by the terms of the issue to which it bore reference. Whether the exception was good or bad, the refusal to construe was a miscarriage, and a new trial should be granted.

II. At any rate, the general verdict must be taken as affirming that the explosion was caused by the fault of the defenders, a proposition contradicted by the entire evidence.

The pursuers contended—I. That there was no presumption on the bill of exceptions that the Judge had refused to construe the issue. On the contrary, it was to be presumed that he had said everything the defenders thought necessary, except what was in the exception, and that he had said nothing but what was right—or what was objected to, must have appeared in the exception;—but the direction asked for was either totally erroneous in point of law, or so obscure, that it would only have confused the jury. Its natural meaning was, that the injury from the explosion was to be thrown out of view altogether, and that a verdict should be given for the defenders, unless the entire mischief was done by the further injury caused by the detention at the bottom of shaft; such direction was clearly erroneous, for the pursuers would have been entitled to a verdict even had the jury been satisfied that the deaths were occasioned by the combined effects of the injuries caused by the explosion and the detention, if they thought the defenders were responsible either for the explosion or for the detention, which was parallel to the case of injury done to a man in weak health.

II. As to the construction of the verdict, the Court would not disturb it, because, in some possible view of it, it might be contrary to evidence but only if it were contrary to every reasonable construction of the evidence which it was maintained not to be.

After consultation,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Court cannot sustain this exception, it is so ambiguous, and so uncertainly worded. We do not mean to say that there is no great deal of matter for the consideration of the jury which may be involved in the exception, but we do not think the refusing it implies any denial of that.

But we think the affirming the first issue implied in the general verdict is much against evidence, that we cannot but grant a new trial on that ground.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Disallow said exception, in respect the meaning of the directions asked for by the learned Judge does not clearly appear on the face of the writ employed; and find the defenders liable in the expenses of the bill, and reserve all other questions of expenses, and also set aside the said verdict, and grant a new trial; allow the pursuer to lead an account of the expenses of said discussion, and remit," &c.

Wryghte v. Lindsay.

Partnership—Bankruptcy—Executor—Liability of estate of deceased partner for future losses of a joint-stock company, Acts 2 & 3 Vict. cap. 41, and 16 & 17 Vict. cap. 53—Joint-Stock Companies' winding up Acts 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 45, and 12 & 13 Vict. cap. 108.—A Scotch partner of an English joint-stock company died, and his heir administered inter alia to his father's shares. The subscribed capital had been duly paid up, and the company was then solvent. It afterwards became embarrassed, and the winding up Acts having been passed, an official manager was appointed. He made a call upon the executorial estate of the deceased partner, which call was not paid. He then applied for sequestration of the estate of the deceased partner in respect of the call;—Held, that the claim was not a debt due by the deceased partner in the sense of the statute 2 & 3 Vict. cap. 41, and, therefore, that sequestration was incompetent.

Process—It is incompetent for the Lord Ordinary to report a sequestration case by formal interlocutor for the decision of the Inner House.

THE late Sir Francis Walker Drummond, Bart., was a partner of the Royal Bank of Australia to the extent of 140 shares at L.50 each. Sir Francis died on 29th February 1844. At that date, the Bank was solvent. Sir Francis left a trust-disposition and deed of settlement, dated 3d August 1840, by which he nominated certain parties as his trustees. The trustees did not act, and Sir James Walker Drummond, the eldest son of Sir Francis, made up a title as heir to his father's heritable properties, and, as executor, was confirmed to his father's moveable property in Scotland, and took out letters of administration to his father's personal property in England. Among other personal property to which Sir James administered were the 140 shares of the Australian Bank.

After Sir James W. Drummond administered as executor, two calls were made on the shareholders of the bank. These were duly intimated to Sir James, and paid by him as a shareholder of the bank; one of L.5 per share on 27th November 1847, and the other of L.2, 10s. per share on 4th September 1848.

The affairs of the Royal Bank of Australia became embarrassed sometime prior to 1850, and the petitioner, Mr Wryghte, was (23d April 1850) appointed official manager of the bank by the Master of the High Court of Chancery, charged with the winding up of the affairs of the bank, in pursuance of the Acts 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 45, and 12 & 13 Vict. cap. 108, commonly called the Joint-Stock Companies' Winding up Acts, 1848 and 1849.

These Acts were intended to establish what was considered to be a beneficial mode of winding up the affairs of any company in England and Ireland which should either be insolvent, or "shall have been dissolved, or shall have ceased to carry on business, or shall be carrying on business only for the purpose of winding up its affairs, and the same shall not be completely wound up; or if any other matter or thing shall be shown which, in the opinion of the Court, shall render it just and equitable that the company should be dissolved."—Act 1848, sect. 5.

The mode provided for the winding up of the affairs of such companies as the Australian Bank will be found in the clauses of the Acts quoted below. The official manager is required inter alia to make up a list of contributories, which may consist of all the members or of a few selected from them, and this list being approved of by the Master in Chancery, the official manager may, under the control of the Master, proceed against them all as a class or individually, for whatever sums he may require for the purposes of winding up.

On the present occasion such a list was made up and approved of, and the name of Sir James Walker Drummond was in the list.

 Wryghte v.
 Lindsay.

On 9th August 1854, the Master of Chancery ordered that Sir James Walker Drummond, as executor of Sir Francis, should pay a sum of L.14,000, as the proportion effecting to his 140 shares, of a call of L.100 per share, made on all the contributories of the Royal Bank. This order was sent by the petitioner to Mr John Archibald Campbell, W.S.; and Mr James Lamond, S.S.C., as acting for him, emitted an affidavit, setting forth, "that application had been duly made to Sir James Walker Drummond, Bart., executor foresaid, for payment of the said sum of L.14,000, by transmitting to him a copy of said order, with a demand for payment thereof, through the General Post-Office, Edinburgh," (to what address was not stated,) "on the 6th day of October 1854; and default has been made by the said Sir James Walker Drummond, Bart., foresaid, in payment thereof."

The petitioner emitted an affidavit, dated the 17th day of August 1855, to the effect that Sir James Walker Drummond had not paid the L.14,000, as directed by the order of the Master of Chancery. These orders and affidavits were, in terms of the Acts, registered in the books of Council and Session upon the 13th day of August 1855, and the petitioner thereupon raised letters of horning and poinding against Sir James as his father's executor, dated and signeted the 30th day of August 1855. Sir James was charged edictally as furth of Scotland.

On 8th March 1856, the Master in Chancery pronounced the following order:—"Upon hearing what was this day alleged before me by Mr H. Harris, solicitor to William Charles Wryghte, official manager appointed by me of the above named company, I do order that the said official manager, by his said solicitor, do forthwith proceed to apply for sequestration of the estates of Sir Francis Walker Drummond deceased, according to the law of Scotland, and to take all such steps as may be necessary for that purpose. And I further order that the said William Charles Wryghte do prove under such sequestration for the sum of L.14,000, being the sum mentioned in my order in this matter of the 9th day of August 1854."

On 14th March 1856 the petitioner emitted another affidavit, which set forth his own appointment as official manager of the Royal Bank of Australia, and the circumstance of the late Sir Francis Walker Drummond having been proprietor of 140 shares of the Bank, and his liability for the capital of L.50 a-share. It further set forth that Sir Francis "was farther liable to make payment of what other or additional sum might fall on him as his proportional share of the losses incurred by the said Company: That the said Royal Bank of Australia was constituted by a contract or deed of settlement which is dated the 3d day of August 1840, and is subscribed by the said Sir Francis Walker Drummond as a shareholder thereof: Depones, That by virtue of the said Acts hereinbefore mentioned, termed respectively, 'The Joint Stock Companies Winding up Act, 1848,' and 'The Joint Stock Companies Winding up Amendment Act, 1849,' the deponent, subsequently to the death of the said Sir Francis Walker Drummond, made up a list of the members or shareholders, partners, and other contributories of the said Royal Bank of Australia, and included therein as a contributory Sir James Walker Drummond, Baronet of Hawthornden, as executor of the said Sir Francis Walker Drummond, for the said 140 shares, and the said Sir James Walker Drummond, executor foresaid, was by the said Master included in the said list of contributories for and in respect of the said 140 shares: That by the said Acts, power was given to the Master in Chancery, charged with the winding up of the said Company, to make calls from time to time for the purpose of liquidating the debts and claims due from the said Royal Bank of Australia, and all costs and expenses incurred in winding up the said Bank: That the said Master did, acting under the said Acts, duly make call on all the contributories or shareholders of the said Company of L.100 per share, which, on the 140 shares held by the said Sir Francis Walker Drummond as aforesaid, amounted to the sum of L.14,000. Depones farther, that by the said Act 11 & 12 Victoria, cap. 45, it is enacted, that on production at the office in Edinburgh, kept for the registration of deeds, bonds, protests, and other writs registered in the books of Council and Session, of an office copy of any order of the Court, or of the Master, made in any proceedings under or by virtue of the said Act, and of an affidavit, that an application had been duly made to the person mentioned in such order for payment of the sum thereby ordered to be paid by him, and that default had been made in payment thereof, then such order should be registrable in like manner as a bond executed according to the law of Scotland, with a clause of registration therein contained, and decree should be interposed to such order, on which execution should pass in like manner as execution passes upon a decree interposed to such bond, and should have the like effect upon and against the person named in such order as if he had executed such bond.”

No. 14.

Nov. 20, 1856.
Wryghte v.
Lindsay.

The affidavit then narrated the orders and affidavits above mentioned, and concluded as follows:—“Depones, That a liability for the said sum of L.14,000 was incurred by the said Sir Francis Walker Drummond anterior to his death, and that the same is now due from his estate to the deponent, as official manager foresaid, and that no part of the said sum has been paid or compensated to the deponent: Depones, That the deponent has been informed that the firm of Walker and Melville, writers to the Signet, and James Moncrieff Melville, writer to the Signet, a partner of said firm, are bound to relieve the said Sir Francis Walker Drummond, or his estate, of the said sum now claimed, or part thereof, in respect they are said to be parties interested in the said shares, or some part thereof, but the deponent does not know the extent to which said firm, or said James Moncrieff Melville, are bound to relieve the said estate of the said Sir Francis Walker Drummond, and with this explanation, and reserving any claim on the said Walker and Melville and James Moncrieff Melville, if such there be, depones, That the deponent does not hold any obligant other than the said Sir Francis Walker Drummond and Sir James Walker Drummond, his executor, bound for the said debt, and no security except what is before stated: That to the best of the deponent’s knowledge and belief, no part of the said sum has been paid or compensated to the said Royal Bank of Australia, or to any person competent or authorised to receive payment for or on account of the said Bank, nor is any obligant or security held by the said Bank, or any person on behalf of the said Bank, other than as before stated.”

Founding upon the preceding orders and other vouchers, Wryghte, in his character of official manager, and, as such, being a creditor to the extent required by law of Sir Francis Walker Drummond, presented the present petition for sequestration of the estates of Sir Francis under the 2d & 3d Vict. cap. 41, and the 16th & 17th Vict. cap. 53.

This petition was opposed by Mr Donald Lindsay, accountant, who, on the application of Lady Walker Drummond, as a creditor of her husband, and as a beneficiary under his settlement, was, on 11th March 1856, appointed “judicial factor on the estate, heritable and moveable, of the deceased Sir Francis Walker Drummond, with the usual powers, he finding caution before extract.”

Section 127 of the Winding up Act 1848 provides, “That this Act shall not apply to Scotland, except in so far as is by this Act specially provided.”

The Master in Chancery, on the report of the official manager, is empowered to determine the persons who shall be called “contributories,”—being the members of the company and every other person liable to contribute to the payment of any of the debts, liabilities, or loss. The 50th section provides that the official manager shall be entitled to insist in all “actions, suits, and proceedings at law or in equity,” and that “all debts which might be claimed by or on behalf of the Company against the estate of any

- No. 14. bankrupt or insolvent debtor to the Company, shall and may be proved against such estate by the official manager.”
- Nov. 20, 1856. Wryghte v. Lindsay. Section 83 is as follows:—“That at any time before the whole of the assets of such company shall have been collected or converted, and if the assets remaining to be collected or converted shall not be capable of being immediately realised, although such assets may not appear to be insufficient, and also after the assets of the company shall have been wholly exhausted, it shall be lawful for the Master, from time to time, to make calls on the contributories, or on such individual contributories, or classes of contributories, as he may think proper (but so far only as such contributories respectively shall be liable at law or in equity to pay the same), as well for raising such amount as may be necessary to pay the debts or liabilities, or any of the debts or liabilities of such company, or any part thereof, or the costs, charges, and expenses of winding up the same; as also for the purpose of adjusting and settling the respective claims of contributories upon each other, or upon the Company, whether such claims shall have arisen since or before the date of the petition for dissolution and winding up, or for winding up as the case may be; and the amount to be raised by means of such calls, and also the residue of the assets and estate of the Company after the payment of all debts and liabilities, costs, charges, and expenses shall be paid and distributed by the official manager under the directions of the Master, so and in such manner as shall (as far as possible) satisfy all such claims, and shall finally wind up and settle the affairs of the Company.”
- The 89th section provides, “That in case any money shall be due from the estate of a deceased contributory whose executor or administrator shall not admit assets, it shall be lawful for the Master to direct that any suit or action shall be brought, or other steps taken for compelling payment of what shall be so due, and for obtaining, if necessary, an administration of the estate of such deceased contributory, in or towards payment of his debts, and that any such suit or action shall and may be brought by the official manager by the style and designation aforesaid, and the production of the order, or an office copy of the order, for payment of any balance, shall be sufficient evidence of the debt, in respect of which action or suit shall be brought as aforesaid.”
- Section 116 enacts, “That, on production at the office in Edinburgh, kept for the registration of deeds, bonds, protests, and other writs registered in the books of Council and Session, of an office copy of any order of the Court, or of the Master, made in any proceeding under, or by virtue of this Act, and of an affidavit, that application has been duly made to the person mentioned in such order, for payment of the sum thereby ordered to be paid by him, and that default has been made in payment thereof; then such order shall thereupon be registerable, in like manner as a bond executed according to the law of Scotland, with a clause of registration therein contained; and decret shall be interponed to such order, upon which execution shall pass, in like manner as execution passes upon a decree interponed to such bond, and shall have the like effect upon and against the person named in such order as if he had executed such bond.”
- The Act of 1849 contains, inter alia, provisions authorising the examination of persons in Scotland, whether contributories or not, in reference to the estate of the company (sect. 21); and affidavits to be sworn in Scotland before any competent court or person (sect. 24); while by the 40th section, it is enacted, “That this Act shall not apply to Scotland, except so far as by this Act, or by the said Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Act 1848, is specially provided.”
- The 28th section provides, that the calls to be made by the Master on the contributories may be fixed, after taking into consideration “the probability, that some of the contributories upon whom the said call shall be made, should partly or wholly fail to pay their respective proportions of the same." No. 14.

 The 30th section is in these terms, "And be it enacted, that where any contributory of the Company is a bankrupt, or insolvent, it shall be lawful for the official manager to prove, in the matter of such bankruptcy or insolvency, for any balance ordered by the Master, to be proved against the estate of such contributory, and to take and receive dividends in respect of such balance in the matter of the bankruptcy or insolvency, as a separate debt due from such bankrupt or insolvent, and rateably with the other separate creditors. Provided always, that if any creditors of the Company, not being such petitioning creditor, under the fiat as after mentioned, shall have proved, or shall prove against the estate of such bankrupt or insolvent contributory, in respect of any debt due from the company, then the dividends received by the official manager from the estate of such bankrupt or insolvent contributory, shall be paid, and distributed by the official manager, under the direction of the Master, in the first instance, rateably amongst the creditors of the Company, so proving against the estate of such bankrupt or insolvent contributory as aforesaid, until the debts due to such creditors respectively be fully paid, and subject thereto such dividends shall be applied by the official managers towards the general purposes of the winding-up of the affairs of the Company. Provided also, that in case any such fiat shall have been issued on the petition of a joint creditor of the said company in respect of his joint debt, and he shall have proved such joint debt for the purpose of receiving dividends under such fiat, then any dividends paid to such petitioning creditor, under such proof, shall be set against the dividends payable to such official manager in respect of the proof so made by him as aforesaid, so far as the same will extend."

 Wryghte v.
 Lindsay.

The Lord Ordinary reported the case by interlocutor dated 4th June 1856.*

When the case was called for debate,

Penny, for the petitioner, submitted that the case was not competently before the Court. According to the statute, it was the Lord Ordinary and

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has reported this case, because the whole question, as to the appointment of Mr Lindsay as judicial factor, was recently before the Court; and because an interlocutor awarding sequestration is not subject to review, though an application may be made for its recall.

"No opposition has been offered to the prayer of the petition being granted by Sir James Walker Drummond, the heir-at-law and executor confirmed of the late Sir Francis Walker Drummond, or by Lady Walker Drummond, who, as a creditor of her husband, and as a beneficiary under his settlement, lately applied for and obtained the appointment of a judicial factor on his estate, and no objections have been stated by any of the other representatives of the deceased who have been cited. The only opposing party is Mr Donald Lindsay, who was appointed by the Court on the 11th March last to be "judicial factor on the estate, heritable and moveable, of the said deceased Sir Francis Walker Drummond, with the usual powers."

"It may be mentioned that, before the answers were lodged, a short discussion took place before the Lord Ordinary, in the course of which it was stated that if the petitioner's claim be sustained in the ranking to the full extent, the estate of the late Sir Francis Walker Drummond will not be sufficient to meet his debts and obligations. A deceased debtor's estate, however, may be sequestrated whether insolvent or not, and the existence of a previous trust-deed is no bar to the sequestration. If, therefore, the requisites of the Act have been complied with,—and, as at present advised, the Lord Ordinary is not satisfied that any of the objections to the form of the proceedings is well founded,—it is thought no sufficient cause has been shewn why sequestration should not be awarded, having regard to the embarrassed position in which the affairs of the estate now stand, and the important consideration that no opposition is offered by any of the relations or proper representatives of the late Sir Francis W. Drummond."

not this Division, who could award sequestration, and therefore the question was, when a case was thus reported, and the Court afterwards remitted to the Lord Ordinary to award sequestration, whether that would not be the act of the Inner House?

The Lord Ordinary was then sent for, and having appeared at the table,

LORD PRESIDENT.—A doubt has been raised whether, in this sequestration case, it is competent for the Inner House to pronounce an interlocutor, although it may be competent for the Lord Ordinary to advise with the Court. The interlocutor to be pronounced by us would bear to be a judgment of the Inner House on the report of the Lord Ordinary. The competency of that is doubted, and it occurs to us that a way of getting rid of the objection is to hold this interlocutor reporting the case as pronounced by inadvertency, to supersede and hold pro non scripto what has been since done, and to hold the case now to be verbally reported by your Lordship. We need not detain your Lordship for the argument, but we will let you know the result.

The argument was then proceeded with.

The petitioner pleaded;—That the Australian Bank itself would have been undoubtedly entitled to ask for sequestration of the estates of Sir Francis Walker Drummond. The petitioner, as official manager, came exactly in the place of the Company. He was creditor of the Company's debtors, and was in the position of a partner, appointed by co-partners, to collect all the debts and assets of the Company on the event of a dissolution. These Winding up Acts were said not to be applicable to Scotland, where there were Scotch partners of an English company. But Scotch debtors were liable to be prosecuted by the Company, and by the official manager as representing them in Scotland; and if entitled to prosecute in Scotland, they were entitled to all the remedies which the law of Scotland afforded. If the Company could sue out a sequestration, so could the official manager. He was required to collect the debts, and empowered to sue for them; and if so, he was entitled to do diligence, and therefore to sue sequestration.

The execution which the Act authorised for recovery of a debt of this nature, was not execution merely against the person, but against the estate of the debtor, in the same manner, and to the same effect, as if the debtor had executed a bond; and this was merely following up the general provisions of the statute authorising him to sue for and recover all debts, and take all manner of steps at law or in equity necessary for that purpose.

Applying these provisions to the present case, the petitioner's affidavit bore, that Sir James Walker Drummond was included amongst the contributories, but not in an individual capacity, but as representing the estate of his father. Therefore, it was the executry estate of the father which was the debtor. The affidavit farther set forth, that the call was made upon him as executor, and that a registered order was equivalent to a decree of the Court to make payment of the L.14,000 of debt due by his father. If the official manager was the proper creditor entitled to sue a sequestration, there was here a proper judgment set forth in the affidavit, and supported by the necessary documents.

Again, it was said that this was a contingent debt,—that is, a debt which could not be presently exacted. But this could be presently exacted, and not only so, but might be exacted by the most stringent of remedies—by horning and poinding. It had been farther urged, that the official manager might be possessed, in course of time, of so much money, that there might be a large balance over. But that did not make this less a present debt. Therefore, it was a mistake to say that the debt was contingent. It was the ultimate question of repeating that was contingent. It might, or might not be, that there would be funds over for dividing. But the debt was presently exigible. If contingent, as regarded Sir James Walker Drummond, it was equally contingent as regarded all the contributories; and therefore the purpose of the statute, which was intended to provide for immediate payment, would be defeated. It was a debt enforceable by all diligence of law, and therefore by the diligence of sequestration.¹

Wryghte v.
Lindsay.

The respondent pleaded;—First, that under the Winding-up Acts this was not a debt for which application could competently be made for sequestration; second, that it was not a debt due by Sir Francis Walker Drummond, or now by his estate; and, third, that there was no authority within the Acts of Parliament—which were the sole title of the petitioner—for suing such a remedy as the present.

The effect of inserting the name of a person in the list of contributories, was to make the party who was so inserted in the list the sole representative of the shares, in respect of which he was so inserted, and as respondent for the calls made upon them. The list of contributories being made up, the Act was to be directed against them. The power given to the Master in Chancery was an extraordinary power. It was not known to any ordinary contract of copartnery. It was one which might be exercised in the most tyrannical manner, for the Master in Chancery was perfectly uncontrollable. He had the unlimited disposal of the question, not only how much money be wanted, but also how it should be contributed, by what proportions, and by what individuals, or class of contributories. Under section 83, a person might be called on to pay a call which he was not liable for under the contract of copartnery as unpaid capital, nor liable to pay at common law; and if Sir Francis Walker Drummond had been alive, and had been inserted in a list of contributories, such a call might have been made upon him, but such call was not made, and never could be, for he died before the list was made up.

Again—this was a call, not for a debt due, but to make an advance under a statutory obligation. Suppose there had been no Winding-up Acts, and, for the purpose of bringing the affairs of the Company to a satisfactory conclusion, the partners had granted bonds for sums of money, such partners would have been in the position in which the contributories were. Suppose Sir Francis Walker Drummond had granted such a bond, that would not have been a ground for sequestrating his estate.

Take in connection with section 83 the 28th section of the new statute. This statute also provided for the making calls effectual, but the statute directed the mode of enforcing them only against contributories and their estates. There was no power to prove against the estate of anybody else. It runs throughout the statute that it is only against contributories and their estates that the Act is enforceable. “Contributories” could not mean a deceased partner and his executors. It was in contrast to every living member of the Company, who was not necessarily a proprietor or registered member of the Company.

It was said that the liability was incurred by Sir Francis in his lifetime, and was now due. Liability for what? Was it a debt due by the estate of the deceased? As a partner of the Company in 1844, his affairs were in a most flourishing condition, and the subscribed capital on his shares had been paid up. How, therefore, was he then liable for L.14,000? Yet that was the proposition now maintained by the petitioner. It was said to be a debt of the deceased’s estate; but at his death there was nothing owing by him, or by any other partner of the Company. There was a liability for the debts of the Company; but there were then no company debts. Therefore the liability referred to must be a liability for debts not then existing. But that could not be called a debt then existing and exigible against him and his estate. The debt never existed, in fact or in law, during the lifetime of Sir Francis, and therefore it was in the same position as if it had been brought into existence by his executor executing a bond, as the statute itself puts it. That was a debt of the executor, and it might be a debt of the executry estate; but it never was a debt of Sir Francis, and never of his estate while it remained in his hands. If this liability be admitted as a ground for sequestration, all the debts incurred by the executor in the management of the estate might equally be allowed as a ground for sequestration. But these were not debts of the deceased.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There can be no doubt that, by the law of Scotland, from a very remote period, the estate of a deceased debtor could be made available towards satisfaction of his debts and liabilities, whether the estate was heritable or personal, or whether any one came forward to represent him as heir or executor or not. The procedure is familiar, and of every day occurrence. There is no want of machinery for accomplishing it. But the particular process of sequestration and distribution, as in bankruptcy, of the estate of a deceased debtor, was introduced for the first time by the statute 2 and 3 Vict. cap. 41. Neither is there any doubt that, according to the law of Scotland, Sir Francis, by becoming a partner of the Company, and signing the contract, bound himself, and his estate, for the fulfilment of all the obligations which he thereby undertook; for example, for payment of the whole sum subscribed or effeiring to his subscription, if required, and even beyond that to contribute towards payment of the ascertained debts of the Company, contracted while he continued to be a partner. That liability he, according to the law of Scotland, and in the case of a Scotch Company, would be held to have contracted; and there can be no doubt that his estate might be made available for that purpose, either at the instance of the creditors of the Company, or in a question with the copartners. But the question here does not relate to this abstract principle, as to which there can be no doubt, and which is not disputed; nor is the question whether, if this had been a Scotch Company, the estate of Sir Francis might not have been so reached and made available. But what the respondent, Mr Lindsay, disputes, is the right of the petitioner to sue a sequestration under the statute 2 and 3 Vict. cap. 41. That is the question we have to deal with.

The statute 2 and 3 Vict. cap. 41, has extended the application of the process of sequestration to various classes of cases, to which it was not previously applicable. Among others, it has extended it to the estates of persons deceased. That is in some respects treated in the statute as an exceptional class, and special provisions are made in regard to it; but I do not see that anything in this case turns on these special provisions. This is a case in which more than six months had elapsed from the death of the party, and in such a case the petitioning creditor is not required to prove the insolvency of the estate in order to get diligence on his petition. But in every case of sequestration of the estate of a deceased debtor, the leading requisites of the statute are, in the first place, that the deceased party whose estate is sought to be sequestrated shall have been a debtor—a deceased debtor; and, in the second place, that the party who petitions for sequestration shall be in the position of a creditor of the deceased to a certain amount. The present case turns on the question whether these relations subsist between Mr Wryghte and the late Sir Francis Walker Drummond, with reference to the sum of L.14,000 mentioned in the affidavit, and on which the present application is rested.

I am of opinion that the evidence does not instruct the existence of that relation so as to warrant the awarding of the sequestration applied for. I do not think, that in regard to the L.14,000 mentioned in the affidavit, Sir Francis Walker Drummond can be regarded as a deceased debtor in the sense of the statute 2 and 3 Victoria, or that Mr Wryghte can be held to be a creditor having a debt to that amount against Sir Francis. This leads me to inquire how that debt of L.14,000 arises, of what it consists, and what is Mr Wryghte's title to demand it. It is not a debt which Sir Francis is said to have contracted to the Company in any transactions with them as bankers, or otherwise. Mr Wryghte is the official manager appointed under the Winding-up Acts, and the L.14,000, as I trace it, is the amount of a call made by him in virtue of the powers conferred on him by these Acts, to make calls on those persons whom the statute describes as contributories. In that view of the matter, it is necessary to examine the provisions of the Acts in regard to the making of calls, and undoubtedly the powers which are conferred on the official manager in that respect are very great. The leading provisions applicable to that subject, and to which I particularly direct attention, are section 83 of the Act 1848, and section 28 of the Act 1849, which comes in place of section 83 of the previous Act.

Wryghte v.
Lindsay.

It appears to me that, from the power thereby conferred to make calls, it results that the power vested in the official manager, under some control from the Master in Chancery, is a very expansive power, and reaches to the various matters which I shall particularly have to notice. At present I may remark, that the calls, such as they are, and whatever their object, are to be made from certain persons designated as contributories, and not necessarily from the whole contributories rateably, but may be made from certain of them selected arbitrarily. But before stating what I think is the import of the power of making calls, I wish to direct attention to the classes of the statute, which form a sort of code of regulations for making up a statutory list, which shall be conclusive, of the persons who are to be treated as contributories—sections 76, 77, and 79 of the Act of 1848.

Now, from all these provisions in the statute, it is clear, in regard to the calls referred to in section 83, that, in the first place, the call is not limited to the payment of the subscribed capital or input stock. In the second place, that the call is not limited to a proportional share of the debts, nor even to the whole debts of the Company, but comprehends other things, such as claims arising or coming into existence after the Winding-up Act has come into operation. In the third place, it is not to replace losses, but may be made, although there has been no loss by the Company, and no deficiency of assets. In the fourth place, it is substantially a call for an advance of money, or an impressment of funds in the meantime, which may, in part or in whole, be afterwards repeated from the assets of the Company. There is a special provision to that effect. In the fifth place, it is not necessarily made on all the contributories. It may be made only on individuals, or a class of them; and although that does not appear to have been done here, it is of some importance in considering the nature and qualities of the claim. In the sixth place, the parties against whom alone the statute authorises the enforcement of the call are the contributories—being, I suppose, the persons whose names shall be on the authorised and authenticated statutory list.

A call so made is a statutory demand of a very peculiar kind. The liability for it is a statutory liability. The right to make it, and the liability to satisfy it, both spring from statute. They had no legal existence before the date of the statute, so far as has been explained to us. The Company was an English Company, but we have not been told, as matter of fact, that, according to the law of England, such a demand could have been made and enforced before the date of the statute. We know that, by the law of Scotland, it certainly could not. The statute does not extend to Scotland, except in certain portions of it. So far as it does extend, our duty, of course, is to apply it. I am now dealing with the peculiar character of the claim on which Mr Wryghte rests his title in this case.

Having explained the nature of the calls authorised by the statute to be made against certain contributories, I shall now advert to the affidavit of the petitioner in support of his title. From this affidavit it appears that the sum of L.14,000, upon which Mr Wryghte rests his title, is the amount of a call made by him under the authority of the statute, for the purposes and with the qualities to which I have referred. He states in the affidavit that Sir Francis Walker Drummond was, before his death, liable to make payment of L.3850, as the balance of a contribution of L.50 per share on the 140 shares held by him of the capital stock of the Company. This application, however, is not for sequestrating the estate in respect of the non-payment of that sum. The petitioner says farther, that Sir Francis Walker Drummond is liable to make payment "for what other additional sums might fall on him as his proportional share of the losses incurred by the said Company." This is not a claim for any such proportional share of the losses of the Company. It does not appear from the affidavit that there was any such loss;—there were no ascertained losses, and no proportionment of loss to each shareholder. The demand for sequestration is not rested on any such claim. The statement made in the affidavit may be true; and if so, it is equally true that, if a claim be made habile modo for relieving those liabilities, the law of Scotland affords the means of making it good. But such claims are not the subject-matter of this demand. The ground of this demand is a sum of L.14,000, called for under the authority of the Winding-up Acts, for the purposes there mentioned, under the discretion there given, with the chance of repayment thereof—for the accomplishment of the temporary objects there mentioned—the impressment of cash in hand. That is the nature of the demand. The petitioner says, in the end of the affidavit—and there it is that he seems to bring the matter to a point—that a liability for this L.14,000 was incurred by Sir Francis Walker Drummond, anterior to his death, and that the same is now due from his estate to the deponent, as official manager. I do not know how that can be. It is not deducible from any facts stated. It is not stated that any such liability was possible by the law of England prior to his death, or otherwise, than under this statute. But the statute did not exist for years after his death. What meaning is attached in the affidavit to the word “liability” I do not know. The term may, in the law of England, be appropriate to such a case, and the meaning attached to it by the maker of this affidavit no doubt enables him to swear that there is a liability. But we are now dealing with a matter of remedy according to the law of Scotland. We are dealing with a remedy sought under the statute 2 & 3 Victoria, cap. 41, and the call of L.14,000 is clearly not a debt due by the deceased Sir Francis Walker Drummond in the sense of that statute. But the case must be brought up to that point. Sir Francis must have been a deceased debtor in that L.14,000. I cannot see any way of construing the facts, so as to bring matters into that position, nor can I see how this L.14,000 had any shape or subsistence while Sir Francis was alive. It was the creature of statute, brought into existence after his death. No doubt Parliament could make his estates liable for debts contracted by anybody else,—it is omnipotent,—but we have not that kind of liability to deal with here, and no statute has said that the estate of a deceased debtor is to be liable to sequestration for such a claim as this. We must in this proceeding read the claim with reference to the 41st section of the Act of 2 & 3 Victoria, and I do not find in the whole of this affidavit, or in the history of this sum, anything to constitute Sir Francis Drummond a deceased debtor for the sum of L.14,000 referred to, or to make the claimant a creditor of Sir Francis in a debt of his for that sum. In that view of the matter, I cannot see how it is to be regarded as a claim under which sequestration can be awarded.

But the statute itself, while it gives this very great power and latitude of making calls for winding up the estate, which may be a very wise thing, and beneficial for everybody, has also provided the machinery for making the power effectual; and it has, among the most leading provisions, pointed out the parties against whom the power is to be directed. They are the parties whose names are included in a certain statutory list as contributories. I do not say whether there might not have been grounds for proceeding to any extremities as regards the contributories, but Sir Francis Walker Drummond is not in that list. If Sir Francis had been in that list, and had died pending proceedings, I pronounce no opinion whether the Act of 2 & 3 Victoria might not have come into play; for it might then have been held to be a debt in some sense of the word. But Sir Francis is not in that list; and the question is not whether there is any remedy against the estate of Sir Francis, but whether this particular remedy of sequestration of his estate can follow upon such a demand as this, when the statute which creates the demand has pointed out other parties as the parties who are to be debtors in the demand. There may be, and no doubt there are, modes of getting at the executry estate of Sir Francis. But these modes are very different from sequestration under the 2d & 3d of Victoria.

The statute under which the petitioner is acting says, that the registration of the order by the Master in Chancery and of the affidavit, becomes equivalent to a decree of sequestration. They have been so recorded, and diligence against Sir James Walker Drummond has passed upon them. That is the highest point to which the claim can be pushed in the way of giving it the aspect of a debt. But is that enough? I shall suppose that Sir James Walker Drummond had executed a bond, narrating all the steps that are narrated in this affidavit, and narrating all

and had by that bond bound himself to pay. That would not, in my opinion, have altered the position of things. It would not make this claim a debt of Sir Francis Nov. 21, 1856.
in the sense of the 2d & 3d of Victoria; and therefore, in every view which I Hosie v.
have been able to take of this case, the remedy sought is not a suitable remedy. Edinburgh
The petitioner does not possess the relation to the deceased which the statute and Glasgow of 2 & 3 Victoria requires, prior to authorising the issuing of sequestration. Railway Co.
It is satisfactory at same time to know, that the estate of the deceased is in safe keeping. It is under judicial authority and management, and no danger can result from the party being obliged to resort to the ordinary remedies—if he is entitled to them—which a creditor must resort to, independent of the Act of 2 & 3 Victoria.

LORD IVORY.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I also agree, and have nothing to add.

LORD DEAS.—I entirely agree with the grounds of judgment stated by your Lordship. The Winding-up Acts do not apply to Scotland, except in so far as specially provided. It is provided that an order of the Master, registered here, shall have the same effect against the person named in the order as a registered bond by that person would have had. But a bond executed by Sir James, for this L.14,000, would not have entitled the official manager to the particular remedy now sought against the estate of Sir Francis under the statutes 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 53. The fact would have remained, that Sir Francis was not a deceased debtor on this L.14,000, in the sense of these statutes.

On 18th July 1856, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—
“Having advised with the Lords of the First Division of the Court, Refuses the petition for sequestration: Finds the petitioner liable in expenses,” &c.

Against this interlocutor the petitioner reclaimed. Of this date,

THE COURT adhered.

founded on the Railway Clauses Act it was incompetent, repelled (diss. Lord Deas.)

THE petitioner, James Hosie, was a coal lessee at Bathgate. In the pre-Nov. 21, 1856.
sent application he set forth that he had occasion to make use of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, with its branches, for the conveyance of the 1ST DIVISION. produce of his mineral fields, and that the Company exacted from him a rate Ld. Mackenzie of 3s. 1½d. per ton; but that he had ascertained that the Company conveyed L.
the produce of other mineral fields in the same district, over the same portion of their lines, and for the same or for a greater distance, at different and lower rates. The petitioner specified one instance of the preference he explained of, and stated (art. 12) that “similar preferences were given by the respondents to other traders, thus subjecting the petitioner to an undue and unreasonable disadvantage;” that he had complained thereof to the Railway Company, but that they refused to give any redress.

The petition was founded upon sect. 83* of the Act 8 & 9 Vict. cap. 33;

* “Whereas it is expedient that the Company should be enabled to vary the rates upon the railway, so as to accommodate them to the circumstances of the traf-

And it prayed the Court to find that the preference stated by the petitioner “was a contravention and violation of the statutes, and, in particular, of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act; and to interdict the Railway Company from continuing such violation or contravention of the said Act, and to enjoin obedience to the same, with certification that, in case of disobedience, the Court will proceed in terms of the said statute.”

Hosie v.
Edinburgh
and Glasgow
Railway Co.

The Court remitted to the Junior Lord Ordinary to make up a record, which having been done, his Lordship made great avizandum to the Court.

The respondents now pleaded (first plea); —1. That in so far as the petition was founded on the Act 8 & 9 Victoria, cap. 33, it was incompetent. Actions founded on the statute could be raised only by way of ordinary action.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The only matter for decision at present is the objection taken to the competency of the petition. No question has yet been raised as to the relevancy or sufficiency of the averments, except in regard to the 12th article of the condescendence, and as to it there has been no argument. I shall, therefore, confine my observations to the objection of incompetency. That objection has been creating a monopoly, either in the hands of the Company or of particular parties; it shall be lawful, therefore, for the Company, subject to the provisions and limitations herein and in the special Act contained, from time to time to alter or vary the tolls by the special Act authorised to be taken, either upon the whole or upon any particular portions of the railway, as they shall think fit; provided that all such tolls be at all times charged equally to all persons, and after the same rate, whether per ton, per mile, or otherwise, in respect of all passengers, and of all goods or carriages of the same description, and conveyed or propelled by a like carriage or engine, passing only over the same portion of the line of railway under the same circumstances; and no reduction or advance in any such tolls shall be made, either directly or indirectly, in favour of or against any particular company or person travelling upon or using the railway.”

† “That every Railway Company, Canal Company, and Railway and Canal Company shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable facilities for the receiving and forwarding and delivering of traffic upon and from the several railways and canals belonging to or worked by such companies respectively, and for the return of carriages, trucks, boats, and other vehicles, and no such company shall make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to, or in favour of, any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic in any respect whatsoever, nor shall any such company subject any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever. And every railway company and canal company, and railway and canal company, having or working railways and canals which form part of a continuous line of railway or canal, or railway and canal communication, or which have the terminus, station, or wharf of the one near the terminus, station, or wharf of the other, shall afford all due and reasonable facilities for receiving and forwarding all the traffic arriving by one of such railways or canals by the other, without any unreasonable delay, and without any such preference, advantage, or prejudice, or disadvantage as aforesaid, and so that no obstruction may be offered to the public desirous of using such railways or canals, or railways and canals, as a continuous line of communication, and so that all reasonable accommodation may, by means of the railways and canals of the several companies, be at all times afforded to the public in that behalf.”

By the same statute, sect. 3, it is provided that “it shall be lawful for any company or person complaining against any such companies or company of anything done, or of any omission made in violation or contravention of this Act, to apply in a summary way, by motion or summons, in England to her Majesty’s Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, or in Ireland to any of her Majesty’s superior courts in Dublin, or in Scotland to the Court of Session in Scotland, as the case may be, to any Judge of any such Court.”

put in this way :—The petition, it is said, is founded on alleged contravention of two several statutes—viz. 8th & 9th Vict. c. 33, being the General Railway Clauses Act, and the 18th & 19th Vict. c. 31, being the Railway and Canal Traffic Act—No. 15.
Nov. 21, 1856.
Hosie v.
Edinburgh
and Glasgow
Railway Co. and it is said, that although procedure by summary petition to the Court of Session may be competent in the case of an alleged contravention of the Traffic Act, that form of procedure is not sanctioned by the Railway Clauses Act, and is not competent in the case of an alleged contravention of that Act. Consequently, according to the contention of the respondents, the present petition, in so far as it is founded on the Railway Clauses Act, and sets forth a contravention of that Act, is incompetent, and ought to be dismissed. I am not disposed to adopt that view of the case. The petition, in so far as it is founded on alleged contravention of the Traffic Act, is not said to be incompetent; and there is nothing complained of in the petition that is not alleged to be a contravention of the Traffic Act. The Railway Clauses Act is also founded on; and I am not of opinion that the use made of the Railway Clauses Act in the petition is an incompetent use, or renders the petition to any extent incompetent. The facts alleged in the petition, and there founded on as constituting a contravention of the Traffic Act, amount in substance to this, that undue or unreasonable preference or advantage over the petitioner is given by the respondents to certain other parties, inasmuch as their coals are carried at rates less than those charged against the petitioner, in the circumstances and to the extent set forth. It is not contended that a contravention of the Traffic Act may not be committed in that way. But a contravention of the Railway Clauses Act may also be committed in that way. The 2d section of the Traffic Act is so comprehensive as to include and reach things prohibited by the Railway Clauses Act; and it would not be a good objection to a petition and complaint, rested solely on the Traffic Act, that the facts there alleged were also prohibited by the 83d section of the Railway Clauses Act. On the contrary, in considering whether the particular advantage or preference complained of was an undue or unreasonable one, some light might be derived legitimately enough from the circumstance, that it was the very thing prohibited by the Railway Clauses Act. The Railway Clauses Act itself does not attach any particular consequence to the doing of the thing which it prohibits, nor does it prescribe any particular form of proceeding against contraveners. But the Traffic Act is more perfect. It does attach certain consequences to contraventions, and does prescribe the course of proceeding by summary petition in reference to all modes that may be resorted to of giving undue or unreasonable preference, not excluding that particular mode specially prohibited by the Railway Clauses Act. If that be so, then the statement in the petition, that the thing complained of has been done in contravention of the express prohibition contained in the 83d section of the Railway Clauses Act, as well as in contravention of the Railway Traffic Act, does not make the petition incompetent. The operative part of the prayer of the petition is founded truly on the Traffic Act. It prays the Court to find that the preference or advantage complained of, “is a contravention and violation of the said statutes, and, in particular, of the said Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, by the said Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, and to interdict the said Company from continuing such violation or contravention of the said Act (i. e. the Railway and Canal Traffic Act), and to enjoin obedience to the same,” &c. All this would have been unobjectionable, if the Railway Clauses Act had not been recited in the petition; and I do not think that the recital of it raises any good objection to the competency of the petition. The conduct prohibited by the Railway Clauses Act may be also a violation of the Traffic Act; and the form of proceeding prescribed by that Act is the same in regard to all violations or contraventions of it—none other can be adopted.

LORDS IVORY and CURRIEHILL concurred.

LORD DEAS.—I should have had no objection to the statute 8 & 9 Vict. cap. 33, being quoted narrative in a petition and complaint under the statute 17 & 18 Vict. cap. 31. But it appears to me that this petition is laid upon both these statutes as expressly as any petition well can be. It is made matter of statement that the Railway Company “have violated the provisions of the statutes now recited”—that is both the statutes recited—and that “the petitioner makes the present complaint under the statutes”—that is to say, under both statutes. Then the prayer craves the Court to find that the preference complained of is “a contravention and

No. 15. violation of the said statutes." Such being the terms of the petition and prayer, I see no reason to doubt, that although the second statute were altogether struck out of the petition, the petitioners might, if the petition were otherwise unobjectionable, stand upon their petition as a petition and complaint under the first statute. This directly raises the question, whether a petition and complaint of this kind be competent under the first statute? I am not able to see that it is so. I think this petition and complaint is liable to a twofold objection. In the first place, I agree with the Dean of Faculty that the remedy of summary application, in this Court, is limited to certain well defined classes of cases, which I need not enumerate, and of which this admittedly is not one, unless the terms of these statutes have made it so. Summary applications to the Judge Ordinary are competent, by usage and express Act of Sederunt, in all cases requiring extraordinary dispatch. But in this Court even an interdict cannot be obtained, in the ordinary case, by summary petition, but only by note of suspension and interdict in the Bill-Chamber. The statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 33, contains no provision as to the remedy; and I cannot apply the forms provided by the second statute to an offence complained of under the first statute. The applicability of these forms is, by the second statute, expressly limited to complaints laid upon that statute; and I am not prepared to say that an offence under the one statute must necessarily be, in all cases, an offence under the other statute. I think the enactments in the two statutes are different. Whether the difference may be substantial, as affecting the merits of the present case, I do not wish to say, or even to allow myself seriously to consider; because I can easily see that this may be made the subject of important argument. It is enough for the present purpose that there is a difference.

2. Wherever a finding, such as is asked in the prayer of this petition and complaint, is competent in a summary form at all, it is as being introductory to some petitory conclusion. But here (so far as relates to the first statute) the finding prayed for is introductory to nothing. The interdict (as your Lordship in the chair has observed) is asked under the second statute only; and the penalty is exigible under the second statute only. There is no penalty attached to the enactment in the first statute. The abstract finding prayed for, under the first statute, is therefore incompetent, except in a regular action of declarator.

On these grounds I think the petition and complaint should be found to be incompetent, in so far as laid on the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 33.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repel the first plea in law for the respondents: Sustain, of consent, the fourth plea in law for the respondents: Quoad ultra allow a proof to both parties: Grant commission," &c.

Entail—Act 10 Geo. III. cap. 5 (Montgomery Act)—Act 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36 (Rutherford Act).—Procedure under entail petition for authority to grant bonds and dispositions in security where the improvement debt is constituted by a decree of declarator, not yet final, under the Montgomery Act, and the consenting heirs are minors.

Entail.—New roofs to existing buildings are not "permanent improvements."

Nov. 21, 1856. THE petitioner was heir of entail in possession of the entailed estate of Annandale. The present application was presented for authority to charge the fee of the estate with L.5013, 14s. 2d. of improvement debt. The expenditure was made partly prior and partly subsequent to the passing of the Rutherford Act. The improvement debt had been constituted by decrees of declarator under the Montgomery Act. The decrees were obtained in 1849, 1853, and on 20th March 1856. All the decrees passed in absence, and the last, which was for L.3144, 1s. 11d., was not yet final under the 26th section of the Montgomery Act—twelve months from its date not yet having elapsed.

The three nearest heirs of entail were the pupil children of the petitioner's eldest son, now deceased. Their brother, Sir Graham Montgomery, and Mr Hope Scott of Abbotsford, were their tutors nominate. The Court, on 18th July 1856, appointed a tutor ad litem to the pupils. Intimation and advertisement were duly made, and service was also made edictally upon the pupils and their mother. No answers were lodged.

On a remit to Mr Duncan, W.S., he reported that, to account of the sums contained in the decree of 1840, a sum of L.1683, 16s. of consigned railway money was paid in 1849, under the authority of the Court, in terms of the Lands Clauses Act. In accordance, however, with the recent case of Fleeming,¹ the improvement debt so extinguished did not require to be taken into account in estimating the amount of improvement debt of which the heir in possession was entitled to repayment under the Montgomery Act. With regard to the decrees of declarator, the Reporter suggested that the procedure in this case might be regulated by the procedure in the case of Murray Stewart,* where, in circumstances similar to the present, a minute by the tutor superseded the necessity of an inspection of the improvements by a practical man, or any examination of the vouchers by a professional man. Here the decrees of 1849 and 1853 being final, such minute might apply merely to the improvement debt constituted by the decree of 20th March 1856.

On 7th November 1856, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Before answer, appoints Mr James Adam, S.S.C., tutor ad litem to the three next heirs of entail mentioned in the petition, who are all in pupillarity, to lodge a minute in process stating whether he is satisfied that the sums contained in the decree of declarator of 20th March 1856 have been bona fide expended by the petitioner in permanent improvements upon the entailed estate, of the nature, and to not more than the extent contemplated by the Act 10 Geo. III. cap. 51, and whether such expenditure has been duly and properly vouched."

The tutor lodged a minute stating that he was satisfied that the sums had

The decree of declarator which was obtained under the Montgomery Act was dated 23d January 1856, so that the twelve months under which no appeal was competent had not yet elapsed. The Lord Ordinary reported the case to the 1st Division, and on 20th June 1856 pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having advised with the 1st Division of the Court, appoints Mr James Adam, the curator ad litem appointed by the Court, to give in a minute stating whether he is satisfied that the sums mentioned in the petition have been bona fide expended by the petitioner in permanent improvements upon the entailed estate, of the nature and not more than the extent contemplated and provided for by the Act 10 Geo. III. cap. 51, and whether the expenditure in said improvements has been duly and properly vouched."

The Lord Ordinary also of same date remitted to Mr Duncan, W.S. to inquire and report.

The tutor and reporter both expressed themselves in their reports satisfied in all respects—certain doubtful charges having been withdrawn by the petitioner to avoid discussion.

On 15th July 1856 the Lord Ordinary again reported the case, and the Court pronounced an interlocutor interponing their authority in usual terms.

Judicial factor—Authority—Division of Heritage—Expenses.—A judicial factor was appointed on the declinature of testamentary trustees to accept. One purpose of the trust was to convey to two children, on their attaining majority, their proportion of certain heritage. On the eldest attaining majority, the factor, in whose person the title stood, applied to the Court for authority to divide the heritable subjects, and convey the share to the child who was of age;—Held (1), that it was incompetent so to divide heritable subjects, but the prayer having been amended, authority to convey the pro indiviso share under the trust-settlement was granted; (2), that the expenses of amending the application formed a good charge against the trust-estate.

1ST DIVISION.

THE petitioner was appointed judicial factor on the trust-estate of the late Mr Buchanan, the trustees having declined to act. By the trust-deed, Mr Buchanan directed his trustees "to convey and make over to the children of my said deceased sister respectively, on their respectively attaining the age of majority, the proportion of my means and estate, or of the prices and produce thereof, provided to the said children as aforesaid, with the interest accruing on the said proportion."

The children of the truster's sister were the compeerer, John Isaac Crawcour, who was now of age, and his sister, Simina Helen Crawcour. An affidavit of the compeerer's majority by his father, Edward Crawcour, was produced. This petition, after setting forth the facts, stated, "that since the title to the heritable property stood at present in the petitioner's name for the joint behoof of John Isaac Crawcour and his sister, it was necessary to obtain the authority of your Lordships to have it divided; and as the subjects to be divided consisted of four houses of different values, the petitioner was desirous of having the concurrence in the proposed division of Edward Crawcour, as administrator-in-law to his daughter, who was still a minor, and of Mrs Cooke, for any interest her children might have in their late uncle's estate."

The petition prayed for approval of the petitioner's accounts, and thereafter to authorise him "to divide the heritable subjects held by him in trust for the joint behoof of the said John Isaac Crawcour and Simina Helen Crawcour; and to make over, assign, dispoise, and convey to the said John Isaac Crawcour (on his producing evidence to the satisfaction of your Lordships that he has attained majority), the share of the said heritable subjects, and to pay to him the share of the moveable estate to which he is entitled under the trust-disposition of the said James Buchanan—the said John Isaac Crawcour granting the necessary discharge."

On 16th July 1856, the Lord Ordinary reported in favour of the prayer of the petition.

LORD IVORY objected that the prayer was not applicable to the circumstances of the case, and that it was incompetent to divide heritable subjects, and dispoise part of them in terms of the prayer of the petition.

Some years afterwards he executed a codicil, which commenced thus:—
"I, James Warroch, author of the foregoing deed, having taken the same after my revisal, and considering that my niece, Catharine Paxton Pursell, now Gowan, has, since the date thereof, been comfortably married, but without issue, under which circumstance that part of my fortune destined to her by said deed to devolve ultimately upon my heirs-at-law upon her decease, but in consideration of the bountiful provision made for her by her husband, in the event of his death, and his tender affection towards her, I reverse that clause, and hereby commit to her discretion alone, as she may hereafter see cause, the sole and ultimate disposal of L.2000 sterling, as by the foresaid deed provided, but subject to the payment of L.10 sterling yearly to Barbara Gowan, my second cousin, and aunt to my niece and her husband (in consequence of their marriage), to be paid out of or from the interest arising from said L.2000 sterling, during all the days of the said Barbara Gowan's natural life."

Dr John Warroch Pursell, on the death of the truster, accepted and acted as trustee down to his death, which took place in 1835. Before which time, though several of the annuitants had died, the annuities were never reduced to L.20; nor did this event happen till the death of Euphemia Warroch in January 1839.

Dr Pursell, who died without issue, left a trust-settlement; and to his trustees a deed of factory was granted by Mrs Gowan, on the narrative that the management of James Warroch's estate had devolved upon her. During her life all the other annuitants died; finally she herself died intestate, and without issue, in 1849.

On her death a variety of claims were made upon the estate, and tried in joined actions of multipoleinding, declarator, and exoneration, at the instance of Dr Pursell's trustees, and of exhibition, count, reckoning, and payment against them.

These claims depended upon the different views taken as to the vesting of the different portions of the estate. 1. One view was that the residue had vested in Dr Pursell, and fell to be regulated by his settlement. 2. A second, that the condition on which it was to have vested in Dr Pursell not having merged during his life, it had vested in Catherine Paxton Pursell, who had become Mrs Gowan, and therefore fell to her heirs and representatives. 3. A third, that it had never vested in either of these parties, and so the destina-

Newbigging.

Some years afterwards he executed a codicil, which commenced thus:—“I, James Warroch, author of the foregoing deed, having taken the same under my revisal, and considering that my niece, Catharine Paxton Pursell, now Gowan, has, since the date thereof, been comfortably married, but without issue, under which circumstance that part of my fortune destined to her is by said deed to devolve ultimately upon my heirs-at-law upon her decease, but in consideration of the bountiful provision made for her by her husband, in the event of his death, and his tender affection towards her, I reverse that clause, and hereby commit to her discretion alone, as she may hereafter see cause, the sole and ultimate disposal of L.2000 sterling, as by the foresaid deed provided, but subject to the payment of L.10 sterling yearly to Barbara Gowan, my second cousin, and aunt to my niece and her husband (in consequence of their marriage), to be paid out of or from the interest arising from said L.2000 sterling, during all the days of the said Barbara Gowan's natural life.”

Dr John Warroch Pursell, on the death of the truster, accepted and acted as trustee down to his death, which took place in 1835. Before which time, though several of the annuitants had died, the annuities were never reduced to L.20; nor did this event happen till the death of Euphemia Warroch in February 1839.

Dr Pursell, who died without issue, left a trust-settlement; and to his trustees a deed of factory was granted by Mrs Gowan, on the narrative that the management of James Warroch's estate had devolved upon her. On her death a variety of claims were made upon the estate, and tried in joined actions of multiplepoinding, declarator, and exoneration, at the instance of Dr Pursell's trustees, and of exhibition, count, reckoning, and assent against them.

These claims depended upon the different views taken as to the vesting of the different portions of the estate. 1. One view was that the residue had vested in Dr Pursell, and fell to be regulated by his settlement. 2. A second, that the condition on which it was to have vested in Dr Pursell not having occurred during his life, it had vested in Catherine Paxton Pursell, who had become Mrs Gowan, and therefore fell to her heirs and representatives. 3. A third, that it had never vested in either of these parties, and so the destination in James Warroch's settlement came into operation. Other points were also raised as, 4. Whether Mrs Gowan's interest in the L.2000, of which the settlement gave her the life, was by the codicil converted into a fee? and 5. Whether the free income of the trust-estate, after payment of the legacies and annuities, from the date of the death to the date of the vesting of the residue, ought to be considered as part of the residue? or whether, as regards this James Warroch, he was to be treated as having died intestate? 6. Whether the period when the residue had vested was not the death of Euphemia Warroch?

Taking one or other of these views,—

I. John Pursell, as heir-at-law of Mrs Gowan, in whom he contended that the estate had vested, claimed the heritage, while Mrs Agnes Pursell or Hislop and others, as executors qua next of kin and representatives of Mrs Gowan, claimed inter alia arrears of her annuity due at her death, and the legacy of L.2000, as well as the residue of James Warroch's personal estate.

In the event of its being held that the residue had not vested in Mrs Gowan, they claimed ab intestato, as the testator's next of kin, the arrears of the free income after satisfying the trust, which they maintained did not fall to be considered as part of the residue. Among the pleas which they stated were:—"6, There was no disposal by James Warroch's settlement of the free income of his trust-estate from the date of his death until the vesting of the fee of the residue, which free income fell to his next of kin, Euphemia Warroch and Ann Warroch or Pursell, and the claimants are now entitled to Euphemia Warroch's half, as in right of her and Mrs Gowan. 7, If it should be held that the residue of James Warroch's estate did not vest in Mrs Gowan, the L.2000 mentioned in the settlement vested in her as a special legacy, and now belongs, with interest since the death of the testator, to the claimants as her next in kin."

II. Mrs Barbara Steel or Newbigging and others, as representing Barbara and Catherine Warroch, and as being the only children of James Warroch's cousins-german alive at the death of Mrs Gowan, when they contended that the destination in the trust-deed took effect, claimed to have the whole estate divided among them.

III. William Elder and others, as grandchildren of Sarah Gee Warroch or Hunter—Mrs Margaret Browning or Smith and others, as grandchildren of Barbara Warroch—James Maxwell Strange and others, as grandchildren of Catherine Warroch (although in each of these cases their parents had predeceased Mrs Gowan)—claimed proportions of the estate of James Warroch, on the footing of its never having vested in Dr Pursell, and of their being entitled to share with the other representatives of the testator's cousins-german.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutors:—

"Finds that according to the sound construction and true meaning of the trust-disposition and settlement of James Warroch, of date 6th April 1805 and codicil annexed, of date 30th May 1812, the late Dr John Warroch Pursell had, at the period of his death, obtained no vested interest in the residue of the trust-estate: Finds that Catharine Paxton Pursell or Gowan whether by survivance of her brother, the said Dr John Warroch Pursell and of the annuitants under the trust-disposition, or otherwise, did not possess or obtain any beneficial interest in the residue, heritable or moveable of said trust-estate: Finds that Dr John Warroch Pursell and Catharine Paxton Pursell or Gowan having died leaving no legitimate issue, and the residue not having vested in Dr Pursell, the beneficial interest in the residue of the trust-estate devolved upon and belonged to and became vested in the children of the testator's cousins-german, Sarah Gee and Barbara and Catharine Warroch, in terms of the substitution in their favour in the testator's settlement; and with these findings, orders the cause to the roll, No. 18. in order to further procedure."*

Nov. 25, 1856.
Pursell v.
Newbigging.

* "NOTE.—Though a plea is put upon record for more than one set of claimants, that the fee of the trust-estate had vested in Dr Pursell, it was not seriously insisted in by any, and was abandoned by the counsel for one of the parties. The Lord Ordinary has had no difficulty in holding that Dr Pursell had taken no vested interest in the residue of the trust-estate. The matter of contention at this stage has been, and the only point debated before the Lord Ordinary was, whether Mrs Gowan, by her survivance of her brother and of the annuitants, had right to the residue, which had become vested in her as conditional institute, and now belongs to her representatives; or, whether the children of the cousins of the testator, under the substitution in their favour, took the residue upon the failure of issue, not only of Dr Pursell, but also of Mrs Gowan? The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the beneficial interest in the residue of the trust-estate has devolved upon these parties, under the clause of substitution, or of conditional institution, as it may perhaps be thought to come up to.

The parties claiming through Mrs Gowan, who died intestate, are, John Pursell, who has expedite a general service as her nearest and lawful heir, and Mrs Hlop and others, who have been decerned her executors-dative, qua nearest of kin. These parties are also the representatives of the testator, in so far as any part of his estate might be held to have been undisposed of, or bequests to have failed, and the testator to have died intestate. There is a plea raised, that there was no disposal by the testator of the free income of his trust-estate from the date of his death until the vesting of the fee of the residue. This point was not argued, and remains undisposed of.

It appears to the Lord Ordinary to have been the meaning and intention of the truster to limit Catharine Paxton Pursell, afterwards Mrs Gowan, to the annuity and special bequests, contingently and under conditions, bestowed upon her if she married, and upon her children, if she had any. These are, by the first part of the deed, under the third purpose of the trust, an annuity of L.50, while unmarried, and, when married with the approbation of her parents and brother, L.100 of 'dowry,' and L.100 for clothing and trinkets, and the above annuity then to cease and terminate. In the after part of the deed, in that place where, upon a certain event, the testator makes over his whole estate to Dr Pursell, he assigns him with payment to Miss Pursell, his sister, of the legal interest of L.1000, to be paid to her if unmarried, but if married, and the previous L.1000 had been paid, then with the interest of only L.2000, or such other sum as, with the money given to her, shall amount to L.3000, and which he describes 'as here destined to her use, and for the benefit of her offspring,' excluding the jus mariti of her husband, and attachment for her own debts, 'the same being destined by me to secure to her the necessaries of life under proper management on her part;' and declaring 'that at her death the principal sum shall devolve upon her children or eldest son, whom failing, it shall fall and belong to the said Dr John Warroch Pursell.' The lady having been afterwards married, during her uncle's life, his executors give notice the event, and himself interpreting his settlement, stating that he had taken the same under his revisal, and considering that his niece has been comely married, 'but without issue, under which circumstance, that part of my estate destined for her use is to devolve ultimately upon my heirs-at-law at her decease,' he, in consideration of the bountiful provision made for her by her husband, reverses that 'clause,' and commits to her discretion alone the sole and entire disposal of L.2000 sterling as by his former deed provided, subject to the payment of a small annuity to a second cousin, to be paid out of the interest of L.1000. These being the provisions in favour of Mrs Gowan, and expressed in so clear, both in the original deed and in the codicil, and setting forth the intentions of the testator, as well as marking the limits of the beneficial interest which was bestowed upon her, and containing a special reference to the testator's heirs-at-law as the parties who would otherwise, but for the power of disposal given, succeed to that part of his fortune destined to her use, it is conceived that the meaning and intention of the truster, and the construction he put upon his settlements as regards Mrs Gowan, can, under these clauses, scarcely admit of dispute, and that to give her higher interests under other clauses of the settlement, the legal construction of them must be unequivocal and imperative.

“ Finds that the beneficial interest in the residue of the trust-estate of James Warroch, which by final interlocutor has already been found to have

“ The representatives of Mrs Gowan found, in the first place, upon a clause which follows immediately after that part of the original deed which provides that the principal sum falling to the issue of Mrs Gowan shall, failing them, belong to Dr Pursell. It is as follows:—‘ And in regard his legal heirs are not my natural heirs, it is hereby provided and declared, that failing the said Dr John Warroch Pursell, and Catherine Paxton Pursell, who are equally near to me, without leaving legitimate children by one or other of them, the property hereby conveyed to them shall devolve upon and belong to the children of my cousins-german, Sarah Gee, Barbara and Catherine Warroch, above designed, in the manner following.’ The contention is, that this clause amounts to a conditional institution of Catherine Paxton Pursell, failing Dr John Warroch Pursell being in a condition to take the residue; and it is said that the words ‘property hereby conveyed to them’ cannot be satisfied otherwise than by holding that Catherine was called to take the residue if her brother did not survive the event which would have vested it in him. In the previous part of the deed, there is, admittedly, no words of conveyance to Catherine Pursell as regards the residue. The only disponent is Dr Pursell, to whom, upon a certain event, the truster disposes and makes over his whole real and personal estate, but under burden of the provisions already mentioned to Catherine Pursell. The words of conveyance to her brother cannot be extended to her, and to imply any inclusion of her would be repugnant to the burden under which the conveyance is made to him; but where there is confessedly no conveyance in that place, where it should be found, it would be a grave matter for consideration to allow the want to be supplied by words in an after part of the deed, though it were impossible to put a natural meaning upon them taken alone, except on the supposition of previous words of conveyance answering to them; there would be an inconsistency, but the mistake would be in the latter clause, and the words used are to be rejected as unwarranted, and incapable of receiving effect. The consequence might indeed be intestacy, but that result would violate no principle.

It appears, however, to the Lord Ordinary, that this part of the deed, though not very happily expressed, does not lead to the conclusion which the representatives of Mrs Gowan would draw from it, and that a sufficiently natural construction of an opposite kind can be given to the clause in question to satisfy its whole words,—‘the property conveyed to them.’ Whether by this pronoun, used relatively, it meant Dr Pursell and Catherine Pursell themselves, or their children, must have its antecedent in the preceding part of the clause. The word ‘property’ is not there found, nor the word ‘convey,’ but there is disposed and made over to Dr Pursell the whole real and personal estate, and then the sum of L.3000 sterling is destined to Catherine Pursell and her children, in the manner already explained. Now, under the rule applicando singula singulis, the phrase ‘property conveyed’ can legitimately be read as referring respectively to the residue made over to Dr Pursell, and the L.3000 provided and destined to Catherine Pursell and her children. It will be observed that it is on the failure of both, without leaving issue, that the property conveyed is to devolve. The L.3000, failing Catherine having issue, was to belong to Dr Pursell, and so that sum, as property conveyed, could only fall and devolve under the substitution to the cousins on Dr Pursell also dying without children. Then as to the residue given to Dr Pursell, the substitution is to take effect as to it if he leaves no issue; such is thought to have been the meaning of the truster, and the understanding he had as to the ultimate destination both of the residue and the principal sum of L.3000 under the expressions here used by him. If Catherine Pursell had left issue, it is possible that a serious question might have arisen as to their rights in the trust-estate, and the obstacle which their existence might present to the substitution taking effect; and it was maintained in argument, that had Catherine Pursell left children, they would have taken in preference to the cousins called. It is unnecessary to consider this question, as issue never existed. But a remark suggests itself as indicative of the trustee meaning and intention to exclude not only Mrs Gowan, but her children (had she afterwards married and had issue) from succession to the residue. The clause of substitution of the cousins is introduced by giving as the reason, that Dr Pursell's legal heirs are not the truster's natural heirs; and so, while the truster had bestowed the residue personally on his sister's son, he excludes the succession of Dr Pursell's heirs, and prefers his own cousins-german by the father's side. While thus providing for the exclusion of Dr Pursell's heirs, of whom the nearest would have been Mrs Gowan herself, it seems impossible to put an opposite meaning upon the rest of the clause, and to hold that, by the words 'property conveyed to them,' Catherine Pursell was conditionally instituted to her brother.

"There is another clause, however, upon which the representatives of Mrs Gowan find as confirmatory of their construction of the clause just examined. This latter clause of the deed is as follows:—'And in regard that great doubts and difficulties might arise between my heirs above described and the legal heirs of my said nephew and niece by their father's side, in the event of their deaths at a distant period without leaving legitimate children, which to prevent, I do hereby order, direct, and oblige my said nephew and niece, and the survivor of them, to preserve my account-book in the order it shall happen to be at the time of my death, in order to ascertain the amount of my personal estate, which shall be estimated,' &c. It is certainly difficult to understand the meaning of the testator introducing the niece into this clause, and what were the doubts and difficulties to arise between his heirs and those of his niece in the event of her death at a distant period without leaving children, and which were to be prevented by the direction he gives. With regard to the nephew—who was named trustee and executor, but who might never come to take the beneficial interest in the estate, and which would then fall to the truster's heirs—the purpose and object of the direction are perhaps sufficiently obvious. But as the niece was neither joint trustee nor trustee in succession, the obligation laid upon her appears inexplicable. The object is to ascertain the amount of his personal estate, which is to be estimated as he directs. This means, as he explains it, the residue of his personal estate, after paying legacies and provisions, and without deduction of the annuities. Then he contemplates the deaths of both nephew and niece at a distant period, without leaving legitimate children. The introduction of this last circumstance is startling, and must at once suggest that the existence of such children of the niece, as well as of the nephew, would remove the doubts and difficulties. Again, the direction is to the nephew and niece, and the survivor of them, indicating that at her death the doubts and difficulties might arise. The claimants opposing the representatives of Mrs Gowan were not successful in explaining this part of the deed, which, it must be acknowledged, gives some probability to the contention, that Mrs Gowan was conditionally instituted to her brother in the residue. It would perhaps go farther, and imply that she was to take in succession to him. Indeed, the whole of this clause, read by itself, would lead to the expectation of finding in a prior part of the deed that a life interest in the residue of the personal estate had been bestowed successively upon the nephew and niece. The Lord Ordinary will not attempt to reconcile the expressions in this clause, or search for its apparent meaning, in connection with the previous parts of the settlement. But whatever embarrassment it may create, the preceding parts of the deed seem to him to convey distinctly enough the true meaning and intention of the testator, as being such as has been already explained, and to overcome any inference to the contrary which can be drawn from this clause. Then, in addition, the codicil is to be looked at as affording the final explanation of the testator's intentions in regard to his niece. And, as already noticed, it appears to the Lord Ordinary to be adverse to the construction put by her representatives on the principal deed. Holding, therefore, Mrs Gowan to have been excluded from any right to the residue, it must fall under the substitution to the children of the cousins; and the interlocutor finds."

due; and repels the sixth plea in law for the claimants Mrs Agnes Pursell or Hislop and others: Finds, in regard to the sum of L.2000, the interest of which was destined to the use of Catherine Paxton Pursell or Gowan, that as she did not exercise in any shape the faculty conferred upon her by the codicil to James Warroch's trust-settlement as to the disposal of that sum, but died intestate, the same continued to form part of the trust-estate, and is to be distributed as included in the residue; and also repels the seventh plea in law for these same claimants: And with these findings, orders the cause to the roll for farther procedure." *

* "NOTE. — The note to the former interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary (which has been acquiesced in, the reclaiming note for certain of the parties having been withdrawn) explains the grounds on which he rejected any beneficial interest in the residue having been possessed or obtained by Mrs Gowan, and also the grounds on which he would have questioned the right of her issue, if any had been born, to a beneficial interest in the residue failing her. The Lord Ordinary must follow up that view by holding that the death of Mrs Gowan cannot be taken as the period at which vesting of the residue took place in the children of the cousins, to whom, by last interlocutor, it has been finally fixed that the residue of the trust-estate devolved upon and belonged. The attempt of another set of claimants to carry the period of vesting in the children of the cousins backwards to the death of Dr Pursell, appears to the Lord Ordinary to be untenable. Holding, then, that vesting, whether at the death of Mrs Gowan without issue, or at the death of Dr Pursell, cannot be supported, the Lord Ordinary sees no period to fix on but that when the annuities were reduced to L.20, at which time, had Dr Pursell survived, he would indisputably have taken the residue and obtained a vested interest therein. The death of Euphemia Warroch fixed this period.

"An attempt was made by one set of claimants, who represent those holding the character of next of kin of the truster, during the period between his death and the term of vesting of the residue, to maintain that the free income of the trust-estate, after satisfying the annuities, was left undisposed of by the truster, and so fell to his next of kin. The Lord Ordinary is unable to see any sufficient grounds to support this construction of the trust-deed, and to admit of intestacy as to any part of the truster's estate. He apprehends that the free income, whether a surplus existing from the commencement of the trust after payment of the annuities, or becoming enlarged by the annuities successively falling in, until reduced to the amount when the residue was to become vested, must be held to have been conveyed as part of the trust-estate, and finally to become part of the residue. There is doubtless obscurity in the meaning and purpose of the direction to preserve the truster's account-book, but the clause does not appear to the Lord Ordinary to aid the plea of the next of kin. It is thought there can be doubt of the intention of the truster to convey his whole estate, after satisfying the annuities to Dr Pursell and those substituted to him; and it is conceived that the terms of the conveyance are sufficiently broad to embrace any free income, and draw it into the residue.

"The representatives of Mrs Gowan maintained, that under the codicil the L.2000 which by the settlement was destined to her use and for the benefit of her offspring and, failing them, to Dr Pursell, and ultimately to the truster's heirs-at-law, was by force of the terms used in the codicil, constituted a special legacy vesting in her at the truster's death, and now falling to her next of kin. They founded particularly upon the words 'reverse that clause,' as recalling the devolution upon the truster's heirs-at-law, and, coupled with 'committing to her discretion alone the sole and ultimate disposal of L.2000,' contended that such expressions were equivalent to constituting a special legacy, which vested in her on the testator's death. They relied on the omission of any words of direction as to the mode in which the disposal was to be exercised—as by deed, settlement, or writing under her hand—and remarked that the terms, power or faculty, were not used. The claim of the representatives was argued with much force, and English authorities were brought to bear in support of the construction contended for, but no Scotch authority was cited, and it appeared to be conceded that none could be shown. It humbly appears

Against both these interlocutors reclaiming notes were presented; but all were withdrawn, except those for John Pursell (in his own name, and as representing Mrs Hislop, now dead), in so far as they prayed the Court to find that "the free income of the trust-estate, from the date of the truster's death to the period of vesting of the said residue, did not form part of the residue, but that the same was not disposed of by his settlement, and fell to his next of kin; as also, to find that the sum of L.2000, provided in the settlement for Mrs Gowan, did not form part of the residue of his trust-estate, but vested in Mrs Gowan, and belongs to her next of kin, as her executors or otherwise; and to sustain the sixth and seventh pleas in law for the reclaimers."

Pursell v.
Newbigging.

The reclaimers maintained, that Mrs Gowan was the truster's sole next of kin from the death of Euphemia Warroch in 1839, and also the next of kin of Euphemia, while they were themselves next of kin of Mrs Gowan, and therefore they were entitled equally to whatever had vested in her under the trust-deed, and whatever she took ab intestato. On this last footing they were entitled to the whole accumulations which had arisen from the income of the estate being more than sufficient to meet the annuities. There was no presumption of law in favour of an intention to accumulate; and here it did not seem intended by the deed to convey accretions. The testator, by directing his account-book to be preserved, fixed the amount of his estate, and the free income was not disposed of; therefore he must be held to have died intestate quoad these, and that ex proposito. As to the L.2000, the reversal in the codicil of the previous provision, prevented the testator's heirs-at-law from taking it, and was equivalent to striking out of the original deed the destination in favour of the heirs-at-law, and amounted to giving the fee to Mrs Gowan, whereas originally she had only had the liferent. Had a power of testing been all that was granted, it was admitted that would not have conferred a fee; but here the gift was absolute, and the sum left to her sole and absolute disposal, whether she had children or not. The sum, therefore, must be held to have vested absolutely. Any other reading of the codicil would make it leave Mrs Gowan in a worse position than she had occupied previously, for the L.2000 was to be burdened with an annuity of L.10, thus reducing the annuity she herself enjoyed. This was clearly contrary to the spirit of the codicil.¹

to the Lord Ordinary, that, viewed as a question as to the meaning and intention of the truster, his purpose was only to confer a faculty or power on Mrs Gowan to dispose of the fee of the L.2000, and it would rather seem from the narrative of the codicil that the inductive cause was to put it in her power to leave the money to her husband in case of her predecease, though the power was given in general terms. The words 'reverse that clause,' it is thought, were used as meaning 'alter that clause,' in order to bestow the power which immediately follows. And construing the words, 'commit to her discretion alone the sole and ultimate disposal,' according to their legal significance, the Lord Ordinary conceives that they amount to nothing more than the grant of a faculty, and which must be exercised either by some direct act having reference to the power, or by some deed or testamentary writing by its character inferring an implied exercise of the faculty. But Mrs Gowan died intestate; and unless it could be held, that committing to a party's discretion the sole and ultimate disposal of a sum is tantamount to conferring a fee in it during life, the Lord Ordinary does not see how it can be carried to representatives on intestacy."

Had there not been sufficient income to meet the purposes of the trust, the capital must have been taken, and those who were to enjoy the residue must have suffered; and as, on the other hand, there was free income, they were entitled to the benefit of the accumulations. The reading contended for by the reclaimers would have led to inextricable confusion; each year as the free income was ascertained, it would fall to the next of kin, who were liable to vary every year. The clause as to his account-book was not intended to limit the generality of the conveyance in trust, but merely to protect his trustee in case of disputes. As to the claim for the L.2000, it failed; for what the testator had done by his codicil had not the effect of giving Mrs Gowan the fee of that sum, but merely a power of disposing of it after her death—a faculty which, it was admitted, she had not exercised. If it had been intended that the fee should be given, that would have been said in so many words; but that could not be intended, for its alimentary nature was to continue so long as she lived; nay, the power of disposal was only to take effect if she died without children. The argument raised on the other side from the burden of the annuity of L.10 was groundless; for that was only to be imposed in the event of the power of disposal being exercised. Had the fee been conferred, the sum would have vested in her husband, and been carried off by his creditors, who had long ago attempted to attack her rights under this settlement, but had failed.¹

Pursell v.
Newbigging.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The last reclaiming note, in so far as it goes beyond the prayer of the original note, has been withdrawn, so that the question of vesting is to be taken, on the one note as on the other, as finally settled by the Lord Ordinary. The reclaiming notes therefore bring before us only two points, which are totally separate questions, and in no respect dependant the one on the other. The first is, in my opinion, a very general point, for I am persuaded that the same question might arise in the majority of trust-deeds.

The trust-deed of James Warroch conveys in the most general and unqualified terms, such as are used more or less in all similar deeds of trust-disposition, the whole heritable and moveable estate and property of whatever species or denomination, belonging to the truster at the time of his death. There is great anxiety to make the specification complete and comprehensive. The property is conveyed to the trustee for the ends and purposes after mentioned—(1) for payment of all his debts, which I mention for a particular purpose. Then a variety of annuities are given, and as these might require a large portion of the income of the property, he does not make over the real and personal estate to the ultimate beneficiary, who is the trustee himself, until the annuities are reduced to L.20 annually. Upon that event, the whole trust-estate is made over to the trustee for his individual benefit with the exception of a sum to the truster's niece, which must be afterwards adverted to. But it is contended, that until this event of the reduction of the annuities to L.20 yearly, nothing is said as to the surplus interest, or income of the estate, accruing in the interval, after paying the annuities, which surplus, it is argued, is not disposed of,—that there is no declaration that the surplus income is to be accumulated, and remain to form part of the trust-estate, so as to enlarge at the time when the first beneficiary or subsequent beneficiaries are to take, and hence that the truster died intestate as to such free income.

I cannot conceive a proposition more repugnant to the objects of the truster—the presumptions applicable to such a case—or to the legal effect of the terms employed, and it was admitted that no such result was within the contemplation of the truster. What a truster is to convey, correctly and technically, is what actually belongs to himself, and is extant at his death as subjects to be conveyed. As to the income accruing after his death, he is entitled to give any directions regard to it which he chooses, and to regulate its employment or its enjoyment in any way he chooses. But, properly speaking, he does not convey what comes in existence after his death. He only gives directions as to the income of that estate which he has conveyed to the trustees. If he does not so regulate the employment and destination of the income arising after his death, either temporarily or for a long tract of time, then the income, which is the produce of the estate conveyed, of course belongs to that which is conveyed—the estate extant at his death, and of which it is the produce. It is necessarily part of the trust-estate which is to be held in trust until a certain event. That estate bears fruit in the interval—annuities, of course, are to be paid out of that income, and if there is free income, it is of necessity part of the trust-estate held by the trustee for the ultimate purposes stated as the objects of the truster. If the trustee had not been the beneficiary in the first instance, or as he came not to be such—what is the claim of the beneficiary against the trustee?—why surely, and beyond all doubt, the estate actually conveyed with its accruing fruits and produce. This is not, properly speaking, a case of accumulation. It is the simple case that the right to the estate, when it opens, carries right to the produce of that estate, not otherwise appropriated. If the purposes of the trust did not carry such right to the surplus income, it would be more reasonable to hold that the truster should take the same for his own behoof, than that the heirs-at-law could possibly claim any benefit from the trust-estate conveyed away from them. The notion that as to such free income the testator died intestate, seems to be little better than pure nonsense. And, in point of fact, this proposition was hardly stated as a principle of construction applicable to this very common result in distribution under trust-deeds. But then it was stated that truly this free income, under the deed, would go to the next of kin of Euphemia Warroch, and so that it was not claimed on the ground of intestacy. To make out that point, the parties must shew a direct gift in the trust-deed in their favour.

But then it was contended that a particular clause in this trust-deed made this a special case, and that the free income was excepted out of the estate held by the trustee for the purposes of the trust. No doubt such exceptions may occur, or the words employed may not be adequate for the purpose in view, and so exclude the operation of the general rule already stated; but I find no exception in this deed. The meaning of the clause referred to seems very plain and simple, and cannot be twisted into any such result as that ascribed to it. Foreseeing that the trust might last some time—that, as the trustee might become the ultimate beneficiary, or that others, if he predeceased the period when his right opened, might call his representatives to account, and that there might be some confusion and conflict of interests, the truster inserts a plain clause (quoted supra, p. 73), with one and a limited object. He says, My account-book is to be kept; that will show the amount of my personal estate at my last balance, after deducting debts and sums assigned, but of course without deducting annuities, which could not of course affect or alter the balance of his estate at his death. On the other hand, what was necessary to pay debts and legacies could not remain as any part of the balance to be held by the trustee for the other and ultimate purposes of the trust. It is said that this implies that the annuities are to be paid out of the income. To be sure; but that, as it does not contain any gift of the surplus income, so it cannot and is not intended to exempt the surplus from the purposes of the trust, or leave it not to follow, according to universal rule, the disposal of the estate of which it is the produce. I do not know what is meant by the proposition that a man dies intestate as to a portion of the future income of an estate, when the whole estate is conveyed to trustees for the purposes of the trust. Intestacy as to the future interest seems to be utterly inapplicable to the case, and it would tax the ingenuity of most lawyers so to frame a trust-deed, that, after conveying the whole estate to trustees for certain purposes, with an ultimate gift to a certain person on the occurrence of a certain event, the produce of that estate not expended should be intercepted, and the individual should be held to be intestate as to such produce. I take it, if any one will try his hand at such a deed, the only way to accomplish the result will be found to be a bequest of the free income until the right to the principal opens, and that would be no case of intestacy; or by words which, in giving directions as to part of the income, leave the rest excepted from the general words of conveyance, and yet undisposed of at the proper place.

As to the sort of confusion in the man's mind that his niece might, whether as trustee or not, have a sort of management of the fund, that cannot affect the point.

 Pursell v.
 Newbigging.

On this first question, then, I concur with the Lord Ordinary; and I must add, that the point is so very clear that I would not have said a word, if I had not thought that it depended on a very general question of construction of trust-deeds, which might extend to a great variety of cases, and if it had not been pleaded that a recent case, Cowan v. Turnbull, interfered with the general rule I have stated with this general question. That is not a correct view of that case. It is true that the party on whom, if he recovered, or on whose death the trustees were directed to execute an entail of the lands belonging to the truster, and of lands purchased with the funds he possessed, happened to be his only son, and of course his heir-at-law, for whom, being a lunatic, a provision was to be made for his comfortable maintenance. But there was no direction to invest in land the surplus income of the estate. And not unnaturally he was spoken of, in the opinions in this Court, as the heir-at-law. But the opinions both of Lord Fullerton and Lord Jeffrey show that they looked to his rights as the beneficiary under the trust; and the interlocutor does not put the claim on the ground of the lunatic being heir-at-law; and the same is, I think, the true result of Lord Cottenham's opinion, for he founds on the point—quid juris, if the funds had been invested in land within a year after the truster's death, what would then become of the rents in the intermediate period before the son's death or recovery?—clearly showing that in his opinion the ultimate right, though contingent to the lands, carried the right to the rents to the same party; but also showing, that if that party had not been heir-at-law, the intermediate rents would not have gone away from the trust to a third party not named in the deed, because he was heir-at-law. The case of Turnbull, when rightly understood, in truth, is an illustration of the general rule I have stated, that the surplus rents must go to the party interested under the deed in the meantime. The truth is, that the question in Turnbull related to the beneficiary's right to the surplus rents, because there was no direction to invest them in land; and hence, not that the party died intestate as to these, but that they necessarily went to the general bequest of the truster's property. Of course, one must look to the facts of the case and the principle of decision—not to casual expressions used because the beneficiary was the heir-at-law. It is quite clear from Lord Cottenham's opinion, that the decision would have been the same if the beneficiary had been a stranger.

On the second point, I have the misfortune to differ from the Lord Ordinary. That point relates to L.2000 in which the truster's niece was to have a certain interest.

In all such questions the important point is to ascertain the intentions of the truster. But, then, we must take care that we find words adequately expressing intention, and that we do not go on conjectures as to what the truster probably intended or might have intended in the case which has occurred, if foreseen. We are not at liberty to interpolate conditions not expressed, or to make that contingent which is given or directed in absolute terms. It is a great error in the construction of such deeds, and of such provisions in trust-deeds as that which we are now to consider, to deny effect to the truster's expressions on any view of his probable intentions, when there are no expressions to prove that intention.

Now, what is provided in the trust-deed?

The niece was then unmarried, and the usual directions are introduced, securing the fee to her children, and excluding the jus mariti both as to interest and principal; and then, on the death of the niece without children, this sum, as well as the residue, was to go to the children of certain cousins whom he named,—of course distant relations compared to the niece.

The party makes a codicil seven years afterwards. By this time a great change had taken place in regard to this niece, which most naturally led to a great change in his purposes as to his niece. The niece had been in the meantime comfortably married, as he says. And further, her husband had made a bountiful provision for her in the event of his death. And further, she had no issue, and he plainly held that she would have no issue. He proceeds, then, on that state of things. And he further held that, in respect of the conduct of the husband, it was fitter to enlarge the interest of the niece, and no longer to look to the interest of the children or his cousins rather than to that of his niece, especially as the latter would get (Dr Pursell died without children) all the residue of his estate.

The first point which presents itself in this codicil, founded on that state of things, is, that he intended a material and great change, and for the benefit of the niece.

No. 18.

Nov. 25, 1856.

Pursell v.

Newbigging.

The second point is, that he assumes that the niece would have no children. He was entitled to form his own opinion on that point. He knew the parties: we do not. He considered that he had good grounds for allotting his provision as to his niece upon the assumption that she would have no children, and he assumed the existing failure of children as the state of things on which he might proceed. And he was right. He takes the failure of issue as complete. He says, "under which circumstance"—taking the fact as certain: not circumstances, but the actual state of things—which he assumes as that condition on which he may safely proceed in making his ultimate revision.

The fourth point is, the strong and emphatic declaration in the codicil itself, which excludes all conjectural interpretation or speculation as to intention. He says that he has revised his settlement, "and considering that part of my fortune destined to her use is by said deed to devolve ultimately upon my heirs-at-law upon her decease"—that is, looking to the provision to his heirs-at-law in the case of his niece having no issue, he is resolved to make another arrangement.

Farther, in consideration of the generosity of the husband of the niece to her, on such grounds he "reverses that clause"—that is, the clause leaving the sum to his heirs at law on the death of the niece without issue. Yet it is said that the provision still subsists, and the sum is equally to go to the heirs at law. I cannot so deal with this emphatic declaration. He "reverses that clause." He puts an end to it. The Lord Ordinary says that he reads it, "he alters that clause." I must take the actual words employed. "Alter" may embrace a very small change, while the substance is to remain untouched. But the word is, "I reverse that clause." This is total extinction. And the maintaining of the same right and interest, and of the same result, is totally repugnant to any apprehension I can entertain of the words employed.

It is farther to be kept in view that this is a codicil, written, as was the deed itself (on which the codicil is found) by the testator himself; and that therefore the terms used by him are to be taken in their plain and ordinary meaning, and full effect to be given to them in all circumstances, not being dependent on any technical interpretation, nor limited by any conventional understanding as to the objects supposed to be in view by their use. Now, "I reverse that claim," having recited its purport, viz. that as the niece had no issue, the sum was to go to his heirs-at-law. "Reverse" it. What other view can be taken than this—that as she had before only the life interest, so now she was to have the fee, and not the heirs-at-law? This is a very natural and reasonable view of the words employed, when the sequel of the sentence is looked to—"I reverse that clause, and hereby," &c. Thus the clause, the former provision, is reversed, and then the favoured niece is brought in, in lieu of the former provision of the fee.

Farther, as the former clause is reversed, it is to be presumed, surely, that that which is substituted is to be as comprehensive and exhausting as that which is repealed, and so that it carries the full right to and interest in the sum provided for the niece. The words are not formal and technical, but the expression of the man's own kind feeling to his niece, and are chosen plainly to mark his opinion of her, but not to limit her right. Can this, in such a codicil, be reasonably read as a mere faculty or power which must be specially exercised, else her interest in the sum is lost, and her next of kin take nothing; and after all the heirs-at-law take, as if the clause had not been reversed? I cannot so read this. I think it is only a kind and affectionate way of giving her full right to that sum, of which before she had only the life interest, and the fee of which, by the original clause, was to go to his heirs-at-law. But that clause being reversed, which extinguishes the interest of the heirs-at-law, the subsequent words practically and truly give the full and final interest in the sum to the daughters. It would be much too technical and unnatural, as well as a very forced construction of that clause, to suppose that the old gentleman intended merely to give his niece a power to test after her death on the sum. Indeed, that narrow view was not truly considered for, it did not seem to be disputed that she could spend or employ the sum in any way she liked; and if that is clearly the effect of this codicil, it seems to me

No. 18. a strange inconsistency to hold that her next of kin, if she happened to die intestate, were not to take the sum.
 Nov. 25, 1856. No difficulty arises out of the condition, not very artificially or skilfully added, as to the annuity to Barbara Gowan. On the contrary, I think that only the more proves that the fee was intended for his niece.
 Pursell v. Newbigging.

Various remarks were made on the clause in the original deed excluding the jus mariti or debts of the husband. I attach no importance to these remarks. It is very likely that the old gentleman entirely forgot this part of the clause, in consequence of the generous conduct of the husband—or believing that it would be required to be repeated before it could apply to his new provision, he purposely omitted it. But no difficulty on that point can interfere in my judgment with the plain and strong terms of the codicil.

In a word, that clause being reversed, which gave the heirs-at-law an interest in the fee of the sum in question, I cannot hold that it remains still operative against the next of kin of the niece, or to narrow and restrain the interest of the niece in the new bequest to her.

No doubt, it was said that the words are to be read, with such and such conditions implied, as restrictions or declarations as to the extent or nature of the bequest bestowed. I cannot invent, or imply, or import, in point of meaning, any such conditions.

For instance, to avoid such a result as that which might have happened, although not anticipated by the granter, viz., of the niece having children after all, and of the fee going to his cousins, away from the children, it is said that the destination of the fee to the niece's children must be held to subsist. This seems to me neither more nor less than making a will. The granter, if he foresaw such a case, had no difficulty in giving the fee to the niece, satisfied that her children might safely be left to their own parents, the kindness of one of whom, the father, he so emphatically refers to. To interpolate the destination to them, when the whole clause is reversed, appears to me to be unwarranted on any rule of construction.

It is said that the exclusion of the jus mariti would, on the view maintained by the reclaimers, be recalled. If that should be the result, I think the confidence which he found he had reason to place in the husband, would render that a probable result in point of intention. Perhaps he overlooked this point. But whatever might be the result, I cannot hold these, and other minor difficulties, to have the effect of counteracting the express reversal of the clause he refers to, or to exclude the benefit which I think he clearly intended for the niece.

On these grounds, I am unable to concur in the view taken by the Lord Ordinary as to the sum of L.2000.

LORD MURRAY.—I concur in thinking that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to as to the point raised regarding the free income arising from the trust-estate. Any other view would have disturbed the administration of many trusts, and, therefore, I am glad that no doubt whatever has been thrown upon it.

I pass, therefore, at once to the other point, which is one of difficulty, as to whether or no the L.2000 vested absolutely in the niece. The testator seems to have acted as his own conveyancer, and those who do this always produce nice cases—sometimes of extraordinary difficulty. In the deed he provided that his niece should receive the interest only of this sum, excluding the jus mariti of any husband, and that the principal should go to her children, whom failing, to his heirs-at-law. Then he executed a long codicil, in which, with reference to that provision, he says, considering that his niece is comfortably married, and has no children, in which case the L.2000 would devolve upon his heirs-at-law on her decease—"I reverse that clause, and commit the sum to her sole and ultimate disposal." Now, there is clearly the reversal of a clause—but what clause? There is great difficulty; but I take the last clause which has gone before, namely, that of devolution upon his heirs-at-law. The clause giving her only the life interest is more remote. Therefore, I assume he refers to the other and that he did not intend to do more than change the destination and give her faculty to dispose, a right quite well known to the law of Scotland,—and which follows the words of reversal confirms this view,—“I commit to her discretion alone the sole and ultimate disposal of L.2000.” What is this but faculty according to the civil law? “Facultas est libera quædam et plena potestas rerumque p” arbitrio gerendarum facultas, nullis aliunde impedimentis intorturbata." The words of the codicil are merely a free translation of that definition. No. 18.

The niece was to have the sole power of disposing—almost the very words of the civil law. The testator had it in his power to have given her the fee if he liked, but he has not done so by the words of this codicil. Am I to supply that effect on the supposition that he intended to do so? Am I to do more than he has himself done? We have a strongly marked distinction between faculties and fees recognised in a long line of decisions from the time of Lord Hardwick down to the recent case of Morris v. Tennant, and we must here give effect to it. The provision actually made is a most reasonable one. The income is secured to his niece, and the power of disposal enables her to show her affection to her husband if she pleases. In short, as the sum before went to his heirs, he, in consideration of the provisions made by her husband, reverses "that clause," viz. the destination. Moreover, the term interest occurs in the codicil, proceeding, as I imagine, upon the impression in the testator's mind of the liferent continuing. This testator wrote his own will, and if he has not expressed what he intended, I cannot help that. I cannot go beyond the words he has used, and, in my opinion, they have the effect of conferring a fee faculty, but no fee.

LORD WOOD.—1st, Upon the first point which we have to decide, I concur in the view taken by the Lord Ordinary and your Lordships, and have nothing to add.

2d, The second point to be disposed of is the question raised in regard to the L.2000. It appears to me to be essentially necessary, in the first place, to attend particularly to the terms of the bequest of that sum as contained in the trust-deed of 1805, in order to ascertain the true import and effect of the provision in relation to it in the codicil of May 1812.

Without reciting the first portion of the original bequest, I think it may be stated to be clear, that although the term liferent is not used, there is, in the words there mentioned, a settlement of the L.2000 upon Catherine Paxton Pursell (afterwards Mrs Gowan), the niece of the truster, in liferent only, with a careful exclusion of the jus mariti of any husband she might marry, and with other protecting clauses, whereby her interest is limited in the strictest manner to a bare liferent for her individual use, while the fee is given to her children if she any had; the express provision being, that the principal sum shall, at her death, devolve upon them share and share alike.

But then there is a further destination of the L.2000 in the event of the failure of children, it being provided—1st, That it shall, in that event, fall and belong to the Pursell; and, 2d, By a separate and distinct clause—which also embraces other property—that, failing both Miss Pursell and Dr Pursell without having legitimate issue by one or other of them, the L.2000 shall devolve upon and belong to the children of the truster's cousins-german, Sarah Gee and Barbara and Catherine Gowan, in the manner there set out. Now, it may be true, that had there not been such special destination of the L.2000, it would, in the event referred to, have fallen into the general residue of the estate, and fallen under the distribution appointed for it, which would have given it to the same parties in whose favour the destination was made. It may be so, but nevertheless, the fact, that by a settlement of the L.2000 itself the truster does make a special ultimate destination of it to the persons there named, failing issue of Mrs Gowan—which destination it was beyond the power of Mr Gowan to touch or interfere with,—is of importance to be in view in the question of the intention of the truster in what he afterwards says by the codicil. It is upon that footing that the portion of the codicil of 12th May 1812 which relates to the L.2000 is to be read.

Now by that codicil an alteration was admittedly made upon the bequest of the L.2000, as settled by the trust-deed, and the question is, what was that alteration? It absolutely recall the destination in the trust-deed to the children of Mrs Gowan, if she should afterwards have any; and did it alter her right from one of liferent only, exclusive of the jus mariti, to one of fee in the capital sum itself, which, by surviving the truster, came to be vested in her, so as during her life to be at her absolute command, and on her death, without any act of disposal by will or testament, to belong to her representatives ab intestato? That was the effect of the codicil in the plea of the claimants Mrs Gowan's representatives. Gathering the truster's meaning and intention as I best can from the writings he has left, I cannot arrive at that result.

Newbigging.

The narrative of the codicil shows that the terms of the prior settlement of the L.2000 were before the truster, and then it goes on in the terms which have been already read by your Lordship, and which I shall not repeat.

It will be observed, that in the outset there is a distinct reference to the right of the truster's heirs-at-law to the L.2000, as one given them by the special ultimate destination in their favour in the trust-deed; and the terms of the codicil show that it was the clause providing that ultimate destination which it was the truster's intention to deal with. And accordingly what he does is to declare that he reverses that clause. Now I think that by this reversal alone (and assuming there were nothing else to mark a different intention), the liferent of the L.2000 to Mrs Gowan, and the fee to her children, are left untouched, and remain operative parts of the truster's settlement.

No doubt the truster, after stating in the codicil that Mrs Gowan had been married, but without issue, uses the words "In which circumstance," and then goes on to assign the reason for inducing him to make an alteration in the original bequest. But that, I apprehend, cannot afford any ground for inferring, that by reversing the clause of ultimate destination the truster meant to recall to any extent those provisions to which that destination was postponed, or intended to do more than simply to recall the destination itself in that event, wherein alone it would have operated in terms of the original bequest in the trust-deed, which the codicil bears he was revising, and which event he must therefore at the time have been perfectly aware, was the termination of Mrs Gowan's liferent, and the failure of her issue.

The ultimate destination of the L.2000, and the provisions by which it is preceded, are things quite separate and distinct. The subsistence of the one does not depend on the subsistence of the other. The recall or reversal of the ultimate destination is perfectly consistent with there being no intention to alter the prior provisions, and of the reversal being meant to be confined—as it certainly is, in words—to a recall of the ultimate destination alone. The reversal of the clause may, indeed, extinguish the destination it contains, so that no one can take any interest under it. But I cannot see how it follows that the extinction of that destination is to be read as an extinction of that which forms no part of the destination which is reversed. And as little can I see that the cause assigned for the reversal can afford any ground for giving a more extended effect to it, the reversal itself being in express terms applied to the clause of destination. This distinctly marks the extent to which, according to the mind and opinion of the truster, the clause of reversal was to operate, which, unless a will is to be made for him, must be conclusive, however clear it might be that the cause was sufficient in itself to have led to, and might naturally have induced a greater alteration of the original bequest.

Therefore, as I construe the reversal, I read it as introductory to, and made for the purpose not of doing away the original settlement of the anxiously limited and protected liferent to Mrs Gowan, and converting it into an absolute fee in her person, or taking from her children, should she have any, the fee given to them, but of making an alteration consistent with the continuance of the rights of liferent and fee, as originally constituted, and which was to affect only the ultimate destination of the L.2000 in favour (in the event there mentioned) of the truster's heir-at-law.

But, no doubt, although this were the sound construction to be put on the declaration of reversal, looking only to the portion of the codicil which precedes it, it may be that what follows may show that the object of the truster in reversing the clause was to give a fee in the L.2000 to Mrs Gowan instead of a liferent, and absolutely and out and out to recall the destination in favour of the children. It may be inconsistent with anything else. I have not been able to arrive at that result. Having reversed the clause, what the truster does is to commit to her (Mrs Gowan's) discretion alone, "as she may afterwards see cause, the sole and ultimate disposal of the L.2000," as by the foresaid deed provided. How that sum was there provided, we have seen.

The truster had himself, in the trust-deed, made an ultimate destination of the L.2000, to take effect on the expiry of Mrs Gowan's liferent, and in the event of the failure of her issue, as previously constituted—that is, the provision or clause which the first part of the codicil professes to deal with, and which the truster accordingly reverses; and having done so, that is—having reversed the ultimate destination which he had himself made, he then goes on, in the latter part of the codicil, to commit to Mrs Gowan's discretion alone the sole and ultimate disposal of the L.2000. I have already ventured to submit, that the first part of the codicil, with the reversal of the clause of destination, do not either express or imply an alteration of the original settlement of liferent and fee; and it seems to me, that the latter part of the codicil just gives Mrs Gowan the power, and nothing more, which she did not before possess (it being previously excluded by the ultimate destination, which was reversed), of making an ultimate destination of the L.2000, in room and place of, and in the case for which the ultimate destination of it so reversed had originally been made by the truster himself. He displaces his own ultimate destination, and he commits to Mrs Gowan's discretion alone, as she may afterwards see cause, the sole and ultimate disposal of the L.2000 as by the trust-deed provided,—in other words, he gives her the power to make an ultimate destination, instead of that which he had originally made, and which he had recalled. Is this in any degree opposed to its being the intention of the truster to leave in force the provision of liferent and fee as made by the trust-deed? I think it is not. On the contrary, the whole tenor of the codicil appears to me to exclude the construction, that by the alteration in the original bequest thereby made, a fee was given to Mrs Gowan in the L.2000 vesting in her at the death of the truster, so as to be at her immediate command during her life, attachable by her creditors, or those of her husband, and descendible to her heirs ab intestato.

The case is not one of such a right of disposal as is given being conferred where no prior right of liferent, or of liferent and fee, had been established. Upon a case so circumstanced I am not called upon to give any opinion, or to say whether or not the right would have amounted to more than a mere power or faculty. The present is a case where, by the original deed, upon which the alteration by the codicil is made, giving the right of disposal of the sum in dispute, rights of liferent and fee in that sum had been established, and which rights had not been expressly recalled. Now, in that state of case, I hold that neither in the words by which the right of ultimate disposal is conferred, nor in these words taken together, with the terms of the prior reversal of the original ultimate destination, and the whole context of the codicil, including the reasons assigned for bestowing the right of disposal on Mrs Gowan, is there anything on which an inference can be legitimately founded, or from which it can, by any sound construction, be justly concluded, that the right so conferred amounts, not to a mere power or faculty, but to one of absolute fee in the sum to which the right relates. On the contrary, I think that, in the circumstances, the language used, instead of being adverse to a purpose of conferring only a mere power or faculty of ultimate disposal, if Mrs Gowan should see cause to exercise it, and importing a right of fee, that is the fitting and appropriate language to have been adopted, where all that was intended to be conferred was a mere power or faculty of disposal, requiring to be exercised in order to have any operative effect.

In short, the sound reading of the codicil as it stands is, in my opinion, exactly the same as if the truster had repeated the whole original provision in the trust-deed, down to the ultimate destination, in the event there stated, of the L.2000 to his heir-at-law, and in place thereof had, in the same event, committed to Mrs Gowan's discretion the sole and ultimate disposal of that sum, which, I conceive, must have been held to be clearly limited to a power or faculty only.

I shall only add with regard to the burden of an annuity of L.10 to Barbara Gowan, which, by the codicil, is attached to the power of disposal given to Mrs Gowan, and which was founded on in support of her plea that Mrs Gowan's right had been changed from a liferent into a fee, that it seems to me that the imposition of that burden was not at all inconsistent with Mrs Gowan's own personal enjoyment of the L.2000 being limited to a liferent, and that, on the contrary, the manner in which the imposition of it is expressed, so far as it goes, is suggestive of its having been in the mind of the truster that the annuity was to be paid out of the interest of the L.2000 payable to Mrs Gowan as liferenter, although, no doubt, in point of fact, the annuity was not made dependent on her life, and it might have

No. 18. so happened, that had she exercised the power given her, it would have continued to be payable after her death.

Nov. 25, 1856.
Pursell v.
Newbigging.

LORD COWAN.—On the two points argued, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to.

1. The first point depends on the view taken of the intention of the testator, as appearing from his deed of settlement.

The conveyance to Dr Pursell in trust for the purposes of the deed, was of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, of which the granter died possessed; and it appears to me that the words “my whole real and personal estate,” are sufficient to carry to the truster’s nephew the whole trust-estate with its accumulations, in so far as not specially applied in terms of the truster’s directions. The deed provides annuities to the relatives of the testator, including his sisters Ann and Euphemia Warroch, who were his next of kin, and to Dr Pursell, his nephew and trustee (viz. “L.130 yearly during the existence of the annuities hereby granted”), and to his niece Catherine, afterwards Mrs Gowan. These annuities, it is plain enough from the clause on page 96, it was the testator’s intention should be paid out of the proceeds annually of the estate. This is not expressly declared, however, and the right and power of the trustee to deal at all with the proceeds of the testator’s property, conveyed to him in trust, must be gathered from the general structure and purposes of the deed. As trustee, he was entitled and bound to uplift the proceeds of the estate during the subsistence of the trust, and to apply them in payment of the annuities, including his own. The surplus annually accumulating necessarily remained with him, as part and parcel of the estate conveyed by the deed. Hence, when the event occurred, which was declared to fix the vesting, it appears to me impossible to read the words “my whole real and personal estate,” “under burden,” and so forth, in any other sense than this, that it was the whole of the trust-estate, as it then stood vested in the trustee, with the accumulations.

Taking this view of the more general clauses of this settlement, I think it would have required some limiting declaration or provision in the deed to give to the words any other construction. There is no such clause in this deed. That which relates to the accounting cannot have that effect. It is confined to the personal estate, and to the estimate put upon it in the testator’s account-book at his last balance. Moreover, the avowed object of the clause is merely to regulate questions that might arise between the legal heirs of the testator and the legal heirs of his nephew and niece on their father’s side. Had the argument been that the clause gave to Dr Pursell destinatione the surplus proceeds of the estate, there would have been more plausibility in it. But when the contention is that the surplus income was left undisposed of, and is to be taken as intestacy, this clause becomes quite inoperative, for this plain reason, that the nephew and niece were not the testator’s next of kin, and that it was his two sisters who could alone, in that view, have claimed ab intestato any portion of the surplus of the personal estate undisposed of by the will.

Every case of this kind depends upon the terms of the particular deed. In this respect, the case of Turnbull does not afford any authority, for the proposition contended for, depending, as it did, entirely upon the terms of the peculiar deed then under consideration. The principle on which that case was decided is very clearly brought out in the opinions delivered in the House of Lords; and if we had had in this case to construe a deed with the peculiar provisions which there occurred, it humbly appears to me that the principle of that decision would have supported the claim made in this case by the heir ab intestato. But, as I said, we have a very different deed to deal with, no part of this trust estate being left undisposed of according to the correct reading of its terms.

2. The second and more material point relates to the L.2000 provided to the testator’s niece Catherine (Mrs Gowan), with which the conveyance in trust to Dr Pursell was burdened, for behoof of her lawful children in the first place, with the ultimate destination set forth in the deed, but altered by the codicil. The question is, whether that alteration had the effect of enlarging Catherine’s right from liferentrix to that of fiar or legatee of the principal sum?

By the deed, which bears to be written by the testator himself, Catherine was to receive the interest of the L.2000, which is declared to be “destined to her use.

No. 18.

Pursell v.
Newbigging.

and for the benefit of her offspring;" it is provided that the jus mariti of any husband she might marry should be excluded "from any concern with the said money, or with the interest arising therefrom," as to which it is declared, "that the same shall not be attachable for the debts of her husband, or otherwise, than for her own particular debts, debts contracted for her support and clothing—the same being destined by me to secure to her the necessaries of life;" her own receipt is to be a sufficient acquittance for the interest of the money "assigned to her for her necessary subsistence during her life;" and then it is provided, that at her death the principal sum shall devolve upon her lawful children. These various conditions annexed to this bequest are important, as showing the anxiety with which the testator sought to secure to his niece during her life the interest of the L.2000, free from all control on the part of the husband, and as a strictly alimentary fund. The destination of the principal sum is to her lawful children, and failing them it is provided to fall to and belong to Dr Pursell; and in regard his legal heirs were not the testator's natural heirs, it is provided that failing Dr Pursell and Catherine Pursell without lawful issue (which happened), "the property hereby conveyed to them shall devolve upon and belong to the children" of the testator's cousin-german—that is, to his own legal heirs. This, then, it will be observed, is the "ultimate destination" of the L.2000 provided by the deed for his niece's use during her life, and in fee for her children, if any, after her death. Her position was simply that of an alimentary liferentrix.

Now, to what effect did the codicil, also written by the testator himself, alter this state of things? The settlement is dated in 1805, and the codicil in 1812. Intermediately the niece had been married. The codicil narrates the fact of her being comfortably married, but without issue, and proceeds thus, "under which circumstance that part of my fortune destined to her use is by said deed to devolve ultimately upon my heirs-at-law upon her decease." So far the words merely set forth what is provided for in the settlement; under which circumstance—that is, in the event of her having no lawful issue—the sum destined to her use was "ultimately" to devolve upon his heirs-at-law. This ultimate disposal of the sum it was that he had in view to alter, by conferring on his niece some enlarged right or power. There is not a vestige of intention in the terms of the codicil, so far as yet considered, on the part of the testator, to change the strictly alimentary character of the liferent interest he had conferred on his niece, or to recall the destination of the principal sum to her lawful issue, if she could have issue, whether of her existing or of any subsequent marriage. What was in the testator's view by his own declaration, was simply that part of his settlement which provided for the ultimate disposal of the L.2000 to his own heirs; and the words which follow seem to me clearly to indicate his intention to alter the deed in that particular alone—"but in consideration of the bountiful provision made for her by her husband in the event of his death, and his tender affection towards her, I reverse that clause." This could be no other clause or provision than that which he had just narrated, providing for the ultimate devolution upon his heirs. This it is that he reverses or alters with the view and for the purpose of giving effect to what he declares to be now his intention in this matter in these words:—"I hereby commit to her discretion alone, as she may hereafter see cause, the sole and ultimate disposal of L.2000 sterling, as by the foresaid deed provided." These words do not purport a present gift or legacy to his niece. To my mind, they very plainly exclude that view of the testator's intention. If, upon the death of the testator, the L.2000 were to be taken as an unconditional legacy by his niece, the testator would not have so carefully committed the disposal of the money to her discretion, as she might at any time thereafter see cause. And he would not, as I think, have so studiously said that it was only the ultimate disposal of that was committed to her discretion. The words employed are such as in their obvious import leave intact the alimentary liferent to her, and the primary destination of the principal sum to her issue, as by the deed provided. They seem to me irreconcilable with any other view of the testator's intention than that he meant to confer on his niece only a power or faculty to dispose of the money as she might see cause upon her death without issue. The opposite construction necessarily results, not to the alteration merely of the clause of ultimate destination of the L.2000, but to the recall of the whole of the anxious provisions in the deed regard-

No. 18. ing the liferent interest of the niece, and the destination of the principal sum to her issue.

Nov, 25, 1856.
Pursell v.
Newbigging.

The expression "reverse that clause" is thought to be hostile to the idea of the ultimate destination in the deed being left entire, should the faculty not be exercised, and therefore inconsistent with the construction limiting the right conferred on the niece to a faculty. But, were this true, it would only leave the heirs-at-law to take the L.2000 as a lapsed legacy, and part of the general residue under the residuary bequest to them in the deed of settlement. The words, however, "I reverse that clause," are to be construed with reference to the context—both to that which precedes and that which follows. So construed as already said, it appears to me that the expression has necessarily a limited import, applying only to the ultimate destination of the fee contained in the deed, which it was his intention to modify or alter, so as to give the power and faculty conferred by the codicil upon his niece.

Then, as to the testator having mentioned the bountiful provision for his niece by her husband as an inducing cause of the alteration, it is obvious, first, that if, as contended, the jus mariti was excluded, both as to the principal sum and the liferent (which, however, as I have said, does not appear to me to be the true construction), the husband would not benefit from this gift to his wife without some act or deed on her part; and, second, that the inductive cause is fully satisfied by holding the niece to have got power under this alteration to leave the money to her husband in case of her predecease without issue, should she at any time afterwards see cause to provide for its ultimate disposal in that manner.

Nor is there anything in the argument that the word faculty or power does not occur in the clause. No particular words are necessary to confer a faculty, provided the substance of the thing be clearly conferred, and the intention to do so, from the words used, be unambiguous. But, in truth, to commit to one's discretion is nothing else than to intrust the party with power, at his or her discretion, to do the thing contemplated. To every substantial effect, the words give power to do the thing committed at discretion. But, if the discretion is not acted on and there is no exercise of the power given, the clause conferring it becomes inoperative. On the party's decease, his or her heirs take nothing. The destination in the deed remains and takes effect as if no such power or faculty had been conferred, by the exercise of which (but by such exercise alone) it could be altered.

This view of the alteration effected by the codicil is strengthened by the provision as to the L.10 annuity to Barbara Gowan in the words which immediately follow. The provision to Mrs Gowan and the accompanying powers are conferred subject to that payment, whether to take effect at the death of the testator or afterwards when the power was exercised, is of no consequence: and the sum is to be paid yearly "out of or from the interest arising from the said L.200 sterling." This is certainly not favourable to that view which would hold the codicil to have given over the sum as an absolute legacy to Mrs Gowan from the death of the testator. On the contrary, it implies that the amount was to be kept subject to the trust created in liferent for the niece and in fee to the children, and failing them, to the parties to whom, through the exercise of the power, it might be given by Mrs Gowan.

As I read this deed, the expressions are of much the same import as if the word "disposal after her death, or by a mortis causa deed," had been employed in place of the word "ultimate." The context gives that meaning to the word. To all substantial effects brings the clause under the operation of other cases which have occurred, and are reported in the books. All of these I had occasion very minutely to consider and explain, in deciding, as Lord Ordinary, the case of Morris v. Tennant, reported in this Court 7th June 1853, and in the House of Lords July 1855. Into the particulars of those cases I will not here enter, but I would especially refer to that of Sommerville v. Geddie, and to the notice of its final disposal by Lord Monboddo in the 5th vol. of the supplement, p. 736. In the case Morris, "full power and faculty" was committed "to the granter's daughters, to settle, destine, and convey the fee of the share of the residue of my estate liferented by them, to such person or persons, and in such way and manner as they think fit;" and failing their exercising the power and faculty, the property was to descend to parties specially named. No right of fee, but a mere faculty or power was held to be conferred on the daughters by these words. The question, however, in every such case, is always one of intention to be judged of on the special terms of the deed, which is for construction.

Road—Interdict—Expenses.—A right of way was claimed by the public through the private park of a proprietor, who admitted that at one time it had existed, but averred that latterly it had existed only by tolerance. There had always been gates at each entrance, but such as easily to permit ingress and egress. For these the proprietor substituted locked gates, and the public destroyed them,—whereupon he applied to the Sheriff for interdict, and for authority to restore the gates to the state they were in prior to their destruction ;—Held (1), that he was entitled to restore them pending an action of declarator at his instance, but not so as to obstruct access by the public to the roadway claimed by them, and interdict granted against interference with the gates ; (2), that it was unnecessary to decide as to the legality or illegality of the destruction of the gates, but that, in the meantime, access being secured to the public, the judgment was substantially in their favour ; therefore, that the proprietor was liable in expenses.

THE advocates claimed a right of way through the park of Cally, belonging to the respondent, Mr Murray of Broughton, and on 1st June 1854, knocked down certain gates and a wall which he had erected to obstruct them. Mr Murray thereupon presented an application to the Steward of Kirkcudbright, complaining of these proceedings, and praying for authority to erect a new gateway at the lockup-house near Gatehouse-of-Fleet, in the room of that which has been destroyed, and to restore matters as nearly as possible to the state in which they were previously to the operations complained of, and that, in the first instance, at the expense of the petitioner, and, if thought necessary, at the sight of a person or persons of skill to be named by the Court ; and also to grant warrant and authority to erect a wooden gate across the site of the old parish road near the clachan of Girdon, with a stile or steps for foot passengers at the same place where the former gate and steps stood for many years subsequent to 1828 ; or otherwise to grant warrant and authority to make such erections or fences at the places in dispute as may appear to the Court to be proper and necessary to regulate the possession pending the discussion in the declarator raised or about to be raised in the Court of Session by the petitioner, and that, in the first instance, at his expense, and at the sight of persons of skill to be named by the Court as aforesaid ; and further, to grant interdict against the respondents and all other persons from obstructing the petitioner, or the persons who may be employed by him in carrying out the said operations, and from destroying or interfering with the said gates or works, after the same shall have been constructed, reserving all claims competent to the petitioner against the respondents for damages and expenses, to be made effectual in an action to be afterwards raised at his instance, and all defences thereto, as records ; to find the respondents liable in the expenses of this process," &c.

A record was made up. Proof was allowed, and on 7th December 1854, the Steward-substitute (Dunbar) pronounced the following interlocutor, to

No. 19. which, on appeal, the Steward adhered :—“ Finds it established that the late Alexander Murray, Esquire, of Broughton, was proprietor duly infeft of the entailed estate of Cally, including the mansion-house and park surrounding the same, and superiority of the adjoining village or burgh of Gatehouse-of-Fleet : Finds it admitted, that previous to 1806, a parish road from Kirk-Andrews of Borgue to Gatehouse, by the kirk and clachan of Girthon, passed through the park of Cally, between the mansion-house and gardens thereof : Finds it admitted, that about 1805 and 1806, when a new line of turnpike road from Dumfries to Newton-Stewart, and passing through part of what is now the park of Cally to Gatehouse, was formed by the Road Trustees, Mr Murray was desirous, and took measures to shut up the said parish road, as superseded and rendered unnecessary by the new line of turnpike road in that neighbourhood : Finds it not admitted that the said parish road was ever effectually shut up by the said measures, or its use as a parish road relinquished by the public : Finds it admitted, that about the year 1818, the said Mr Murray extended the park surrounding the mansion-house of Cally, and erected, exclusively at his own expense, a new wall round part of it, and placed a wooden gate across the site of the foresaid parish road, where it entered the park of Cally, near the clachan of Girthon : Finds it proved, and substantially admitted, that this gate was for sometime after its erection kept locked, and keys furnished by the said Mr Murray to some of his friends, and the adjoining farmers, to enable them to pass through it : Finds it admitted, that about 1828 Mr Murray erected a wooden ladder or steps over the wall into Cally park close to the said gate : Finds it admitted, that about 1823 Mr Murray completed the wall surrounding the mansion-house and park of Cally, and at that part of the wall where the foresaid old parish road from Gatehouse to Kirk-Andrews enters Cally park at the lockup, he erected across the site of the said parish road, at his own expense, a large gate, with a postern door for foot passengers, and porter's lodge attached to it ; which gate was secured by one or more padlocks, and an iron bolt which went into the ground : Finds it proved that the petitioner Mr Stewart Murray succeeded, on the death of the foresaid Mr Alexander Murray in July 1845, to the estate of Cally, including the mansion-house and park, and was duly infeft in the same in 1846 : Finds it admitted and proved, that from the period of the erection of the said gate at the lockup, or soon thereafter, a person was placed by the proprietor of Cally in the porter's lodge there, as his servant and gatekeeper, to take charge of the gate at a fixed wage, and ever since a gatekeeper has been stationed there by the proprietor of Cally as his hired servant : Finds it proved, that during the last seven years a number of persons from Gatehouse and other places have been in the practice of passing through the said gates at the lockup, and near the clachan, into Cally park, and along the foresaid old parish road, without interruption or objection, and in the exercise of an alleged right in the public to do so : Finds it proved, that upwards of four years ago the said gate at the lockup having fallen into disrepair, was removed by the petitioner : and a new gate of stronger construction secured by a mortise lock instead of a padlock, and by some additional bolts, was substituted at the petitioner's expense for the old one : Finds, that a short time previous to June 1854, the petitioners removed the foresaid gate and stile across the old parish road near the clachan, and built up the space with a wall of the same height as the adjoining park wall : Finds it admitted, that on the 1st June 1854, a number of persons proceeded through the said lockup gate and Cally park, and without the petitioner's consent or a legal warrant, knocked down and removed the said piece of wall recently erected by the petitioner in place of the gate near the clachan, on the ground now alleged by the respondents in defence of the said act, that it was an erection in violation of the immemorial rights of the public : Finds, that the said piece of wall being immediately thereafter re-erected by orders of the petitioner, with the addition of a stone stile with a hand rail in it, an assemblage of persons again proceeded, on 22d June 1854, to the lockup gate, and without the petitioner's consent, or any legal warrant, first wrenched from its hinges and demolished the said lockup gate, and then marching through Cally park, pulled down and destroyed the piece of wall which had been re-erected by the petitioner on the site of the gate near the clachan, as aforesaid: Finds, that whatever right of way the public may possess over the foresaid old parish road, the destruction of the said gate at the lockup, by the persons and in the manner above described, was an illegal invasion of the petitioner's rights of property, and an act of lawless violence, calculated to provoke a breach of the public peace: Finds the petitioner's title and interest to raise and insist in the present action sufficiently instructed by the titles produced, and the admissions in the record: Finds, that the petitioner has been for more than seven years previous to the demolition of the gate at the lockup, in the undisturbed possession of a gate of the same or a similar nature there, and in the undisturbed possession of a gate at the place where the foresaid old parish road enters Cally park, near the clachan of Girthon, for more than seven years previous to the recent removal of the said gate by the petitioner: Finds, that the prayer of the present petition, in so far as it seeks to have these or similar gates replaced until the rights of parties regarding the foresaid old parish road through Cally park shall be judicially determined, is reasonable, both with reference to the interests of parties and the vindication of the authority of the law; therefore repels the preliminary defences, grants warrant and authority to erect a new gate at the lockup house near Gatehouse, of the same nature and in the room of that which has been destroyed, and that, in the first instance, at the petitioner's expense, and at the sight of Mr James M'Candlish, architect, Kirkcubright: Further, grants warrant and authority to erect a wooden gate across the site of the old parish road near the clachan of Girthon, with a stile or steps for foot passengers, at the same place and of the same nature as the former gate and steps there, at the sight of the said James M'Candlish, and at the petitioner's expense, in the first instance: Interdicts and prohibits the respondents and all other persons from obstructing the petitioner, or the persons who may be employed by him in carrying out the said operations, and from destroying or interfering with the said gates, when erected, until the rights of parties connected with the access by these gates to the foresaid old parish road shall be judicially determined; but without prejudice to the alleged right of way claimed by the respondents for behoof of the public over the said old parish road: In the meantime, repels to the extent above mentioned the defences stated: And in respect of the respondents' opposition to the prayer of the petition, as now granted, and their attempted defence, in this process, of the violent and lawless demolition of the gate at the lockup above mentioned, finds them liable in expenses, as the same shall be taxed by the Auditor of Court, and subject to some modification, on account of the unsuccessful attempt of the petitioner to prove, in some of his averments in the record, the exclusion of the public from access to Cally park by these gates during the last seven years; and decerns."

The defenders advocated, and pleaded;—That the prayer of the petition for restoration of the recently erected gate as it stood when it was removed could not be granted, inasmuch as that erection was itself an illegal encroachment on the public right, and the petitioner would thereby be enabled to exclude the public entirely from the use of the road pending the processes of declarator which had been brought hinc inde, and under which the question as to the legal right of way will fall to be determined.'

Nov. 26, 1856.
Kirkpatrick v.
Murray.

At advising on 21st November—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The respondent, Mr Murray, contends that this road, which passes through his property, was shut up long ago by the authority of the justices, a new road having been opened in its stead; and the respondents contend, that whatever may have been done by the justices, this road never was de facto shut up, and that, at all events, they and the public have been in use to pass through it for a period of seven years, and the question whether it is a public road or not is in Court in the form of a declarator. The Steward allowed inquiry into the state of the facts, and the result of the inquiry as to the condition of things for the last seven years appears to be this: It is made out that Mr Murray had a gate at each end of this road. He had a gate at the end next the village called the clachan of Girthon, and there was a stile for foot-passengers close to the gate. He had also a gate at the other end, near the village of Gatehouse-of-Fleet, and that gate he was in the habit of shutting, and occasionally locking with a padlock, and sometimes securing it by a pin put into the ground—not much of a security, for the pin was on the outside of the gate. But in point of fact that made very little difference, for it was on the opposite side as parties were passing the one way or the other. But some time ago Mr Murray erected a wall, and also a new gate, to which he attached locks of a different kind, and made it secure. During the last seven years it appears that there has been a passage through these gates from either end without interruption; at least there does not appear to have been any substantial hindrance to such of the public as chose to pass that way. The gates have not been so used as to obstruct foot-passengers in the use of the road. There is no question brought before us directly as to the use of the road. The question presented to us is for authority to re-erect the gates, and for interdict against all interference with them. And if the question were simply as to the erection of the gates, there could not be much difficulty or room for difference of opinion between the parties, for I think that Mr Murray was entitled to have gates there; and gates, though not locked, may be a great security to the road—for example, in preventing straying cattle going in. Unquestionably gates were there, but they were not used as obstructions; and although the right to the road is not the question now before us, still access to the road is the question, and that gives a legitimate right to the parties now to object to the erection of the gates, if it is proposed to use them as obstructions to the right of way which the advocates say they possess. Now is it proposed so to use them? The prayer of the petition is to restore matters as nearly as possible to the state in which they were previously to the operations complained of. Now that is equivocal, because the situation in which matters were immediately prior to the operations complained of was this, that Mr Murray had stopped the use of the gates: he had completely shut them up. Therefore, if that is the meaning of the prayer, it amounts to this, that the Sheriff shall grant authority to the respondent to obstruct the public in going through these gates. If, again, it means that matters are to be restored to what was their legal condition generally at that time, there appears to be no objection at all to that, and on the first reading I thought that was what was meant. But from the way in which the case has been argued before us, it is impossible to hold that. The Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute have practically found that; for the Sheriff-substitute has found that Mr Murray is entitled to erect a gate, with a stile or steps for passengers, and so on, “but without prejudice to the alleged right of way claimed by the respondents for behoof of the public over the said old parish road.” That is practically what he has found. But the advocates say that the judgment may be so construed as to exclude their access altogether, and the respondent, when it was put to him, would not bring himself under any restraint at all as to the use he was to make of these gates. On the contrary, he seemed to contend that he was entitled to lock them, and he disputed that the advocates had established in evidence a right of passage there during the last seven years. Therefore, being of opinion that the advocates have established such a right, we cannot allow the respondent to have things restored to the condition in which he says they were previous to the operations complained of—that is, into a condition in which he may be allowed to obstruct the passage. He may be allowed to have gates there, and if so, I think that the advocates ought to be interdicted from taking them down; but he shall not be allowed to use these gates so as to exclude the public pending the action of declarator, and therefore I am disposed to pronounce an interlocutor to that effect.

LORD IVORY.—I am very much of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I am exactly of the same opinion. I think that the Sheriff really meant nothing else than the meaning your Lordship has put on the interlocutor; but it is capable of being otherwise construed, and it is as well to remove all ambiguity.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion. The Dean of Faculty's objection to the competency of any such qualification as is now proposed upon the authority to re-erect the gates, and upon the interdict to be granted, was rested upon the fact that no counter application for a possessory judgment had been presented by any member of the public. Now, observe the terms of the proprietor's application. He sets forth expressly that "no carriage, cart, or other vehicle, or passengers on foot, have been allowed to enter the said park, or to pass along the for-said old parish road, except by tolerance, since it was so shut up and suppressed by the authority of the road trustees in 1806." Upon this footing he came into Court, asking a warrant to restore matters to the state in which they were before the public removed the gate and demolished the wall—meaning, avowedly, a state which would entirely exclude the public. Accordingly, the proprietor's own proof is directed to the support of his proposition that the public had not used the road during, at all events, the possessory period, and he cannot now ask that the case shall be disposed of as if no proof on that subject had been asked for or led. Moreover, his petition contains an alternative prayer for interim regulation of the possession; and here, again, he cannot now object to the competency of such regulation. Besides, and apart from all this, I see no incompetency in the proposed qualification, the necessity for which naturally arises out of the very nature of an application of this kind. In June 1854 the proprietor built up the wall at the clachan, and for the first time, within the possessory period, absolutely refused access to the public through the lockup gate; the consequence of which was, that the advocates forced their way through that gate, in order to reach the newly-erected wall at the other (the clachan) end of the road, which they demolished. Now, before we can authorise the proprietor to re-erect his gates and obstructions for the avowed purpose of excluding the public, must we not inquire whether he was entitled, in this summary manner, so to exclude them? I have read the proof, and I think he was not so entitled, without in the first instance establishing his right in a declarator. His proceedings for the exclusion of the public were just as much taken vi et facti as those of the public for the maintenance of their possession. And what the Court have to do is to restore and preserve the former state of possession as nearly as may be till the result of the depending declarator.

The case was again put to the roll, of this date, to pronounce the interlocutor. Both parties contended that they had been substantially successful, and were entitled to expenses—the respondent pleading that the judgment did not go beyond what he was all along willing to concede, and that the whole litigation originated in a lawless act on the part of the public, which amounted to a crime.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question originated in the knocking down of the gates erected by the respondent across this parish road, which is stated to have been a violent and unlawful proceeding. It may be so. There is not much evidence of that

No. 19. before us; and we are not now called on to state how far it was violent and unlawful. But it is stated by the respondent that the gates had been, prior to the date of 1st June, locked up, and access to the public denied, so as to change the nature of the possession. The proof shows that the nature of the possession was changed at that time. Mr Murray then applied to the Sheriff to have the gates restored. He has succeeded in getting judgment for the restoration of the gates; but in dealing with the question of expenses of the application, we are to look to the nature of the application, and to the manner in which the proceedings have been conducted here, as well as in the Court below. The act complained of may have been unlawful; but that is not the important question to be considered in regard to the expenses of this proceeding. If the parties who have been guilty of a violent and unreasonable act—I do not say to what extent this is unlawful—make no resistance to the application to have the gate restored, there would be little question about expenses. But Mr Murray's application was to have matters restored to their condition before the gates and wall were knocked down; and what was the meaning of that part of the prayer of the petition? It did not come out very clearly in any positive statement in the Inferior Court. It did here, and the contention was, that matters were to be restored to the condition they were in immediately prior to 1st June—not to the condition in which they were seven years before. It is now contended on the part of Mr Murray, that, of course, he would have put the other construction on the interlocutor of the Sheriff. But it was put from the bench whether this was the meaning he attached to the judgment; and the whole argument proceeded on the footing that it was not. The respondent farther contended that the condition immediately preceding the 1st June was the condition in which it had been for seven years before—viz. that the gates had always been kept locked, and the public excluded, except when the respondent's gatekeeper allowed passengers to pass. Proof was allowed, and it is that which forms the great expense in this case. Proof was allowed—of what? Of the respondent Mr Murray's averment that there had been no passage through these gates since 1836, except by tolerance. No doubt a great many pleas of the advocates were maintained, which were not entitled to much consideration. But such was the contention of the respondent. The Sheriff-substitute found against Mr Murray upon that matter; and when the case came here, we, on considering it, were also of opinion that a passage through these gates for seven years by the public had been established, and it being in that state of matters contended that the respondent was entitled to have things restored to the locked up condition in which they were immediately before the 1st June, it was impossible to listen to his plea. In these circumstances, I think that the subject of dispute is decided not in favour of Mr Murray, but against him; and I see that in the Inferior Court, after proof was led, a minute was put in by the advocates substantially to the effect of our judgment, which would not be agreed to, but which shows very clearly the construction which Mr Murray meant to put on the interlocutor of the Sheriff. He would make no kind of terms at all. The respondents have really and substantially gained their case, and are entitled to expenses.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur.

LORD DEAS.—I entirely agree with your Lordships. The Solicitor-General puts the matter on two grounds. He says, 1st, That we have done nothing by our interlocutor beyond what Mr Murray was all along willing to concede; 2d, That the whole litigation originated in a lawless act on the part of the public, which amounted to a crime. But, 1st, Your Lordship has distinctly pointed out that Mr Murray came into Court asking authority to do that which would have absolutely excluded the public; and the Dean of Faculty's argument, to the end, was, that, no matter what had been proved about possession, it was totally incompetent, in this process, to put any qualification whatever upon the authority and interdict asked by Mr Murray. Mr Murray declined at the same time all concession; and he had previously objected to allow this case to await the result of the declarator. 2d, As to whether the demolition of the wall and gate was a crime or not, I say nothing. I shall only say, that it would be far wiser and better for parties to come into Court on such occasions than to proceed vi et facti; but, if there was a crime at all, it would be difficult to say that Mr Murray was not art and part in it. He did the first lawless act. In place of applying to the Court, he took the law into his own hands. He inverted the possession, which had existed during the possessory period, by absolutely excluding the public from a right we have found they were entitled to exercise. Now, if I fire the first shot into a crowd, and the crowd then fire in return, and a riot ensues, am I not art and part in that riot? I could certainly not be said to be blameless, nor can Mr Murray be held to be so here. On the whole, I have no doubt that the advocates, who have substantially gained their cause, ought to be found entitled to their expenses.

Ld. Handyside L.

THIS action was directed against Sir John Bayley, Baronet, as sole accepting and acting trustee and executor of the deceased Lord Saltoun, the conclusions being “to implement the obligation undertaken by the said Right Honourable Alexander George Fraser, Lord Saltoun, to the pursuer, under the missives of lease, offer, and acceptance entered into on the 6th day of November 1835 between the pursuer and Lewis Chalmers, Esq., Fraserburgh, factor for, and acting on behalf of, the said Alexander George Fraser, Lord Saltoun, and relative minutes thereon endorsed.” The allegation of the pursuer was that he had right to certain meliorations under the lease which expired in November 1855. The late Lord Saltoun died in August 1853.

The defender’s first plea in law was—“All parties interested are not called; and in particular, the present Lord Saltoun, as the proprietor of the subjects to which this action relates, is not, and ought to be, called as a defender therein.”

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Having heard parties’ procurators on the dilatory defence contained in the defender’s first plea in law—Repels the said plea, and decerns: And in respect that the defender states that he is not to acquiesce in this interlocutor, finds him liable in the expenses of discussing said plea,” &c. *

The defender reclaimed.

HOUSE property of small value in the town of Dunse was conveyed by the trust-disposition and settlement of Mr John White to his second son and his wife in liferent, and at their death to their children in fee. The testator’s son died in 1852, and his widow in October 1853, leaving two sons of the ages of twenty and sixteen respectively, and a daughter aged thirteen years. The petitioner was in December 1853 appointed judicial factor upon the estate.

The present application was presented by the judicial factor in June 1856, “for authority to complete the title to the property, and thereafter to sell it.” At the date of the petition the eldest son was of age; the other two children were minors puberes, and resident in New York. Along with the petition a power of attorney was produced from them in favour of their eldest brother, authorising him to take steps for selling the subjects in question,

The defender may, if he thinks fitting, bring an action of relief against the party who he alleges ought, in law, to satisfy the pursuer’s claim. But the Lord Ordinary does not see that the pursuer can be required to raise a supplementary action against that party, even with a reservation, as proposed by the defender, of relieving the pursuer of the consequences of bringing such action, should the defender so called in it be ultimately assoilzied.”

“and for that purpose to take any and all proceedings in any and all courts that may be necessary in the premises.” No. 21.

The petition set forth that the property was in a ruinous state, and unproductive, the present rental being only L.8, 7s. 10d. A builder and also a joiner had reported that it would require at least L.100 to put the property into tenantable repair, and that even then, exclusive of a garden, it would not produce more than L.17 per annum; while, in its present state, no respectable tenant would occupy it. Nov. 28, 1856.
Williamson.

The Lord Ordinary remitted to Mr James Duncan, W.S., who reported that there appeared to him no room for doubt of the expediency of having the subjects in question sold. At the same time, he doubted the propriety, in point of form, of authorising the factor either to complete titles or to sell. The disposition and settlement did not convey the property in question to trustees for behoof of the fiars. The destination was, “I dispone to Thomas White, my second son, and Ann Rutherford, his wife, in liferent for their liferent use allenary, and at their death to their children in fee, all and whole,” &c. It appeared to the reporter, therefore, that, as the three children were themselves the fiars, and were under no incapacity from making up a title themselves by the use of the ordinary forms of law, the Court were not called on to put its nobile officium in exercise in order to make up a title in the person of their own officer. “On explaining this to the petitioner’s agent he states to the reporter that the petitioner will be quite satisfied if the Court grant special power to the factor to concur with the fiars in selling and disposing without making up any title in the factor’s person. It is stated to the reporter that the fiars intend completing a title in their own person, and that the state of the title admits of their doing so by a simple service and infestment upon it and an unexecuted procuratory.”

Ritchie, for the petitioner, now contended that the power of sale prayed for was not inconsistent with the duties of the factor, and was also a most expedient act of management. The Court had been in use to grant similar powers of sale where house property was exposed to immediate deterioration.¹

LORD IVORY.—In the case of Fergusson there were involved the interests of creditors, and the case appeared to the Court one of urgent necessity. Here there are three fiars, and the question is, whether, there being no competition of creditors, and no difficulty of administration, we are to take the administration out of their hands?

LORD PRESIDENT.—The petition prays for authority to sell, and states that the whole of the parties interested urge and desire the petitioner to apply for authority to complete a title to the subjects and sell them, as being more for their interest. But, if the factor gets rid of his factory, is not that better for him than getting power to concur? I do not think this is a case for the interference of the Court.

LORD IVORY.—The reporter also states that the fiars are completing titles in their own persons. Why should we embarrass them in doing so?

THE COURT “Refuse the prayer of the petition.”

AT the late Miss Williamson's death it was not known who was her heir and next of kin, and, on the petition of her agent, Mr Wood, Accountant, was appointed judicial factor upon her estate. She was possessed, inter alia, of a sum of L.2500, invested on heritable security. Sometime before her death, intimation of payment at the term of Martinmas 1853 had been given, but, as Miss Williamson predeceased that term, the amount was consigned in bank, and afterwards uplifted by the judicial factor. The petitioners having administered as the nearest and lawful heirs in general of Miss Williamson, the prayer of the present petition was for "interim warrant to the judicial factor to make payment to the petitioners of the L.2500, and interest thereon ; to ordain the factor to lodge his accounts of intromissions, and to remit to the junior Lord Ordinary, in order that they may be examined, audited, and settled." "As also to recall the appointment of the said William Wood as judicial factor foresaid, and to exoner him and his cautioner of the said factory, and to grant warrant to and ordain the Accountant-General of the Court of Session, or other custodier thereof, to deliver up the said William Wood's bond of caution."

The Lord Ordinary, of this date, reported that the factor's accounts had been audited and found correct, and therefore that he might now receive his discharge.

LORD IVORY.—My difficulty is, that this is engrafting something on the original factory, which does not belong to it. The ground of the factory was, that there was nobody to take the management of the estate, with the view of preserving it for Miss Williamson's legal representatives. But there is nothing in the prayer of the petition under which Mr Wood was appointed which entitles him to do more than administer, and it is in an incidental way that we are now to declare the right of certain parties, without any assistance from the factor, or any report from him. I hesitate to take such a step to acknowledge the right of parties who are not parties to the original proceeding, without knowing something more of the case. Truly, to give effect to the prayer of these parties is to declare their right.

Sol.-Gen, for the petitioners—No doubt the application proceeds in the name of parties who have shewn themselves to have right to the character of Miss Williamson's nearest and lawful heirs, and also her next of kin. But they have called the factor as a party to this application, and the prayer is to recall his appointment, and to exoner him and his cautioner of the factory, so that this is truly an application for putting an end to the factory. Undoubtedly this cannot be afterwards founded on as res judicata between the petitioners and parties who are not here. The only question is, whether the Court will grant a discharge to the factor, who has produced all the necessary documents. In point of principle that is all.

LORD IVORY.—My difficulty is to do this incidentally. We are relieving him and his cautioner of that which is the security of the estate, though the prayer is not by them, but by other parties.

The Court delayed pronouncing an interlocutor, until an application should be presented by the factor himself for discharge.

Ship—Insurance.—A ship broker effected an insurance on a vessel, without disclosing the name of his principal. A loss ensued, and the underwriters objected to the validity of the policy, on the ground of misrepresentation. They afterwards wrote off a loss. Their brokers communicated this to the insured, and offered to settle on condition of the insured getting authority from the trustee of their broker (who had become bankrupt) to receive the insurance, but under deduction of certain premiums due by him personally on transactions with which the insured had no concern. This condition was refused by the insured. It was not proved that the underwriters had impressed funds into the hands of their brokers to settle the loss, nor that they had authorised their brokers to waive the objection of misrepresentation;—Held that the underwriters were not barred by this adjustment from shewing that the policy was ab initio void.

THE pursuers, Losh, Wilson, and Bell, were iron manufacturers in Northumberland. In June 1852, they applied to William Henry Brockett, ship and insurance broker at Newcastle, and secretary and principal director of the Marine Insurance Company there, to effect an insurance for L.1300 on a cargo of iron rails to Quebec, by a vessel called the “Maidstone,” then lying at, and about to sail from Newcastle-on-Tyne. The amount to be insured was L.1300; but this sum exceeded the amount which was insurable by the company, and it was therefore agreed that Mr Brockett should get the insurance effected in Glasgow.

Ld. Benholme.
C.

On 14th June 1852, Mr Brockett addressed the following letter to Thomas D. Douglas and Company, underwriters and brokers in Glasgow :—“ Please insure L.1300 on iron rails, valued at sum insured, per ‘Maidstone,’ AE 1 (No. 57 in Lloyd’s Register), Captain Hayman, from hence to Quebec. The remainder of the cargo is coke. Vessel not sailed. The quotation from Glasgow is L.3, 3s. per cent, at which rate please effect this order.”

On 15th June 1852, Douglas and Company replied :—“ We are duly in receipt of your favour of the 14th, and have insured L.1300 on iron rails, warranted free from particular average, unless stranded, by the ‘Maidstone,’ from the Tyne to Quebec. We have not been able to succeed with the risk under your limit of 3 guineas per cent, iron laden vessels not being much in favour in our room, and the previous inquiries, through one of our neighbours, having in a manner fixed the premium at above rate.

“ Copy of policy shall be sent you to-morrow.”

And on the following day, 16th June 1852,—“ We had this pleasure yesterday, and now wait upon you with copy of policy for L.1300 on iron rails, per ‘Maidstone,’ which we trust will be found in order.”

The copy of the policy bore to be effected in the name of “W. H. Brockett, as well in his own name as for and in the name or names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain, in part or in all, doth make assurance,” &c. The sum insured was L.1300, “lost or not lost, at and from the Tyne to Quebec, upon any kind of goods and merchandises; and also upon the body, tackle, apparel, &c., of and in the good ship or vessel called the ‘Maidstone.’” The risk was declared to commence from the loading, and to continue until 24 hours after the vessel should be moored in good safety at the port of discharge. Upon this policy the defender Martin was an underwriter to the extent of L.100.

The premium, at the rate of three guineas per cent, amounted to L.49, 19s., and along with the duty and the expense of the policy, was paid by the pursuers, Losh, Wilson, and Bell, to their broker, Mr Brockett.

The vessel sailed, but was forced to put back to Queenstown, Cork, where it was found, upon a survey, that she had suffered some damage. She was

No. 23. however repaired, and again sailed, but was lost off Cape Breton, North America, together with her cargo, including the iron rails on which the insurance had been effected.

Nov. 28, 1856.
Losh, Wilson,
and Bell v.
Martin.

On 28th December 1852, Mr Brockett communicated the loss of the ship to Douglas and Company, and on the 30th December 1852, Douglas and Company wrote to Mr Brockett as follows :—" We duly received your favour of 28th inst., with copies of the correspondence relative to the loss of the cargo of rails, per ' Maidstone,' insured by us in June last, and which we have laid before the underwriters on the policy. Our attention has been called to the fact, that the vessel was without character when she sailed. In your letter, ordering the insurance, you describe her as $\mathcal{A}E$ 1, whereas we find, upon reference to the supplement which appeared subsequently, that her character had been still withheld upon survey. We regret this exceedingly, as the underwriters say that, but for the representation that the vessel was $\mathcal{A}E$ 1, they would not have taken the risk on any terms. And we fear, therefore, they will object to pay the loss. We shall, however, be glad to see them again on the subject, on hearing from you, with any explanations you may have to make as to this discrepancy."

Mr Brockett replied as follows, on 3d January 1853 :—" I duly received your favour of the 30th ult., which I shewed to Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell, the shippers and insurers of the cargo. They, of course, immediately referred to Lloyd's books, and found the vessel there precisely as represented in my order to you. They could know nothing of what was to be in a supplement, which is not dated until the 17th June, and was delivered long afterwards with the new book. Besides, it appears to me that the omission of character must be an error, as the vessel, in a subsequent supplement (No. 6), appears as of the class represented. I hope this explanation will be satisfactory, and that there will be no difficulty about the settlement."

On 5th January 1853, Douglas and Company replied, that the explanations given by Brockett had not altered the views of the underwriters, and after recapitulating some of the facts above given, and referring to the regulations at Lloyds, they stated :—" In any view of the case, therefore, the underwriters maintain that the vessel could not be considered $\mathcal{A}E$ 1, and they insist that the misrepresentation, made on this point, invalidates the policy, as, but for this, they would not have been induced to underwrite the vessel with cargo of iron at any rate of premium. The circumstances of her having to put back to Cork for repairs, they look upon as proof of her unseaworthy condition : and the fact of her having been there repaired and restored to the letter in Lloyd's, they do not consider in any way affects the case. By the delay thus occasioned, the voyage was also thrown late in the season, and to this circumstance may be attributed the ultimate loss of the vessel. From what we have stated, you will see that the grounds upon which settlement of the loss has been objected to is, that of misrepresentation,—the vessel having been represented in the order for insurance, 14th June, as $\mathcal{A}E$ 1, when actually surveyed by Lloyd's in May and found unworthy of character."

A lengthened correspondence ensued, consisting wholly of letters from Douglas and Company, wanting information, and letters from Brockett, giving information and sending documents relative to the unseaworthiness of the vessel and her position at Lloyds. At last, on 5th April 1853, Losh, Wilson, and Bell wrote direct to Douglas and Company for a settlement, but the answer was that the underwriters still required further documents.

In the meantime Brockett stopped payment ; and on 13th May 1856, Losh, Wilson, and Bell wrote to Douglas and Company as follows ;—(after referring to various documents then sent)—" We refer you to the copy of letter from Mr Bourinot, for the amount realised by the sale of the iron saved. We regret we cannot ascertain who holds the proceeds, having inquired at every quarter without effect. However, the agent at Sydney is no agent of our appointing, and we fear the nett proceeds will be a mere trifle. We think you must now admit that we have had great patience in this matter, and have done everything in our power to produce the documents required. It seems that the information, as to the survey, can only be got by an inspection at Lloyd's. See Lloyd's book, section 19, page 7. The underwriters on the ship have settled, as well as those on the freight and coke shipped by the 'Maidstone.' Is it not, then, very unreasonable that we are still refused a settlement after a period of so many months? We have only now to request that you will inform us whether the underwriters mean to pay or not, as we are not disposed to sit quiet any longer."

In reply, Douglas and Company wrote the following letter, dated 17th May 1853:—"We duly received your favour of 13th inst., with enclosures, and have placed these, along with the other papers relating to loss per 'Maidstone,' in the hands of the underwriters, who, we have every reason to expect, will now put us in possession of an early adjustment of this claim. As it rests with the assured, however, to recover the salvage proceeds, they will doubtless deduct the amount of same, in conformity with Mr Bourinot's letter, until you are able to show that you have used every reasonable endeavour to recover without success. The insurance having been effected by us on account of Mr W. H. Brockett, we cannot recognise you in the matter, or make any settlement, without authority of Mr Brockett's trustees; and there will fall to be deducted from the loss the sum of L.240, owing by Mr Brockett for premiums of insurance. The underwriters on the hull of the ship, having apparently sent their own surveyor to inspect her previous to taking in cargo, they certainly could have no good pretext for disputing or questioning the claim; but our underwriters would not have taken the risk on any terms had they been aware of the fact that the vessel had just been examined by the surveyor for Lloyd's, and found unworthy of character, when, on the contrary, they were led to believe from the letter ordering the insurance that she was Æ 1, and they considered, therefore, that the circumstances justified them in requiring the very fullest information."

Losh, Wilson, and Bell's answer was as follows:—"21st May, 1853.—We beg to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 17th inst., the contents of which surprise us very much. In the correspondence which has already taken place, you have admitted us to be the parties entitled to the money, and it is only now, after a lapse of many months, and under altered circumstances, that you appear to find it convenient to repudiate our title, and claim to pay the amount of the insurance to Mr Brockett, first deducting therefrom a debt due to yourselves. We have, we think, manifested a sincere desire throughout the whole of this business, to comply with any reasonable requisition, but, when you attempt to pay the debt of Mr Brockett with our money, it is necessary that all further correspondence should close, and the matter be placed in the hands of our solicitors. In conclusion, we have only to add that we have no objections to receive the amount of insurance, less the salvage proceeds, leaving the latter claim to be adjusted hereafter."

On 9th June 1853, Douglas and Company wrote to Losh, Wilson, and Bell as follows:—"For your information, we beg to say that the underwriters, per 'Maidstone,' have written off a loss upon the policy of L.87, 8s. 6d. per cent., for settlement on the 15th instant. We have no objection to hand over to you any balance of Mr Brockett's account, to which you may be legally entitled, on receiving a proper authority to do so from Mr Brockett's trustees." And of same date, 9th June 1853, Douglas and Company wrote to Mr Lockey Harle, as representing Brockett, as follows:—"We beg to advise that the underwriters, upon policy for L.1300, on Brockett, have now written off a loss of L.87, 8s. 6d. per cent., for settlement on the 15th instant. A claim has been made for this loss by Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell of Newcastle, but the policy being in name of Mr Brockett, we cannot part with the money without consent of the trustees on his estate. If we are to pay the loss to these gentlemen, you will oblige us by furnishing us with the necessary authority from the trustees."

Losh, Wilson,
and Bell v.
Martin.

On 13th June 1853, Messrs Chater, solicitors in Newcastle, wrote to Douglas and Company as follows :—" In reply to your letter, addressed to Messrs Losh and Company, we beg to say that our clients are disposed to accept L.87, 8s. 6d. per cent., on their loss on account, leaving the balance to be adjusted hereafter ; but with reference to any claim against Mr Brockett being deducted, they cannot sanction it. Should the underwriters not feel disposed to settle upon these terms, be pleased to refer us to their solicitor."

On 21st June 1853, Douglas and Company wrote to Mr Lockey Harle as follows :—" Being now in possession of a settlement from the underwriters, per 'Maidstone,' your early reply to the subject of our letter of 9th instant will oblige." And on 1st July 1853, Messrs Chater again wrote to Douglas and Company as follows :—" We beg to say that we have received positive instructions from Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell, of this town, to institute legal proceedings against you, unless their claims upon the underwriters of the 'Maidstone's' cargo be arranged forthwith. Unless we receive a satisfactory reply to this communication within three days, we shall issue process." Douglas and Company replied on 2d July 1853, as follows :—" In reply to your communication of yesterday's date, we beg to say that we cannot in any way recognise Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell's claim to loss, per 'Maidstone,' without consent and authority from Mr Brockett's trustees. This determination we intimated to these gentlemen, as well as to the solicitor for the trustees, some time ago."

In these circumstances, the present action was raised. It was directed against Alexander Martin, one of the underwriters, and concluded for payment by him of L.100, as his proportion of the total valued sum of L.1300 stated in the policy, " under deduction of a proportion of the value of any iron which may have been saved and realised from the wreck."

The pursuers pleaded ;—1. As the goods insured were lost in consequence of the perils of the seas occurring in the course of the voyage insured, the same constituted a loss under the policy ; and the defender is, in law and justice, liable to make good his proportion thereof, in terms of the conclusions of the summons. 2. It was no way necessary for the pursuers to make any representation regarding the state or condition of the ship, because every circumstance of that nature is covered by and included in the implied warranty of seaworthiness ; and therefore, while the defender does not insist upon any plea of unseaworthiness, his statements as to alleged representations are irrelevant. 3. The pretended misrepresentation imputed to Mr Brockett in the order of insurance is entirely without foundation, in respect that it referred merely to the description of the vessel contained in Lloyd's Register at the date of the said order, which description was both substantially and literally true ; and farther, that the same was made by Mr Brockett, in the bona fide belief of its truth, and that he neither knew nor had cause of knowledge of any circumstances or latent proceedings of Lloyd's committee having a different tendency, nor, as far as the pursuers yet know, were there any such existing at the date of the order of insurance or the policy. 4. The underwriters, including the defender, having already admitted their liability for a loss of L.87, 8s. 6d. per cent. under the policy, and written off the same as loss, are now barred from objecting to the validity of the insurance. 5. According to the terms of the policy, the insurance was effected in the name of Brockett, for behoof of the party having the real interest, and that the real interest is in the pursuers is both proved and admitted by the correspondence. 6. There are no termini habiles for the plea of compensation attempted to be set up by the defender, in respect that Brockett, who is said to be debtor for an account of premiums due to the defender, is not creditor in the amount of the loss claimed, and that the pursuers, who are creditors in the said loss, are not debtors for the pretended account of premiums, so that the parties between whom the compensation is pleaded are not reciprocally debtors and creditors in the claims attempted to be set off.

Nov. 28, 1856.
Losh, Wilson,
and Bell v.
Martin.

Similar actions had been directed against the other underwriters.

The defender founded on the circumstances contained in the above correspondence as amounting to misrepresentation in essentialibus, and pleaded;—1. The accumulation of actions at the pursuers' instance is unwarrantable. 2. The pursuers have no right or title to sue, without production of a stamped policy. 3. The policy libelled not having been a delivered instrument, cannot be sued on, at least cannot be sued on till the pursuers pay the premiums, and otherwise put themselves in the position of parties to whom constructively it has been delivered. 4. The pursuers have no right to claim under the policy libelled, which is in name of Mr Brockett; and, at all events, they cannot put themselves in a better position than Mr Brockett himself, and are liable to all exceptions and defences pleadable against that gentleman. 5. The policy libelled on is void from misrepresentation. 6. The policy is further void, in respect of unseaworthiness of the vessel. 7. No claim lies on the policy libelled, in respect of the loss occurring on a different voyage, and in different circumstances from those to which the policy is applicable. The claim is excluded by deviation and change of risk. 8. In any event, the claim for loss under the policy is subject to the set off by way of compensation of the premiums due, both on this and other vessels, by Mr Brockett; and, at all events, of the premiums due on this policy itself. 9. The claim for loss is also, in any event, subject to deduction of the amount of salvage.

On 6th December 1854, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repels the first plea in law for the defenders: Further, in respect of the correspondence produced previous to the 9th of June 1853, and of the announcement made of that date by the defender's brokers, Messrs T. D. Douglas and Company in their letters to the pursuers, and to Mr Harle, finds that the defenders are not now entitled to dispute the validity of the policy libelled; and therefore repels the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and tenth pleas for the defenders, in so far as they involve this ground of defence: Sustains the ninth plea in law for the defenders; and in reference to their eighth plea, finds that the policy libelled was done in name of Mr Brockett alone, and not in the name of any of the pursuers: But finds that it is alleged by the pursuers that Messrs Douglas and Company, the brokers, knew that Mr Brockett was acting, not on his own account, but as an agent, which is denied by the defenders: Finds, that whilst this allegation is relevant to elide the defenders' eighth plea, so far as their claim upon the broker's general lien is concerned, the onus probandi lies upon the pursuers: Allows them within ten days to put in an issue applicable to their statement as to this matter on record, and reserves in the meantime the question of expenses."*

* "NOTE.—The defences founded on misrepresentation, unseaworthiness, and deviation, having formed the subject of a lengthened correspondence, and detailed explanations between the parties, the Lord Ordinary cannot but consider Messrs Douglas' letters of 9th June 1853, confirmed as they are by the markings on the

Both parties reclaimed; and on 18th January 1856 the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall in hoc statu the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary complained of, in so far as it finds that the defenders are not entitled to dispute the validity of the policy libelled; and, in respect that both parties have expressed a desire that this ground of defence should be disposed of in the first instance, and should be investigated by a proof on commission, and have renounced probation on this part of the cause, except on the question of fact whether the underwriters put the brokers, Messrs Douglas, in possession of funds to pay the insurance: Therefore, before farther answer, allow both parties a proof as to that matter of fact: Grant commission; and, in the meantime, supersede consideration of the other part of the case, and grant diligence."

Under this interlocutor a mass of documentary evidence was recovered, including the accounts current, or states, rendered by Douglas and Company to the underwriters. The result of the whole was, that Douglas and Company did not appear to have been specially authorised, on the part of the underwriters, to pass from any objections by them to the policy. The question remained, therefore, whether the defenders were now entitled to show that the policy was void ab initio in regard to unseaworthiness? and (2) assuming that they were so entitled, whether the contract under the policy was converted into a different transaction, whereby the underwriters had arranged a settlement on a different footing?

The case was argued at great length on the 11th and 18th November 1856, the underwriters contending, chiefly on the authority of the English cases of Herbert v. Champion, and Buller v. Harrison,¹ that nothing but actual payment would bar a challenge of a policy of insurance.

Of this date the case was advised.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action brought by Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell, against Alexander Martin, as one of the underwriters on a certain policy of insurance on the barque "Maidstone;" and the action, being rested on that policy, concludes against Mr Martin for payment of the sum of L.100 underwritten by him on that policy, as his share of L.1300 insured on the vessel, but under deduction of the value of any iron saved from the wreck. The policy was effected upon a quantity of iron, and it appears that a certain portion of the iron had been saved. It is not expressly stated what the amount of that deduction is to be. It is not put specifically in the summons, nor on the record, but it is stated by the pursuers, in answer to one of the articles of the defenders' statement, that they are ready and willing to make any deduction that may be reasonable under the circumstances; and I sup-policy, as a final abandonment of their objections to the validity of the policy, and an admission of the liability of the defenders for the valued loss under deduction of the salvage.

"The pursuers had by their letter of 21st May 1853, intimated their willingness that the amount of the salvage should be deducted in the meantime. The Lord Ordinary cannot, therefore, consider these letters as mere offers of compromise, which required an acceptance of the insured in order to bind the underwriters.

"It is a totally different question whether the defenders are not entitled to settle the loss thus admitted on the principle proposed in one of their letters, whereby Mr Brockett's debt to Messrs Douglas for premiums was to be set off against part of the loss; the Lord Ordinary thinks that the defenders are entitled to the benefit of the general lien competent to their brokers, unless the insurers can prove that the brokers knew that Mr Brockett was acting, not as a principal, but as an agent. Such seems to be the doctrine of the English law as laid down by Arnold, p. 140."

pose, if the case turned upon that matter, there would be little difficulty in having it adjusted. In defence Mr Martin has stated various pleas. No. 23.

In particular, the fifth plea in law is this—"The policy libelled on is void from misrepresentation." The sixth plea is—"The policy is further void, in respect of unseaworthiness of the vessel." Nov. 28, 1856.
Loah, Wilson,
and Bell v.
Martin.

There are various other pleas; but with reference to these two, which are the pleas we have more immediately to consider at present, the pursuers have framed their fourth plea in law as follows:—"The underwriters, including the defender, having already admitted their liability for a loss of L.87, 8s. 6d. per cent under the policy, and written off the same as loss, are now barred from objecting to the validity of the insurance."

The Lord Ordinary, by an interlocutor of 6th December 1854, found that the defenders were not now entitled to dispute the validity of the policy. And his Lordship's reasons for that were shortly stated in a note appended to his interlocutor, to which I shall afterwards advert. The defender reclaimed against that judgment, and the pursuers also reclaimed against it on other grounds; but both parties were desirous that the objection to the policy should be first disposed of. We heard them on that point, and they renounced probation except as to one matter of fact—namely, whether the underwriters had put funds in the hands of the brokers, Messrs Douglas and Company, to settle the loss under the policy. Accordingly we pronounced the interlocutor of 18th January 1856, which is perhaps not correctly expressed in its language, but the meaning of which is abundantly obvious.

I do not know whether the parties desired to have the whole grounds of defence applicable to the validity of the policy disposed of before they went into the other point. But what we wished to dispose of was the reply to that ground of defence. Probation was renounced as to that part of the claim, not as to any other part; and the question was, whether the defenders were barred by that plea from now objecting to the validity of the insurance? I wish to notice that this last interlocutor was misunderstood at a further stage of the case. By recalling the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, we did not mean to pronounce any opinion on the question whether the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was well founded or not. We merely wished, before we could adhere to it, to have some further investigation into the facts. The allegation of the defender is, that this policy was void; that there was misrepresentation in essential matters at the time of entering into the policy, more especially in regard to the seaworthiness of the vessel; and therefore that he never was under any valid legal obligation in this risk. There can be no doubt of the legal effect of this defence, if it is properly supported by statement, and if the statement is properly supported by evidence. Therefore the question is, whether the defender is precluded from entering into it?

The ground upon which it is said that the defender is precluded from entering into that defence, is embodied in the fifth plea in law for the pursuers.

And in support of that objection to the defence, reference has been made to the correspondence which passed betwixt the parties, and also to the writing off of the loss by the underwriters. Further proof has been led by the examination of parties, and by the production of documents. The matter which was brought under our notice at the former discussion, had reference, as I understood it, to the contention on the part of the pursuers, that in regard to this loss, and to the adjustment of it on the policy, the underwriters had impressed funds into the hands of the brokers, Messrs Douglas and Company, to pay it. It rather appears that some of the underwriters have settled their loss, and so far these parties are out of the present question. In regard to an averment of specific impressment of funds into the broker's hands to pay this loss, it struck us as a matter that might be of importance, if made out; but it is not necessary to consider its legal import, because I am satisfied that it is not made out. It does not signify that the brokers had funds in their hands at the time belonging to the underwriters. The important fact to be made out is, that the funds were transmitted to them for the purpose of settling that loss. But that was not the state of the fact, and therefore the case comes very much before us as before the Lord Ordinary, except that there are now some additional documents. The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the defenders were not entitled—the plea is, that they were barred—but the Lord Ordinary's expression is,

No. 23. they were not entitled to dispute the validity of the policy libelled, and he repels the defences, so far as they involve this ground of defence.

Losh, Wilson,
Martin.

In order to appreciate the import of the correspondence and documents produced to us, it is necessary to keep in mind the relative position of the parties to each other. The pursuers were owners of the iron, but they entered into the transaction without their names being disclosed. Whether Brockett's position with reference to Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell, was known to Messrs Douglas and Company or not, is a matter not ascertained in this question. Probation has been renounced, and no evidence on either side has been adduced in regard to that matter. Brockett applied to Messrs Douglas and Company to effect that insurance. Douglas and Company were the brokers for these underwriters, of whom the present defender, Alexander Martin, is one. After the loss was known, a correspondence took place betwixt Messrs Douglas and Company and Brockett with reference to a settlement of that loss, and at that time, at the outset of the correspondence, Messrs Douglas and Company stated that an objection had occurred to the underwriters in regard to the validity of the policy. That objection was an alleged misrepresentation as to the class of the vessel at the time the policy was entered into. A good deal of correspondence passed on this subject, and explanations were given as to the cause of the discrepancy between Brockett's representations of her class and her position at Lloyds. It appears that she was classed A 1 in Lloyd's Register, but that she had lost her class, as appeared from a supplement of Lloyd's Register that had not then come to the knowledge of the pursuers. They were not aware of that at the time of entering into the policy. It does not appear for some time that Messrs Douglas and Company were satisfied with that explanation.

Another matter of explanation and ascertainment was the value of the iron saved. A good deal of correspondence took place on that subject. At length it was proposed to be settled in this way: A certain sum, L.12, 10s. per cent, was to be taken off the amount of the insurance, and to be retained in the meantime as the estimated value of the saved iron. That is the fair inference of the correspondence, and the parties came to be satisfied with that proposal as being a fair arrangement in the circumstances. With reference to the alleged misrepresentation, it does not appear that the underwriters, or Messrs Douglas and Company, communicating the views of the underwriters, ever expressed themselves perfectly satisfied with the explanations of the pursuers, or said that their objections were altogether removed. It may be, however, that by their conduct they waived the objection. It does not appear from that correspondence that any notice was taken of another matter afterwards brought under notice, namely, an occurrence at Newcastle, whereby it was alleged that the vessel was damaged, and unseaworthiness created. The word unseaworthiness is made use of, but only in reference to the displacing of her position at Lloyd's. That was not brought forward till a later period, but undoubtedly the matter of misrepresentation was brought forward at an early stage of the correspondence.

The correspondence comes to the point founded on mainly by the pursuer at the end of May and beginning of June 1853. In the meantime Mr Brockett, with whom the correspondence had previously taken place, stopped payment. It was known before that date to Messrs Douglas and Company that Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell were the parties interested in the insurance, and it appears that the failure of Brockett had suggested to Messrs Douglas and Company, that, as Brockett was owing them certain premiums on other policies, it would be a good opportunity to recover payment by withholding a portion of this loss as due to Brockett. The premiums for which they proposed so to withhold payment appear to have been owing to the underwriters, and some who were underwriters in this vessel. This was as to one half of the sum. The other half to be deducted was money due to Messrs Douglas and Company, either for themselves or for other underwriters, but not generally for the underwriters of this vessel. However, Messrs Douglas and Company desired to withhold both. On 13th May, Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell, addressed a letter direct to Messrs Douglas and Company, and in which the pursuers complain that they had not yet got a settlement. They say that the underwriters in the ship had settled their loss, and ask why the underwriters on the iron had not settled theirs. Messrs Douglas and Company write on the 17th May, that they had placed the letter of the pursuers in the hands of the underwriters, "who, we have every reason to expect, will now put us in possession of an early adjustment of this claim." That does not state that they were yet in possession of an adjustment of the claim, but only that there was reason to expect that they would soon be so, and in announcing that expectation they say that the salvage proceeds will doubtless be deducted, and also that "the insurance having been effected by us on account of Mr W. H. Brockett, we cannot recognise you in the matter, or make any settlement without authority of Mr Brockett's trustees; and there will fall to be deducted from the loss the sum of L.240, owing by Mr Brockett for premiums of insurance."

Losh, Wilson,
Martin.

Now this is the first intimation, so far as I remember, by Douglas and Company, of the expectation of being soon in a condition to settle the loss on the policy, and it conveys the intimation of an intention to deduct those premiums of insurance owing by Mr Brockett. It is also the first communication direct from Douglas and Company to Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell. Whether Messrs Douglas and Company were entitled to make such a deduction as regards the portion of the premiums relating to the underwriters of this policy, or of the other portion not relating to these underwriters, is a matter on which I do not desire to indicate any opinion. It is not a question before us at present. The Lord Ordinary has indicated an opinion favourable to deducting these, but I do not form any opinion upon it. But Messrs Douglas and Company, whether entitled to do so or not, advanced the pretension; and, stimulated by the failure of Brockett, they insisted upon it as a condition. Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell repudiated this view of the matter altogether. They instantly did so. On the 21st May, they wrote that they were surprised at the proposal "to pay the amount of the insurance to Mr Brockett, first deducting therefrom a debt due to yourselves. We have, we think, manifested a sincere desire throughout the whole of this business to comply with any reasonable requisition; but when you attempt to pay the debt of Mr Brockett with our money, it is necessary that all further correspondence should close, and the matter be placed in the hands of our solicitors."

Douglas and Company now knew that Brockett had made the insurance for Losh, Wilson, and Bell. They had been told so by that time; but I do not see that they departed from the statement that Brockett was the party they had to deal with. In short, this letter of the 21st May, is a distinct, express, and clear refusal to admit the mode of settlement proposed by Messrs Douglas and Company.

Then the next letter from Messrs Douglas and Company is dated 9th June, to Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell. On that day also they wrote to Mr Lockey Harle, the agent for Brockett, who had informed them of his failure. To Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell, they say, that "the underwriters have written off a loss upon the policy of L.87, 8s. 6d. per cent, for settlement on the 15th instant. We have no objection to hand over to you any balance of Mr Brockett's account to which you may be legally entitled, on receiving a proper authority to do so from Mr Brockett's trustees."

That advances us a step further. The underwriters had written off a loss on the policy. Now, that L.87, 8s. 6d. is the L.100, minus the estimated value of the iron saved. Therefore what they had written off on the policy is the loss on the "Maidstone" tentatively, because the difference betwixt the L.87 and the L.100 was a matter for future consideration, being what I have stated, the L.100 minus the value of the iron saved. That last passage admits of more than one construction. In writing to Brockett's agent on 9th June, of same date with the letter I have last alluded to, the terms of their letter is perfectly consistent with their language to Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell, for in their letter to these parties they say they will not settle with them without first getting authority from Brockett's trustee to do so. At the same time, they write to the trustee, to say that they require their authority to settle with Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell. They do not say anything in that letter to Lockey Harle as to retaining the insurance to pay the debt due by Brockett. But if they held that Brockett was the insurer, they did not require to do so, for they would do so in settling with him as a matter of course.

I have said that in the last paragraph of the letter from Douglas and Company to Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell, there is room for observation. They say, "We have no objection to hand over to you any balance of Mr Brockett's account to which you may be legally entitled, on receiving a proper authority to do so from Mr Brockett's trustees."

"Any balance to which you may be legally entitled." That might raise the question whether the meaning was not, We will settle with you, and hand over any balance to which you may be legally entitled, after settling the question of our right of retention on account of Brockett. And if that letter had been accepted in that sense by Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell, the question might have come to be one of nicety, and different from what it now is. There was not a clear and distinct waiver of the objection on the other ground. But I do not think it was so accepted by Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell, because their answer, which is made through their attornies—not the most conciliatory way of answering a proposal—is that they are disposed to accept of the L.87, 8s. 6d. per cent on their loss on account, leaving the balance to be adjusted hereafter; but with reference to any claim against Mr Brockett being deducted, they cannot sanction it. Should the underwriters not feel disposed to settle upon these terms, be pleased to refer us to their solicitor. That is, if you do not agree to pass from that claim altogether, refer us to your solicitor. That was the correspondence at that date—and that was quite consistent with the tone taken by Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell, that they would not allow any deduction of the kind to be made. They say, if you insist on any such deduction, the matter must go to law. The next communication of any importance is from Messrs Douglas and Company to Lockey Harle, on 21st June, in which they say, "Being now in possession of a settlement from the underwriters, per 'Maidstone,' your early reply to the subject of our letter of 9th instant will oblige."

Messrs Chater again write on 1st July, to the effect that they have received positive instructions to institute legal proceedings unless a settlement be made within three days; and Douglas and Company reply that they cannot recognise Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell's claim, without consent and authority from Mr Brockett's trustees.

That letter of the 21st June, in which Douglas and Company state that they are in possession of a settlement from the underwriters, was a repetition of the request made on 9th June, to know whether Brockett's trustees consented to their making a settlement with Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell.

Looking to this correspondence, it does not appear to me that it resulted in any transaction. Assuming that under the policy the defenders were in a condition with reference to the claim under it, to show that the policy was void ab initio in regard to the alleged unseaworthiness of the vessel—the question is, whether the contract which can be set aside on that ground is converted into a different transaction, whereby the underwriters had arranged a settlement on a different footing? It does not appear to me to amount to that. There is a proposal by Messrs Douglas and Company to settle on the footing that certain premiums shall be deducted from the amount of the claim, but which proposal is all along repudiated by Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell. Whether Messrs Douglas and Company were right or wrong in insisting on that, is not the question. They may be right, or they may be wrong; I do not say which. But if Messrs Douglas and Company had authority from the underwriters to attach this condition as a consideration for giving up their objection to the validity of the policy—and I see nothing illegal in the brokers making a stipulation on behalf of the parties for whom they acted—then the condition was attached, and was never accepted. If there was no condition authorised by the underwriters, then I do not see that Messrs Douglas and Company had any right to pass from the objection in regard to the policy. So, then, the only proposal was one with a certain condition attached to it, which was never accepted. But independently of that, there is the writing off of the policy. But I doubt if that carried matters much beyond what I have said, for that was done when the parties were in the position I have referred to, and must be construed with reference to their situation at the time. Besides, it was only tentative, for certain deductions were to be made. Then it does not appear to have been signed by all the underwriters, nor to have been settled by express special authority to abandon all their claims in regard to the policy. Therefore this cannot be founded upon as a concluded bargain betwixt the parties to settle the loss without reference to this claim; nor do I think that the concluded proof makes much difference. There is nothing in it that is not in perfect consistency with these letters.

Therefore I do not think this fourth plea is a reply to the objections to the policy, or that it has been made out. I do not mean to say there was a disposition to pass from it. I do not mean to give any opinion as to that, or whether this may not be an element in considering the other parts of the case, especially if they fail on the facts, with reference to the expenses. But, in the meantime, I am of opinion that there is not sufficient to prevent the parties from showing that this policy was ab initio void, by reason of the objections taken to it. No. 23.

Losh, Wilson,
Martin.

LORD IVORY.—The only question now before the Court is, whether the defenders are barred from pleading the invalidity of the policy, or, in other words, are they excluded from challenging it, first, on the ground of misrepresentation; and, second, on the ground of unseaworthiness? There is another ground taken in the defence, that of deviation, but that does not go so much to the invalidity of the policy as to its binding effect. It is unnecessary to consider that distinction, for in the other two matters there is enough to raise all the questions of law betwixt the parties. The Lord Ordinary has sustained this plea in bar in regard to the loss, on the ground of adjustment referred to in the correspondence. The letters, of dates from 9th May to the last date, raise an important general question, and all the more important if rested on English law and practice. It seems pretty clear, from all the authorities, that such would not be the effect of such an adjustment, even if the parties knew every circumstance of knowledge, still less when there is any room to maintain that the parties afterwards came to know things which, at the date of the policy, they did not know. Now, unless I am fairly driven to it by the rules of our own law, I think that, in construing documents of this kind, it would be inexpedient to adopt a different rule of law in Scotland from that which is acted on in England, and the case should be at least very clear to countenance a variance between the two laws. Had the question turned merely on the want of consideration as not a separate binding quality of a gratuitous promise, I might have had less hesitation, for that is plainly not a doctrine of Scotch law, and I would not introduce such a principle as would subvert a familiar general rule, always received here, and which would make promises binding where the circumstances are not sufficient for that purpose. But the difficulty lies deeper, if I understand the decisions. With reference to such adjustments, Lord Ellenborough speaks of the necessity of blazoning the whole circumstances on which challenge must lie, so that no shadow of suspicion as to the want of knowledge shall exist. And Lord Campbell, in a valuable note appended to the case of Sheppard, while resting English doctrine mainly on the want of consideration, also refers to considerations of public policy and general law, apart from mere abstract want of consideration. Indeed, want of consideration, if per se sufficient, would operate independently of all circumstances connected with the party's knowledge or ignorance of the supposed grounds of challenge. It would lead to an unbending general rule, applicable to every gratuitous obligation, instead of being limited to the solitary case of a contract of insurance.

Now this, without more, weighs with me in inducing unwillingness to disturb here the application of English rules of law. But when one goes a step further, why does the want of consideration, if the matter is left there, affect the question? The want of consideration has been held to affect the question, because it has been assumed that, apart from that new and gratuitous obligation, there would be nothing to bind the parties. The want of consideration arises from this, according to Lord Ellenborough, that there is no liability under the original policy; and because of that, there is no consideration for the subsequent settlement apart from the policy. It assumes that the policy, in respect of the grounds of challenge, not being binding is æ, any obligation must rest entirely on the adjustment as constituting a new and independent agreement, and to this, want of consideration—inferred from the extinction of the policy—comes to be fatal.

In this point of view, and assuming here that the policy would otherwise be void, there arises important matter for consideration—(1), who are the parties to the new contract? Can the broker bind the underwriters to discharge their right of challenge? Can the broker—even if entitled to represent underwriters—make out with the express concurrence of the insured, any contract which departs ever so little from the precise terms of the policy? I have great doubts on all these points. In the first place, in adjustment of the loss, it is the underwriter's, not the broker's

No. 23.

 Losh, Wilson,
 Martin.

act and subscription that is operative, if no special authority to that effect be given to the brokers. It is, in short, the express will of the underwriters that is operative. In the next place, the adjustment must be of mutual consent discharging all claims apart from the adjustment, and binding both parties to something that is to supersede the policy. But here we have—(1), no act of the underwriters; (2), there is no special authority given to enter into this special matter from the underwriters to the broker; (3), then, so far as the adjustment on the back of the policy is concerned, we have, so far as I can see, no interposition of the insured. Whether, in the correspondence, there is adoption of what had been done in the letters, is a different question. I am speaking of that which is called adjustment of the loss on the policy, and, so far as that is concerned, it seems to have been done without consultation with the insured, and totally without their knowledge.

It was said there had been payment made by the underwriters to the brokers for the settlement of this loss. But if that had been the case, there would have been no question either with reference to English or Scotch law, for if there was payment by the underwriters to the brokers, then the brokers held that only for the insured, and the settlement in either country could only be set aside on the ground of fraud. But there is no evidence of any such thing, and so there is no such specialty here. Therefore, that consideration does not apply to the present defender. But as to the four other underwriters, it may have effect in the separate action. But I hold the evidence here to disprove that there was payment or impressment of funds into the broker's hands for behoof of the insured.

It is said there was what is equivalent to payment, and I do not deny that such might be the case. Where authority was given to apply certain funds lying in the broker's hands, or where the brokers were debtors to the underwriters, it might be done without impressing any funds into their hands. But here also the proof fails. So far as I see, the underwriters were wholly ignorant of what was passing. As between them and the brokers, there was nothing but general and usual powers given by them to the brokers. There was no special authority given them to enter into the settlement, or to break down the original liability.

This seems enough for the case. Had it not been so: had I held there was not enough for deciding the case, I might have had more difficulty in that view on which your Lordship has mainly rested your opinion as to the effect of the correspondence, as showing that the settlement had been conditional. These are concurrent views, and may stand together. In the first place, the adjustment of the loss is betwixt the debtor and creditor in that loss. The broker is neither. He is creditor for the premium of insurance, and debtor for the same to the underwriters, but not for the loss. The important effect of that particularly comes to bear on the receipt of the policy. The broker is not the debtor to the insured for the loss. In that question it is the underwriters who are the debtors, and the insured who are the creditors. There is no concursus beyond. There is no interest to entitle the broker to bargain on his own account, and in his own favour. Any condition so made by him would be extrinsic as between the proper parties to the adjustment of the loss. That adjustment having nothing to do with reference to the matter more or less connected with the insurance of policy, I shall require clear and positive evidence to let in a condition of this nature, to affect the relations of the underwriters and the insured. The adjustment may be effected through the medium of the broker, but it is a transaction in law betwixt the insurers and the insured; and I would be slow to allow effect to a condition extrinsic to that transaction, in order that the broker may have a security for a debt in which his principals are not concerned. I should be more disposed to hold, with reference to that shape of the question, (1) that an adjustment was concluded betwixt the underwriters and the insured only; but (2) that the broker in carrying out that adjustment raised a claim of set-off as between himself and the insured. There is nothing said at first of this set-off. It comes in in the month of May, after there had been a great deal of correspondence about the adjustment of loss; and, so far as regards the underwriters, there is nothing said with reference to this settlement of loss, with a condition in favour of the broker, for payment of their own debt. Accordingly, in these later letters, I should think the true construction is, that now having got everything settled as betwixt you and the underwriters, and brought to a bearing, when we get the money, when the underwriters pay us, on the footing of a settlement with you, we have our claim of retention as against Brockett, the party in whose name the insurance was effected; and we would not recognise you, unless with the sanction of his trustees, and only so far as regards him. That is the construction which I would be disposed to put on the letters.

Nov. 28, 1856.
Losh, Wilson,
and Bell v.
Martin.

There is something, however, to be said—and therein I recognise the remark of your Lordship—that all and sundry dealt with the matter as conditional. On this footing it was rejected by the insured. Their agent, when he came to answer the proposal, speaks of it as a matter that disturbed the whole previous arrangement. It was on this footing he took measures to enforce payment. Surely there is a great deal to be said with reference to that—that there never was, on the understanding of parties, a concluded agreement at all. These parties never had got the length of a concluded agreement, with or without conditions. They were disturbed before they came to a final settlement. Now, no doubt, whether the brokers were entitled or not to make a condition, if both parties treated on the footing of the agreement being conditional, the bargain would be incomplete unless that condition were accepted and purified. It is nothing that it was a condition beyond the power of the broker to impose, if it was the only condition on which a settlement was to be made; and if the insured resisted the condition, you could not separate the two things. Because if there was a conditional agreement, and the condition was not purified, the agreement falls to the ground altogether.

If the Court are prepared to adopt that view of the case, I have no great objection to it. I have heard a great deal said for it. It would be corroboratory of, and so far perhaps concurrent with, the considerations to which I have adverted as resting on more fundamental grounds in the law of insurance as affecting the adjustment of loss. If I am driven to deal with it as on a policy in itself operative, I confess I shall have greater difficulty. And in this view it is perhaps not unimportant to observe, that the correspondence and adjustment of loss deals with two parties. (1) They deal not only with the insured, but with Brockett and his trustees; and (2) as with Brockett, there is no room for alleging condition.

The adjustment of loss with Brockett is completely separated from that talked of with Losh, Wilson, and Bell, because there is no condition made with Brockett. There is no arrangement except as to the amount of the loss to be adjusted. There may be a right of retention as to Brockett, but that is left by them to the operation of the principle of law. Therefore the settlement of loss stands out as a substantive arrangement, and as regards the insured, it is not to become a different arrangement; only they say, If we are to deal with you, we must have the authority to do so from Brockett's trustees. But if the set-off against him did not imply any condition as to the policy, it is unnecessary to say anything as to the validity of this claim of set-off, which made the subject of the condition as regards these parties. And as little need we consider the effect of the adjustment of loss, if otherwise free from this condition, in rearing up a prima facie case against and throwing the onus on the underwriters. The present question has not raised these points; it has alone to do with the alleged bar to the challenge of the policy; and on the whole, it seems to me the safest course to hold that there is no such bar at all, leaving its effect aliunde to be dealt with as accords.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—The defenders are sued to perform their part of a contract of insurance entered into by them as underwriters. The policy of insurance is alleged as the ground of the action, and they are called upon to pay the loss incurred on that policy. They make two defences among others—one that the ship was unseaworthy, and the other that there was misrepresentation. These pleas, or either of them, if well founded, would be fatal to the policy. Therefore what they maintain is, that there was no valid policy: that they never undertook the obligation which they are required to perform. That is met first by a plea in bar. It is said that the defenders are excluded from maintaining such pleas, by certain proceedings which took place subsequent to the loss. And as, according to our mode of pleading, the discussion of such a plea of exclusion proceeds on an assumption that the pleas sought to be excluded would, on their own merits, be good, the question now raised must be considered on the assumption that this policy was a nullity in respect of unseaworthiness of the vessel, and misrepresentation by

No. 23. the insured. And what we have to inquire is, whether the defenders, assuming them not to have been bound to pay this sum in virtue of the policy of insurance, did undertake to do so by an agreement made subsequent to the loss. The question is, whether the defenders in the action undertook this new obligation to pay what by law they were not bound to pay? In this inquiry it is not of material importance that there was no value or consideration for the alleged undertaking, for by the law of Scotland a contract of this kind is good, without value or consideration, although this is said to be necessary in England. And therefore I look to the question in that view, whether the defenders undertook an obligation, even gratuitously, to pay the sum now demanded. It is not alleged that directly or personally they entered into any such transaction with the pursuer. There was no direct communication betwixt them. It was said they entered into this contract with Brockett, who was the broker through whom the insurance had been effected. Now, Douglas and Company either had authority to enter into the contract, or they had not. If they had authority from the underwriters to enter into such a contract, then every condition annexed to the contract with their authority is a condition made by themselves through their authorised agent. If, on the other hand, Douglas and Company acted without their authority, then, whatever the nature of the transaction, that was not binding upon them. They may go against Douglas and Company for entering into the transaction without authority, and that is the best answer to this point.

Nov. 28, 1856.
Losh, Wilson,
and Bell v.
Martin

But it is said they had authority. Let us assume they had authority, then, in all the transaction. Instead of reading "Douglas and Company," read "the defenders in the action." Where is the proof that they undertook to pay the sum sued for without any condition? I think the result of the evidence is this—that undoubtedly a proposal was made by the defenders, acting through Messrs Douglas and Company. There was a proposal to pay the sum in this policy on two conditions. One was, that authority from Brockett or his assignees should be obtained first; the other was, that what should be paid should not be the whole sum, but the sum under deduction of a specific amount of L.240 said to be owing by Brockett to Douglas and Company. It was made an express condition in this proposal, that if such a settlement took place, it should be under deduction of L.240. This comes clearly out in the correspondence. Till the month of May 1853, there was no such agreement, nor even proposal for it, nor anything but a demand by the defenders for documents, in order that the parties might make up their minds in respect of the unseaworthiness of the vessel and misrepresentation. On 13th May a letter was written by Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell, who had made their appearance on the failure of Brockett, and in that letter they conclude by saying—"We have only now to request that you will inform us whether the underwriters mean to pay or not, as we are not disposed to sit quiet any longer."

Undoubtedly in this there was no agreement. There was a demand for a settlement, and a threat that if it was not made, they would resort to legal proceedings to enforce it. Now how is this demand and threat met? It is met by an answer from Messrs Douglas and Company, stating not that anything was agreed to, but that there was reason to expect a settlement, and making this express announcement as the footing on which this settlement would be made—"The insurance having been effected by us on account of Mr W. H. Brockett, we cannot recognise you in the matter, or make any settlement without Mr Brockett's trustee; and there will fall to be deducted from the loss the sum of L.240, owing by Mr Brockett for premiums of insurance."

Now it is impossible to read that letter in any other way than this, that "we announced to you at the outset, and as a condition of the proposal, that we will not pay you the sum in the policy except minus L.240." That is a distinct announcement that they would not recognise Losh, Wilson, and Bell, on any other footing than that the sum should be minus L.240. Now they may have been legally entitled to make this condition or qualification of their proposal, or they may not; but so it was, that it was only under that qualification they made any such proposal. And it was quite within the power of the pursuers to agree to this qualification, or to dissent from it. They exercised their option by writing that answer expressly dissenting from it. They said they would not agree to it, and they stated that all correspondence would terminate since it was insisted on. The next letter, of 9th

June, was written by Messrs Douglas and Company, following upon that announcement, stating that they would on the 15th pay any balance the pursuers were legally entitled to. This meant the balance after deducting the L.240. And so this was understood by Messrs Losh, Wilson, and Bell. There was no misunderstanding on the subject, for they immediately put the matter into the hands of their man-of-business to enforce not the settlement proposed, but to enforce the claim under the policy. And accordingly that was the understanding of themselves and Mr Chater, and there is a letter of 2d July by Messrs Douglas and Company ratifying that, and referring to their intimation to Brockett. There the matter stops, and the action is raised. It is an action for what? Not for implement of an alleged agreement entered into betwixt Brockett, acting for Losh, Wilson, and Bell, and Messrs Douglas and Company. It is an action for implement of the policy of insurance, and nothing else, thereby shewing that, at the time the action was raised, the pursuers held that no such agreement as that now founded on had been entered into—and that accordingly is the only action now before us. If the defenders are right in their contention that this policy, as the foundation of the action, is a nullity, what has taken place to bar them from stating this plea? I can see nothing of the kind. All that I can see in the correspondence is, that there was a proposal which was made under a qualification; and that that proposal, as so qualified, was not accepted, and never was made into a contract in any way whatever.

As for the other evidence, the writing on the back of the policy, it was only made under the proposal as to which the parties were in correspondence at the time, and under the qualifications of that correspondence, and accordingly it was so understood by both parties.

The parole evidence is entirely in conformity with that. Mr Rose, who carried on the whole of that correspondence, expressly states it was a condition of the proposal, and that that condition was never complied with. Therefore I hold, as this is an action for payment of the policy, and as it is a relevant allegation that that policy was void by unseaworthiness and misrepresentation, there is nothing to bar the parties from proving that allegation.

LORD DEAS.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair—particularly in your Lordship's concluding observations. It appears to me that, even assuming the knowledge of the material facts by the underwriters, and assuming the authority of the brokers to settle, there was no concluded settlement binding upon either party. The case is not one of an unqualified admission upon one point coupled with a reservation of another point—whatever might have been the effect of such an admission and reservation—nor was the case so put at the bar. On the contrary, the Dean of Faculty put it, and could only put it, as a transaction by which the insured agreed to a certain interim deduction of the salvage on the one part, and the underwriters agreed to hold the amount of loss to be fixed at a given sum on the other. Now such a transaction cannot be instructed by markings on the policy made outwith the knowledge of the insured, and not relied on by them, although such markings may be material in construing the correspondence,—the important part of which is, that from 13th May to 2d July, both inclusive,—to your Lordship's observations on which I have really nothing to add. I think both parties remained free, under that correspondence, and this action accordingly appears to me to proceed on the footing that they did so.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 6th December 1854: Find that the defenders are not barred from insisting in their defences in the cause: Repel the fourth plea urged for the pursuers in the record; and quoad ultra remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed in the cause as shall be just; reserving all questions of expenses.

Cessio—Aliment.—Held, that a party whose principal debt consisted of by-past aliment for an illegitimate child, was entitled to the benefit of a cessio, on finding caution for future aliment.

CHISHOLM, a labourer, was incarcerated at the instance of Janet Denholm or Paterson for aliment for a bastard child, born on 17th June 1853. He thereupon applied for cessio. His debts amounted to L.15, 18s. 7d., of which L.9, 11s. was due to Paterson. She had obtained decree against him for three years' aliment, at the rate of L.4 a-year. He had paid to account L.6, 10s., and agreed to take the child and pay the balance by instalments, but this offer was refused, and the pursuer was incarcerated on 14th July 1856, and alimented by the mother. He was still willing to take the child and relieve the mother of it. He himself had to support a wife and child, who lived with his father.

Gordon, for Paterson, opposed the cessio, on the ground that if the pursuer was not able to pay the aliment, he was at least bound to find caution for it.¹

The pursuer thereupon offered to find caution, and

Lease—Landlord and Tenant.—By an agricultural lease, written by the landlord, a piece of land was let for twenty years, a specified portion thereof to be improved by the end of the lease, under a penalty. Two additions were made to the lease, and of same date with it, by the first of which the landlord let the land at the same rent to the tenant's son at the expiry of the twenty years, and by the second of which he let "to the said Hugh Craig (the elder) his liferent, and then to the said Hugh Craig (the younger) after his death (the elder)." Held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan), that the penalty was not exigible at the expiry of the twenty years, nor till the death of the father, who had a liferent lease of the lands.

THE pursuer, Gillanders, proprietor of the estate of Highfield, brought this action against Craig, his tenant, for payment of L.27 sterling, "being the stipulated and agreed upon penalty due by the defender to the pursuer, on account of the defender's failure to improve 6 acres, 2 roods, and 10 perches, imperial measure, of the subjects let to him by the pursuer's father, in terms of the obligation contained in his lease to that effect."

The obligation was as follows:—"3d, That he shall be bound to have at least one-half of his lot completely improved before the termination of the first ten years of his lease, and the whole improved before the termination of the lease, under the penalty of L.4 for each imperial acre which remains in an unimproved state."

By the terms of the tack, the lease was originally contemplated to endure for twenty years from and after the term of Whitsunday 1830. The following additions, however, were made to the lease by the pursuer's father:—

"I, the said John Gillanders, hereby bind and oblige myself, my heirs and successors, to let to Hugh Craig, son of the said Hugh Craig by his present wife Mary Matheson, the lots above specified, and at the rent, and upon

"N.B.—I, the said John Gillanders, pass from the clause No. 4th of this lease ;' and I, the said Hugh Craig, binds and obliges myself and his forebears to pay to the said John Gillanders 2s. 6d. sterling per acre of this lease of twelve acres ; and I, the said John Gillanders, let to the said Hugh Craig (the oldest) his liferent, and then to the said Hugh Craig (the youngest) after his death (the oldest). These presents signed by me place and date foresaid, before the said witnesses."

The defence was, that the penalty was only due on the termination of the lease, which was still current.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor :—" Finds it alleged by the pursuer, but denied by the defender, that the defender failed to improve the lot of ground within the first ten years of his lease, in terms of the obligation therein, and that inquiry into the fact is necessary : Finds that the whole of the three documents constituting the lease being of one date, and in reference to the same matter, must be read together ; and that the expiry of the lease, as constituted by these three documents, has not yet arrived, so as to entitle the pursuer to enforce a penalty not exigible till the expiration thereof : Appoints the cause to be enrolled, with a view to the ascertainment of the question of fact mentioned in the first finding ; and reserves the question of expenses."*

The pursuer reclaimed, and pleaded ;—That the contract contained in the first missive had not been cancelled by anything contained in the other document founded on. The three documents constituted separate and independent leases, under the first of which, the whole land must be improved before the expiration of the term,—that is, twenty years from Whitsunday 1830. That period had expired. The land was in large part unimproved, and the penalty was therefore exigible, as sued for. The language employed in the various missives was no doubt incorrect, but its fair import was as stated.

The defender pleaded ;—That the documents together constituted the lease, which did not terminate till the death of the defender.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case appears to have arisen out of the practice of parties writing legal documents for themselves, instead of getting a man of business to do so. The original lease is written by the landlord, and the two additions are also apparently written by him. It is not quite clear, upon the face of these documents, that they were all written at the same time ; for, although the additions bear to be written, "time and place foresaid," still, on referring to the original deed, there is no time or place mentioned. The question is, whether the penalty claimed is now exigible ? By the original lease, there was clearly a definite termination to the tack contemplated twenty years after the term of Whitsunday 1830. And, it is equally clear, that when the second condition of the lease was written, the parties had in view the term of Whitsunday 1850, as the termination of the lease. Sometime or other, in the course of the first year, and before any rent was exigible, these other conditions were made. They are, I think, very like a second and supplementary lease. This new lease is to commence when the first lease is at an end ; but the matter does not stop there. A third condition is attached, which deals with the interest of both father and son, and alters the period of the commencement of Hugh Craig junior's interest in the lease; for it is to commence from and after the death of Hugh Craig senior, at whatever period that might happen. The original lease, so far as Hugh Craig, the elder, was concerned, was only for twenty years; but the young man's interest was now to commence from the death of his father. In that view of the matter, and such being the nature of the alterations of the lease, it appears to me, that the period for the exaction of the penalty has not yet arrived; and, therefore, I think that the action cannot be maintained. As to the inquiry appointed by the Lord Ordinary, that is not wished for by either party, and besides it is not within the action. The interlocutor must therefore be recalled.

* This clause had reference to service at any time and harvest, and to delivering certain custom hens.

* "NOTE.—The term when the penalty for non-improvement at the expiry of the lease is exigible is not at a precise term, as argued by the pursuer, but 'at the termination of the lease,' and whatever protracted the day of termination protracted the day of exaction. In the last writing, the words 'this lease' are used so as to bind all three writings together."

LORD IVORY.—I agree. This tack being written by the landlord, it is consequently not easy to understand it. But, in construing these documents inter rusticos, I construe it against the landlord. The father is acknowledged tenant. He is also liferenter; and his son, at his death, has a liferent in the succession.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur. Taking these documents together as constituting the lease, it is explicitly stated that the original lease was to terminate with the liferent of the father. That precisely specifies the terminus a quo of the lease to the son. It is the death of his father. Therefore, I think, that if the old man had died during the twenty years the son's right would have commenced; and alternatively, having survived the twenty years, the son's right has not yet commenced. It is clear enough to my mind, on these grounds, that the period for exacting the penalty has not arrived.

LORD DEAS.—I agree that the whole writings here must be taken as constituting the existing lease, and that it is not of much moment whether they were all signed on the same date or not, although the words signed "place and date foresaid," seem naturally to import that they were so. They follow each other on the same sheet of paper; and, in so far as there is a discrepancy, the last of them must rule. Now the last of them regulates the rent, and likewise varies the endurance of the lease, which is no longer a lease to Hugh Craig the elder and his heirs for twenty years, but a liferent lease to Hugh Craig the elder, with devolution at his death in favour of Hugh Craig the younger, whether as in right of the same lease, or under a new lease, we need not at present inquire.

Now the penalty for not having the whole lands improved "before the termination of the lease," is a penalty which could not have been exacted till the expiry of the twenty years, when such was the endurance of the lease, and which cannot now be exacted till, at all events, the death of Hugh Craig the elder, which is the earliest period at which the lease to him can be alleged to terminate, even if it be not the same lease which goes to Hugh Craig the younger—a point, as I have already said, which we do not at present require to decide. There is here no action for specific implement, whatever questions that might have raised. The only action is for damages, under the name of penalty, not exigible till the lease terminates, and the lease has not yet terminated.

The last writing bears that the landlord passes "from the clause No. 4 of this lease;" that is to say, the clause in the first writing binding the tenant to perform certain services, and to deliver certain custom hens, which accordingly is deleted. But clause 3d, in the first writing, applicable to the penalty at the termination of the lease, stands as it did; and, indeed, if it did not, there would be no penalty in this liferent lease.

If the intermediate writing, keeping up the lease absolutely for twenty years, as at first, and adding a liferent right in favour of Hugh the younger, had remained operative, there would have been much more difficulty; because in that case, the lease to Hugh the elder might have been said to have terminated with the twenty years, and a separate lease to Hugh the younger then to have commenced. But, under the last writing, there is no such difficulty. There was no longer a lease for an absolute term of twenty years either to Hugh the elder or to any body else. If Hugh the elder had died within the twenty years, Hugh the younger would at once have come in, not in his father's right but in his own; and if both had died within the twenty years, there would have been no longer any lease at all. In short, by the last writing, the original term of twenty years has no longer anything to do with the endurance or termination of the lease; and so, I think, the landlord must have construed the writings; for, although the twenty years expired at Whitsunday 1850, this action was not raised till 28th November 1855, more than five and-a-half years afterwards—a delay which might have founded a formidable plea (not stated in this record) against the claim of damages as having been waived or departed from, but to which I refer at present only as indicating how the landlord and his advisers appear to have themselves construed the lease.

Proof—Parent and child—Oath in supplement—Stat. 16 Vict. c. 20.—In an action of filiation and aliment, held (adhering to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary), that the testimony of the mother of an illegitimate child, given by her in the position of a witness, is liable to be tested by cross-examination, and its credibility is to be weighed by the same rules as apply to the testimony of other witnesses, and upon a view of the whole evidence led by both parties;—Opinion—That the parties in such actions being admissible as witnesses under the statute 16 Vict. c. 20, it is objectionable to take judicial declarations from them, and the pursuer is not entitled to the benefit of giving her oath in supplement.

Justices of the Peace.—Opinion that Justices of the Peace have no power to grant commissions for taking proofs, and the proof ought to be taken before the justices who adjudicate in the case.

THIS case was stated in the note appended to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary as follows:—"This was an action of reduction (with a conjoined suspension) of judgments pronounced by a bench of Justices in Roxburghshire, and by the Courts of Quarter Sessions, under a petition at the instance of the defender against the pursuer, suing him for inlying expenses and aliment of a bastard child, of which he was alleged to be the father. The Justices, in Petty Sessions, found the paternity proved, against which an appeal was taken to the Quarter Sessions, which substantially affirmed the judgment. The proceedings before the Justices are noticeable chiefly from the petitioner, the mother of the child, having been examined as a witness under the proof allowed, in accordance with the late alteration in the law of evidence, instead of her oath being taken in supplement, after a finding that a semiplena probatio had been established. The proceedings, however, had also followed the old form of ordering a judicial examination, and in this case both the petitioner and the respondent were, on their several traverses, judicially examined. Thereafter the Justices allowed a proof, and both parties led evidence, the petitioner being the first witness examined in support of her case, and the defender concluding his proof by his own deposition as a witness."

The defender reclaimed ; and her counsel were heard on the import of the proof.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—When the pursuer in an action of filiation tenders herself as a witness, she is subject to any cross-examination, with the view of testing her credibility, that the other party may choose, under the control of the judge or commissioner.

I do not think, though it is not necessary to determine that in the present case, that the provisions of the former law are still in force, allowing to the pursuer in these actions the benefit of giving an oath in supplement, if she can make out a semiplena proof. Actions of filiation have not been reserved from the operation of the recent statutes on evidence. It cannot be in the option of the woman to put herself in the position either of a witness or of a party entitled to give her oath in supplement, according as she might think most for her advantage in the particular state of the case. That would now be a singular privilege. Her oath in supplement was allowed, because she could not be a witness while the nature of her case implying secret matters required that her oath should be allowed. But now she is allowed to be a witness, and what can she require more ?

In this case, I think there are no facts established from which the circumstance of connection can safely be inferred. No doubt the pursuer swears that there was connection between her and the defender, but he again swears that there was no such connection ; and I cannot take her statements in opposition to that the Evidence Act passed, in which this Court has had to consider what view shall be taken of the value and effect of the mother's deposition as a witness when her credibility is affected by her being contradicted in her answers to questions put to her by the evidence of other witnesses giving opposite statements in flat contradiction to what she had sworn. Under the former usual mode of proceeding, the question of semiplena was first considered, and being found to be established, the woman's oath in supplement was allowed. This was a great advantage to her, as, when affirmative, it concluded the case, unless, which rarely occurred, her answers to special questions put were in contradiction palpably to the evidence on which the semiplena rested, or to her own statement on record. The proof being concluded by her oath, her answers were not open to counter proof by the alleged father. But under the practice now followed, if the present case is to be taken as a specimen, the woman being examined as a witness, is open to contradiction under the proof allowed to the man, as well as by the cross-examination of her own witnesses, if she is called first in order. When her credibility is to be tested in this way, like other witnesses, it may be that her testimony shall be shaken in all its parts, and her credit break down. And the question then is,—whether her oath to the fact of connection, and to the paternity of the child, is then to be entitled to regard, although the proof otherwise led by her might be sufficient to support, under former views, a finding of semiplena.

“The Lord Ordinary humbly thinks, that a woman so examined as a witness must necessarily go through the ordeal of the usual tests of credibility. It is upon this principle that he has considered what credit he can attach to the deposition of the defender as a witness. Viewing her, therefore, in the same position as an ordinary witness, he conceives she must be pronounced to be unworthy of credit. Her negative answers to numerous specific questions put to her under her cross-examination, are contradicted by the persons referred to when afterwards examined, one of them being a witness called by herself. Unless the defender's own evidence is to be believed in preference to those other witnesses, her general credibility appears gone. But, without her evidence receiving credit, the case against the alleged father is imperfect.

“It is needless, after the view now expressed, to make any remarks on the general character of the evidence led in the cause. Though some part of it is unsatisfactory, and there is much to affect the character of the woman, it is rather thought there would have been enough to support a finding of semiplena. But, assuming that the case, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, breaks down when the evidence of the woman herself comes to be weighed in regard to the credit due to it. Taking the proof as a whole, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the paternity has not been established, and has accordingly reduced the judgments brought under review.” of the man, considering particularly that her statements are not in many particulars corroborated by even her own witnesses. And, besides, she seems to have had connection with other men than the pursuer during the ten months preceding the birth of her child. Indeed, this lady seems to have had a variety of gentlemen, to either of whom she might have given the honours of paternity. In such a case, the testimony of the woman is entitled to very little credit. I therefore concur with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD MURRAY.—I am of the same opinion. I take the same view of the proof before us, and also concur in your Lordship's remarks on the effect of the recent statutes in such cases. Actions of filiation are not excepted from the provisions of these Acts; and, unless we hold that the pursuer ought to put herself in the position of a witness, in place of being allowed to give her oath in supplement, it comes very nearly to the absurdity of holding that she would be entitled first to make out a semiplena by her own evidence, and then give her own oath in supplement.

LORD WOOD.—I agree with your Lordship in holding that, when the pursuer in an action of filiation puts herself in the position of a witness, she is liable to have her credibility tested by cross-examination, and her testimony is to be weighed by the same rules as the testimony of other witnesses. But there may perhaps be room to doubt whether the old law of semiplena has been wholly abrogated. If the pursuer does not offer herself as a witness, and the defender does not put her into the witness box, I am not sure that we might not have to proceed upon the old law, and to consider whether or not a semiplena probatio had been made out without her evidence, and if satisfied that it had, then to admit her oath in supplement. But upon such a state of case I give no opinion now, it not being necessary for the decision of that which is before the Court.

In the present case, the mother has put herself in the position of a witness; and testing her evidence by the usual rules, and taking it along with the testimony of the other witnesses, I do not think there has been adduced such a proof of paternity as the pursuer was bound to bring forward in support of the conclusion of her summons for finding Scott liable to aliment her child. In such a case, the proof required on the part of the pursuer is a full proof. Apart from her evidence, there is nothing of the kind. It is, on the contrary, of a very weak and unreliable description, and her own evidence is so completely contradicted in many most important particulars, as to render it unworthy of credit. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to.

LORD COWAN.—The only important point in this case is that referred to by Lord Wood. The recent statute which allows parties to be examined as witnesses, makes no exception of cases of semiplena. Such cases fall within the statutory provisions as much as any others. Both the pursuer and the defender may tender themselves, or may be tendered by the other party, in leading the proof respectively on either side. Where this occurs, the whole proof must be taken together, and the deposition of the pursuer be judged of along with the other evidence. The question must be, whether she has satisfactorily proved her case. There can be no room for considering whether the rest of the evidence amounts to semiplena probatio laying aside her oath, so as to permit of her deposition being taken as completing the proof of paternity. Her oath emitted in the cause as a witness is to be judged of and tested, like the deposition of any other witness, upon the evidence generally led by both parties. But if the pursuer does not tender herself as a witness, and is not examined on the part of the defender, it may be that in the class of cases where the oath in supplement was competent, the pursuer having led evidence amounting to semiplena, may still ask to be examined. The recent statute contains no enactment on the subject. The old rule may therefore be thought to remain untouched; but it is unnecessary to determine that point in this case. Here the pursuer tendered herself, and was examined as the leading witness in support of her action. She is contradicted on material points by the rest of the evidence, to such an extent as to make her statements not trustworthy, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary has rightly given effect to this view. I would only farther observe, that when in such cases it is proposed to examine the pursuer or defender as witnesses in the cause on the one side or the other, it appears to me quite objectionable to take from them judicial declarations. This was usual in the former practice before the statute. But now that the evidence of both may be tendered, or at least com-

of Edinburgh.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I wish to advert to the proceedings in this case, which it is more important to notice than any other point.

It appears that this evidence was taken on commission in Roxburghshire. Now, looking to the nature of the jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace, who have no general jurisdiction as a court of record, except in cases of aliment, and such like, limited by statute, they have no authority of an ordinary character like that of Sheriffs, nor is there granted by any statute or Act of Sederunt the power to take proofs by commission. I think it decidedly irregular that such a power should be exercised by them. And besides, I observe, that of the portion of the evidence in this case not taken on commission, important evidence was taken before Justices who had not been present at the previous stages, and did not afterwards adjudicate upon it. The result of the mode of procedure adopted has been, that this matter, begun in 1854, goes on in this way till May 1855; and expenses were incurred to the amount, I see, of L.37, while the whole case should have been gone through in two days, at a trifling expense. I think this was entirely without authority, and extremely irregular.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Of new find it is not proved that the pursuer is the father of the child born by the defender on 12th December 1853: Therefore adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and refuse the reclaiming note: Find additional expenses due, and remit," &c.

THE fifth, sixth, and eighth articles of the pursuer's condescendence were as follows:—" (Art. 5.) The pursuer was for several years resident in New South Wales previous to the close of the year 1828, when he returned to this country. During his residence at Sydney, New South Wales, he had various cash transactions with the Australian Company's branch there, of which branch Ellis Martin Scott was the Company's then manager. It was part of the ordinary dealings and employment of the Australian Company, by its manager and office-bearers, to receive sums from parties wishing to invest the same, and to negotiate and procure investments therefor, according to the instructions which the employer might give, and to charge a commission and brokerage thereon. The Company acted in Australia as general commission-agents, and transacted a large business as such. They did so, acting under the instructions of the Company and of its directors, and with their full authority and approbation. The pursuer had had various cash and commission transactions with the defenders, of a similar nature with that immediately to be mentioned. (Art. 6.) That upon the 8th day of November 1828, being immediately prior to the pursuer's departure from New South Wales, he paid to the said Ellis Martin Scott, as the manager for the said Company at Sydney, the sum of L.150, and handed to him bills to the extent of L.250, making in all L.400, which sum of L.400 the said Ellis Martin Scott, as acting for and on behalf of the said Company, undertook to invest for the pursuer in the stock of the Bank of New South Wales. The pursuer entered into this transaction with the said Company in the ordinary course of business, and employed them therein as commission-agents in the usual way. The Company held themselves out as willing and ready to undertake such employment, and it fell within their ordinary dealings, in which they were at that time engaged. Mr Scott, the Company's manager foresaid at Sydney, granted the pursuer the following holograph acknowledgment or memorandum—"I have received from William Wemyss, Esquire, one hundred and fifty pounds, and Thomas Raine bills falling due for two hundred and fifty pounds, which I am to invest in stock of the Bank of New South Wales, and the shares to be handed over to J. T. Goodsir, Esquire, on his account. (Signed) E. M. Scott, Sydney, 8th November 1828." Mr Goodsir was a friend of the pursuer, who had agreed to act for him in Australia, and who was to receive the transfers, and hold them for or transmit them to the pursuer. (Art. 8.) Mr Scott, as acting for the Company, undertook and bound them to have invested these two sums of L.150 and L.250, amounting together to L.400, in stock of the said bank, and to hand the shares to Mr Goodsir. Whether he did so invest the money or not, the pursuer has no means of knowing, all information on the subject having been withheld by the Company; but he did not hand over the shares to Mr Goodsir, and the pursuer has never received the same from the said Company. The Company was entitled to charge the pursuer a commission at the rate of two and one half per centum, being the usual rate of commission for agency procuring the shares for the pursuer. This upon L.400 would have amounted to L.10; but the pursuer is quite willing and ready to pay whatever may be the ordinary and reasonable rate of commission upon such transactions."

The condescendence then set forth that the defenders received or were entitled to receive large dividends from the Bank of New South Wales on the pursuer's behalf, but that they had refused to account to the pursuer for such dividends, or for their intromissions therewith, and had never enabled him to uplift the same. In art. 12 he stated that he had repeatedly required the manager and parties acting for the said Australian Company, to hand over to him the shares of the said bank of the value of L.400 as at said date of 1st March 1829, and to make payment of the whole dividends accrued and declared thereon, with colonial interest thereon from the periods at which they were respectively payable, under deduction of the reasonable and ordinary commission due to the defenders; or in the event of their failing or being unable now so to hand over to the pursuer these bank shares, and to account for the dividends thereon, then to make payment to him of such a sum as would compensate him for the loss and damage which he had sustained by the company's failure to implement their manager's engagement; but they refused to do so, and not only so, but they refused to repay to the pursuer the sum belonging to him received by their manager as aforesaid, with the colonial interest thereon. In consequence of which, the present action had become necessary. The action concluded for delivery to the pursuer of recorded transfers or certificates, or other legal evidence of right, vested in his person, to shares of the stock of the Bank of New South Wales, to the extent of the value of L.400, as at 1st March 1829, under deduction of L.10, being the amount of commission due to the defenders; and for an account of their intromissions with the dividends or other profits declared

The defenders' third plea in law was, that the claim was prescribed and barred by the law of Australia, by which in that respect the question of liability raised by the pursuer fell to be regulated. They also pleaded, that the pursuer's statements were not relevant or sufficiently specific.

On 8th February 1855, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repels the third plea in law for the defenders, and in respect it appears to the Lord Ordinary that there is no other question of law or relevancy in the case which ought at present to be determined, appoints the parties respectively, within eight days, to prepare and lodge drafts of such issues and counter-issues as they propose for trying the question between the parties; reserving all questions as to the mode of trial or investigation to be followed, or the order in which any points arising in the case may be disposed of." *

* "NOTE.—There seems to be no doubt, on well known principles of law, that the plea of foreign limitation or prescription stated by the defenders, is not well founded in a Scotch Court, and it has been repelled accordingly. The long lapse of time that has taken place in prosecuting the pursuer's claim may influence the course of procedure to be followed, or the presumptions to be applied in the proof. But it cannot, it is thought, operate as a bar to the action.

"No other prejudicial plea is stated on record, but the defenders have contended in argument that the action should de plano be dismissed on these grounds:—1st, That the pursuer's averments are not relevant or sufficiently specific. 2d, That the transaction libelled was beyond the line of business fixed by the contract of copartnery. 3d, That the document quoted in the sixth article of the condescendence, and forming, it is said, the basis of the claim, is granted by E. M. Scott solely in his own name, and not as manager or on behalf of the Company, and so cannot be held or proved to bind the defenders.

"1st, The pursuer's averments seem to be relevant, and sufficiently distinct and specific to be admitted to probation.

"2d, The terms of the defenders' contract of copartnery being a private deed, cannot be conclusive against third parties, and the pursuer alleges that the transaction of commission, agency, or brokerage, founded on by him, was within the Company's ordinary dealings and course of employment. The proof of this allegation is another matter.

"3d, The document relied on is not an ordinary receipt of money lent, nor is it a literarum obligatio, which can be considered to exclude all liability except in the party granting it. It is merely a piece of evidence in support of the allegation that the pursuer employed the defenders, through their manager, to act as his brokers for purchasing bank stock on his behalf. That is a contract which may be proved pro ut de jure; and although the payment of the money may require writing, there seems no imperative rule of law to prevent the pursuer from connecting Scott's acknowledgment with the Company by means of other writing, or of facts and circumstances, or even (though no judgment is intended on this point) by parole testimony. The case of Watson (1 Dow's Rep. 40) may be a useful, and even conclusive authority in the concluded cause, but it does not seem sufficient to stop inquiry on the threshold of the proceedings.

"It does not follow that the whole or any part of the cause is to be tried by

The defenders reclaimed; but the Court adhered, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary, who now reported the case on the adjustment of issues.

No. 27.

The pursuer proposed the following issues:—

Dec. 4, 1856.

Wemyss v.

Australian Co.
of Edinburgh.

"1. Whether the Australian Company, defenders, through Ellis Martin Scott, as their manager at Sydney, received from the pursuer in money and bills the sums of L.150 and L.250, mentioned in the acknowledgment No. 4 of process, and undertook to invest the same for behoof of the pursuer in stock of the Bank of New South Wales?

"2. Whether, on or about 8th November 1828, or thereafter, the Australian Company received from the pursuer the sums of money and bills mentioned in the said acknowledgment No. 4 of process, and are resting owing to the pursuer the sum of L.400, or any part thereof, with interest thereon?"

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer proposes to establish two propositions—first, that the defender Scott received the pursuer's money; second, that he undertook to invest it. Although the record is not so clear as it might have been, I think it is sufficiently so to support the pursuer's case. What the pursuer avers is, that through Scott he paid this money to the Australian Company—that through Scott the Australian Company undertook to invest it in a particular way—and therefore that they must account to him for the profits or dividends; but, alternatively, if Scott went too far in investing in the Bank of New South Wales, if that was a prohibited thing, still that having paid the money to the defenders, they must repay it. That is practically the case raised in this record; and I see no reason why we should not inquire into that portion of the facts which would give effect to that alternative conclusion of the summons. It may be that this alleged investment by Scott in the stock of the Bank of New South Wales was unauthorised; and yet that the general character of the Australian Company shall be such as is set forth in this record, and certainly if they undertook to make investments, and received the pursuer's money on that footing, he is entitled to get his money back. That case appears to me to be within the record, although not so explicitly as I could have wished.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion. The three conclusions of the action all stand apart from each other, but all of them rest on the same species facti which, according to different views, and according as the whole case or part of it is proved or not, will result in a larger or lesser liability. If the fact be as averred, that L.400 was paid by the pursuer to the defenders, then if they have not done with it what the pursuer says they undertook to do, they must at least give it back. If they got the money, it was their duty in this action to have tendered it, but the assumption of the lesser conclusion of the action is that the pursuer shall merely get it back. I should have liked the matter to have been more satisfactorily set forth, but there being averred (1) that the defenders got the money; (2) that they undertook to invest it; (3) that they failed to do so, it would be very rigorous to say that the pursuer is excluded from his lesser conclusion—that the defenders having failed in the purpose for which they got the money, are now bound to repay it. I think the issues are supported by the record. Article 12 makes perfectly clear what the pursuer intended in the previous part of the record: but if still thought defective, a few explanatory words would make quite distinct what is wanting.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I agree; and think that any ambiguity that might have been raised by art 6 is entirely obviated by art. 8. Upon the whole, I am not inclined to throw out these issues on the ground that there is not sufficient averment in the record that the party who received the money was the Australian Company, and that they are bound to repay it.

cient. The very lapse of time that has occurred may render this an unsafe and inexpedient course, and it may be proper to inquire into the different questions of fact separately, as, for instance, into the course of the Company's dealings first, and next into the particular transaction libelled. All this is left open for subsequent arrangement."

ciently included under this summons and record as one of the consequences which may eventually follow from success in the matter now embodied in this first issue. But it is not proposed to put in issue any of these consequences. The avowed object of the second issue is, not to claim the L.400 as a consequence of success upon the first issue, but to try an alternative case of money had and received by the Company, and which they are to be held bound to repay, simply because they received it. I can find no such ground of liability averred in this record. The case set forth is a very special case. The defenders are described in the Act of Parliament libelled on, and virtually incorporated into the summons, as a company established for the purposes of trade, and for effecting the speedy maritime conveyance of goods and passengers between Leith and Australia and other places. They are not said to be bankers, nor to have acted as bankers. But it is averred that, through Scott, as their manager, they acted as commission agents in Australia, in procuring investments for third parties; and that, in this capacity, the pursuer employed them to invest L.400 in shares of the Bank of New South Wales; and, for that purpose, handed over to them, through Scott, L.150 in cash, and L.250 in bills, along with a certain security which the pursuer had himself received over a cargo of rum, from Raine the obligant from whom he had acquired the bills. The pursuer further states that he does not know whether the defenders had invested the money in bank shares or not, but that, although he had repeatedly required them to hand over to him the shares, and to account for the dividends, under deduction of their commission for making the investment, they had failed to do so, "in consequence of which this action has become necessary;" and he adds, that the dividends, with periodical interest, would amount to upwards of L.2000, and that, if the defenders have failed to make the investment, the damages will be at least L.3000. The pleas in law are framed precisely on the same footing, the second and third being connected together, and importing that, if the defenders have failed to make the investment, they are liable in damages, or, at all events, to repay the L.400 with interest. But the employment, through Scott, of the defenders as commission agents to invest the money in bank shares is, throughout, made the basis of the whole case; and I cannot hold the pursuer entitled, under this record, to put in issue some totally different case, the nature of which is nowhere disclosed. It is not pretended that the money was paid direct to the company, nor as traders or maritime carriers. Now, I do not say that the company might not be liable for money received by their manager, although for none of the purposes for which the company had been constituted. But that would be a special case, requiring great specification in the statement. If any such case was contemplated, except that of their acting as commission agents, it ought to have been so set forth. If, again, it was meant that the money had been received in the due course of the copartnery business, this ought equally to have been set forth. I could have understood an allegation that Scott borrowed the money for behoof of the defenders and applied it for their behoof, but there is no such allegation. We must recollect that the object is to attach liability to the partners of a company for money said to have been received by their manager, but not said to have been received or applied in the way of their business as a company, either under their contract or the Act of Parliament. If, then, the defenders truly received the money to be invested in bank shares, the second issue should proceed upon that footing, to which, admittedly, it is not limited. If they received the money on some other footing, it should appear what that other footing was. But, under the second issue, if allowed upon this record, the pursuer, for anything I can see, may, at the trial, prove the money to have been paid and received upon any footing he pleases, although different from that averred by himself; and without the defenders, who disclaim all privity with Scott, knowing what they are to meet. Such a course is unknown in our practice, and I am, therefore, for disallowing this second issue.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Approve of the issues as now adjusted, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties on the mode of investigation to be adopted in the cause, and to proceed with the cause as to his Lordship shall seem just."

Interdict—Landlord and tenant.—A tenant under an agricultural lease fell into arrears of rent: His stock and implements were sold, and he executed a renunciation of the lease. Being charged to remove, he suspended, on the ground of alleged irregularity in the judicial procedure; also that he did not understand the English language, and had signed the renunciation under essential error as to its import and effect—Note refused.

MUNRO, the suspender, and Mr Baillie, the charger, entered into a tack in December 1849, by which Mr Baillie let to Munro the farm of Drumrosack for nineteen years. In 1854 Munro fell into arrear of rent, and on 11th June 1856 a sale took place at the landlord's instance, and under judicial authority, of the articles of stocking and implements of husbandry belonging to Munro. On 29th May 1856, Munro executed a renunciation of his lease, and bound himself to remove from the farm on 1st June thereafter. The renunciation was recorded, an extract taken, letters of horning expedite, and a charge given to remove, which charge was the subject of the present note of suspension. The note set forth ad longum the above facts, and stated that a reduction of the whole proceedings had been brought. This, however, the respondent denied. The suspender also stated that he was a Highlander, and Gaelic his native language. He could not speak any English until he was fifteen years of age, when he could speak a little, and now when he was thirty-four years of age he could not speak English, except very imperfectly. He got but little and irregular education, and he could not readily follow or understand a deed in the English language. The renunciation above mentioned was brought to his house on the morning of 29th May, ready extended. He had not seen it before, nor had it been seen or revised by any one on his behalf. It was not read over or explained to him, and when he signed it he did not know its contents or import; and he signed it under essential ignorance and error as to its import and effect, and as to his legal rights.

He pleaded;—That the judicial procedure had been irregular, and that the renunciation had been obtained through the pressure of these proceedings. The note of suspension was presented without caution.

The respondent pleaded;—That the averments in regard to the renunciation were unfounded, and further were incapable of being entertained in a process of suspension.

The Lord Ordinary refused the note. The complainer reclaimed; but without hearing counsel for the respondent, gation to relieve the tenant of any part of his outlay. 2d, That in such circumstances there was no claim for recompense at the instance of the tenant.

THE pursuer was tenant of the farm of Plaids, on the estate of the defender's father, the late Mr Macleod of Cadboll, under a lease for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1840. In 1851 the pursuer wished to assign his lease. The proprietor made it a condition of accepting the assignee as tenant, that the pursuer should restore an embankment which had been put up along the sea-shore on part of the farm, and had been swept away. The new embankment to be erected in a sufficient and "substantial manner, at least equally so with the original one, or to the satisfaction of some competent person to be appointed, for the purpose of drawing a specification for it." The pursuer undertook to proceed with the work immediately, and to have it completed by Whitsunday 1851, the term of the assignee's entry to the farm. On 23d April previous, Mr Garden, Mr Macleod's factor, addressed a letter to the pursuer in these terms:—"Cadboll requests me to inform you that he will signify to you his acceptance of Mr George Mackenzie as assignee to the remainder of the lease of Plaids farm, when the embankment has been reported on as completed, and sufficient as the former one, by Mr William Mackenzie, Tain, who (Cadboll says) has a thorough knowledge of such matters, and who must have been acquainted with the description of the former embankment."

On 20th May 1851, the pursuer addressed a letter to Garden, containing the following statement:—"The cost of the former embankment only amounted to L.32; the pursuer had then already expended L.37 in the construction of the new embankment, which was only half completed; but though he was only bound to erect an embankment as substantial as the old one, he had thought it advisable to execute a work which would be sufficient for its purpose, and durable. As the new embankment would be so substantial as to save the necessity of repairs, and of erecting another at the conclusion of the lease, it would be of advantage to the proprietor that it should be completed on the same scale on which it had been commenced, and it would be fair that he should relieve the pursuer of further outlay. On the 23d May, the pursuer addressed another letter to Mr Garden, stating, that to complete the work as begun would cost about L.80, and asking aid to the extent of a half-year's rent, being L.32; and if that sum were allowed him, he would "proceed to complete the embankment without further trouble." In answer to both these letters, Mr Garden, on 27th May, addressed this letter to the pursuer:—"I have laid yours before Mr Macleod of Cadboll. Cadboll told me that he did not object to the principle on which you asked him to aid you to the extent of L.32 in erecting the embankment at Plaids, but said that he would not condescend to the precise sum which he might allow you, until the embankment was completed."

After the work had proceeded a little further, the pursuer was prevented by the Magistrates of Tain from taking blue clay from Tain shore, that being the only available material for the embankment; and the work was stopped till the year 1853, when proceedings to compel the pursuer to implement of his contract were taken in the Sheriff-court at the instance of the defender, who had succeeded to his father's estate. In the meantime, the pursuer had been frequently remonstrated with on the part of the defender for delay in completing the embankment, for want of which the sea was encroaching upon the farm, the soil being sandy and light.

The embankment was completed by June 1853, at an expense of L.98, and at the sight of an inspector appointed or approved of by the defender or his father.

In November the present action was raised before the Sheriff-court of Ross. It was averred by the pursuer in his condescendence that Macleod's factor stated, before the work was commenced, that if the work was done according to specifications then prepared for an embankment of a more substantial and costly construction than the previous one, the excess of the expense over that of the previous one would be refunded to the pursuer. The summons concluded for the sum of L.67, the difference between the sum expended by him (L.98) and the cost of the former embankment (L.31). No. 29.

Grant v.
Macleod.

The Sheriff-substitute (Taylor) pronounced this interlocutor (after finding the facts above stated):—"Finds that in these circumstances there are no grounds for holding the late Mr Macleod, or the defender as his heir, liable for the excess of expense incurred by the pursuer in erecting said embankment beyond the cost of the former embankment, as concluded for in the libel: Therefore assails the defender, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in the expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—As to the merits of this case, it appears to the Sheriff-substitute that the pursuer has entirely failed to establish liability on the part of the late Mr Macleod. The pursuer's original engagement was admittedly unconditional as regards the cost of the embankment; it was to be done solely at his own expense, in consideration of being relieved of the tenancy of the farm. The stipulation as to the size and solidity of the work was, that it should be made at least as sufficient and substantial as the former embankment; no more was exacted or promised, or could be enforced. The pursuer commenced his work on a scale which it is to be presumed was considered by the parties to be a fulfilment of the pursuer's engagement; but the latter found, after a short trial by day-labourers, that the cost of it would be much greater than he had contemplated. On making this discovery, he applied for aid to Mr Macleod, and Mr Macleod's answer to that application, as contained in Mr Garden's letter of 27th May 1851, is the foundation of the present claim. It does not appear to the Sheriff-substitute, however, that that letter, either in its terms, or taken in connection with the circumstances of the case, contains an actionable engagement. It certainly appears to hold out an expectation of aid when the work was finished, but its whole phraseology shews that a direct compliance with the pursuer's request for the promise of a definite sum was studiously avoided, and that whatever aid 'might' be given, was to be entirely discretionary to Mr Macleod—the object plainly being to reserve the power to himself of considering all the relative circumstances as they should appear to him at the time the work was completed. It is not for another to say what considerations might have influenced Mr Macleod's ultimate decision; but there was a failure by the pursuer in one important part of his proposal for aid which might well affect his grounds of expectation from Mr Macleod, namely, though he offered to complete the whole work without farther 'trouble,' this was not done for two years thereafter, nor until an action was raised for compelling performance. It does not appear—nor would it be material if it did—that Mr Macleod directed the preparation of the specification, or the execution of any extra work. It was for the pursuer to have rejected a specification, and refused to carry on a work which exceeded the terms of his engagement. The pursuer, however, in April 1851, proceeded to form an embankment on a scale now represented as being much larger than was contemplated by the original engagement; and in April 1852 he proceeded to complete it on that scale, simply on the faith of Mr Garden's letter of 27th May 1851, although he had been made aware, by the factor's letter of 21st May 1852, of the construction put upon Mr Garden's letter, and notwithstanding that the tenor of the whole correspondence in the intermediate period showed that Mr Macleod, though pressed by the pursuer, would not bind himself to any definite pecuniary engagement. In particular, this was a matter for the pursuer's consideration when the action was raised against him on 6th April 1853, yet it was subsequent to that date that a considerable portion of the work was done. The presumption no doubt is, from the excess of cost over that of the old embankment, that the new one was a more substantial, and perhaps more extensive work; at the same time, the pursuer's undertaking was to make the new erection 'sufficient and substantial, at least equally so with the original one;' and it would appear from his letter of 27th May 1851, that no proper or efficient embankment could be then got made at

To this judgment the Sheriff adhered.*

The pursuer advocated, and, on his motion, the case was reported. It was pleaded for him;—The import of the correspondence was, that the pursuer undertook to make an embankment superior to what he was bound to construct, and the proprietor undertook to relieve him of a portion of the expense. Although Cadboll did not bind himself to allow a half-year's rent, or any precise sum, he was bound to allow the pursuer a fair amount. He had derived benefit from having an embankment made superior to what the pursuer was bound to erect, which had been done by the pursuer at much extra cost, and he was entitled to be relieved of it, having expended his money on the faith of the promise held out to him. The work was done to the satisfaction of the proprietor, and under the superintendence of an inspector appointed or approved of by him; and the pursuer had been frequently called on to complete it. The delay in doing so was the only ground of complaint against him, but for that delay he was not answerable.

It was answered;—On a construction of the letter of 27th May, on which the action rested, there was only a promise, and no obligation which could be enforced.¹ By the failure of the pursuer to complete the embankment before Whitsunday 1851, the defender had suffered serious injury, and the pursuer forfeited any equitable claim he might have had. The case had been pleaded as a claim for recompense, but the action was not laid on that ground.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is no ground for altering the judgment of the Sheriff in this action. The statements as to the promises made to the pursuer by the cost of the old one, which leaves it doubtful whether other circumstances than the increased solidity or size of the erection did not contribute to occasion an expense so much greater than the pursuer originally contemplated."

* "NOTE.—It is with considerable regret that the Sheriff feels himself obliged to adopt the strict legal view taken of this claim by the Sheriff-substitute in dismissing in toto the pursuer's claim, because, although under the letter written by Cadboll's factor in answer to the pursuer's application for assistance to complete the work, there was no positive obligation entered into to allow a specific sum, there cannot be any reasonable doubt that the letter implied an acquiescence in the substitution of an improved embankment for the old, and must have led the pursuer to expect some assistance from the proprietor in its completion. To refuse anything whatever, now that the work is terminated, is certainly pleading the summum jus against him, though the proprietor may naturally enough have been annoyed by the long delay which took place in the completion of the work. But, though the Sheriff has the feeling that there is hardship in the case, he is unable to find any solid ground on which the claim can be sustained to any specific extent. 1st, Even if the letter of Cadboll's factor were held to amount to an undertaking to pay something towards the expenses of the work, it would not follow that the pursuer was entitled to the whole excess beyond the L.32 or thereby, which was said to have been the expense of the old embankment. To execute an embankment in 1851, though no better than the old, might be far more expensive than a similar work executed in 1844, and the Sheriff finds no materials in the case for saying whether it would be so or not, or to what extent. 2d, In no view could the Sheriff have sustained the pursuer's claim beyond the sum of L.32, asked by himself in his letter of 23d May 1851; for if Cadboll had closed with that proposal, the pursuer could have asked no more, whatever the expense of completing the embankment in the new style had been, and Cadboll cannot be in a worse position by declining even to commit himself to that extent. 3d, The letter of the factor, while it holds out an expectation of aid, does not amount to an obligation for any definite sum, and appears to leave everything (legally speaking) in arbitrio of the landlord, more particularly if the pursuer, by his delay or refusal to execute the work, should give grounds for withholding the aid intended to be given. On these grounds, though with reluctance, the Sheriff concurs with the Sheriff-substitute in disallowing the claim."

Cadboll's factor before the erection of the embankment was commenced are irrelevant, and inconsistent with the terms of the letters that subsequently passed between the parties; and there is no statement that there was any authority to make such promises. There is nothing in the letter of the pursuer of the 20th May 1851 to show that he had been laying out money on the faith of any promise. That letter I take to be an appeal to Cadboll on a matter on which the pursuer had no previous assurance, but in which he depended on what Cadboll might say. The letter of 23d May repeats the appeal, and asks a half-year's rent, or L.32. Then there is the letter of the 27th May, in which Cadboll's factor states that Cadboll did not object to the "principle" proposed by the pursuer of allowing a half-year's rent; but that letter bears that Cadboll would not condescend upon the precise sum he would allow until the embankment was finished, and he required it to be completed immediately. The whole matter was thus kept open. The question comes to be—Is there an obligation contained in this letter or not? There is not. The import of the letter is, that although Cadboll creates a hope that something will be allowed to the pursuer, he will not say what sum he would allow. Many things might influence him, such as the behaviour of the pursuer, and delay or otherwise in the completion of the work. It is likely that such a letter might create expectation; but a man acting on it runs the risk of being disappointed. The pursuer did not attempt to tie down Cadboll, but took the risk of him or his son being willing to do, what it afterwards turned out his son was unwilling to do. This letter is founded on as an obligation to relieve the pursuer of part of the outlay; but it is only at best a loose promise, which the landlord kept within his own pleasure, and contains no obligation that the law can enforce.

There is no claim of recompense in such a case. A claim of recompense arises where a party is called on to act on an emergency in circumstances which warrant a man in laying out money in the absence of the proprietor, in order to preserve his property. But here the proprietor was present, and able to protect himself; and the pursuer's only claim or pretext for laying out money for Cadboll is this,—he or his factor saw me go on with this work, and hurried on its completion. But the tenant was previously bound to make the work.

The claim, as founded on this letter, is excluded beyond the L.32, or to any sum beyond that amount; any obligation founded on it, is excluded as much for L.67 as for L.500.

We cannot go into the question, whether or not Cadboll had reason to think that on account of his delay, or his other behaviour, the tenant had forfeited all right to a favourable consideration of his claim. In cases where claims of this kind are urged, they must be measured by strict law and legal construction.

LORD MURRAY.—I agree in a great part of what your Lordship has stated. The intention of Cadboll is clearly stated in the letter of 27th May. He is not fixed by that letter to allow any precise sum, or any sum whatever. He may have held out an expectation to the pursuer; but that does not constitute any obligation. He may have had many reasons for disappointing these expectations. Every party takes a sanguine view of what he is entitled to expect. The pursuer may conceive that he has much to complain of, and there might be no end to allegations. We must in adjudicating confine ourselves to rules of law; and I can only say that the defender is under no legal obligation to relieve the pursuer of any part of the outlay incurred by him in the erection of the embankment.

LORD COWAN.—We cannot touch the judgment of the Sheriff. The claim of the pursuer is, that he is entitled to the difference between the cost of erecting an embankment, such as he was only bound to erect, and the cost of the one he actually did execute. The claim, as stated and maintained in the Sheriff-court, was a case entirely of law, not of equity. I am not going minutely to analyse all the letters, as that has been already done by your Lordship. But I may observe, that the letters of Cadboll's factor are cautiously expressed, so as to avoid any express agreement. The letters of the pursuer, and particularly that of the 23d May 1851, evidently desired that Cadboll should come under a precise agreement, but that was studiously avoided by the factor, whose letter in answer is tantamount to a refusal to come under any agreement. His letter of 27th May conveys to my mind the same impression as it has done to the Sheriff, and to your Lordship. The purport plainly is, merely, that when Cadboll saw the embankment completed, which it was not at the time, he would then consider what sum he would allow the pursuer; and he was afterwards warned by the factor that this was the view of the correspondence which Cadboll took. Then there is nothing further done to the embankment; and the defender raised an action, to compel the pursuer to implement his agreement by erecting the embankment, his not having done so having occasioned injury to the farm. And, in the course of correspondence before 1853, when the work was completed, the pursuer was told that he had nothing to expect, but that he should be compelled to fulfil his engagement; and legal proceedings were resorted to for that very purpose. It was only after this that the erection was completed. As a legal demand, there is no ground for the claim. I at first thought that the case might stand some investigation as a claim of recompense, but the action is not laid on that ground. Farther, I am not aware of a claim for recompense having ever been advanced in circumstances such as here occur. The money of which repayment is sought, was expended in erecting this embankment, under the compulsitor of legal proceedings, to enforce an admitted obligation to erect such a structure. In such circumstances, I think there is no ground for a claim of recompense. There is, therefore, as I think, no room for the pursuer's claim in equity, any more than in law.

LORD WOOD absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor (after finding the facts stated in the narrative):—Find, in point of law, that by the letter of 27th May 1851, from the factor of the late Mr Macleod of Cadboll, no obligation was undertaken to pay any sum, or any particular sum, towards the expense of the said embankment; and that while a hope was held out that Mr M'Leod might assist the tenant, the whole matter was reserved by Mr M'Leod for his own consideration when the embankment should be completed: Find, that the claim against the defender on the ground of recompense which has been attempted in this Court, cannot be competently stated under this action, and even if competent, is wholly inadmissible in the circumstances of the case, and under the circumstances in which the work was undertaken to be made by the pursuer; Therefore of new assolzie the defender: Find the defender entitled to the expenses incurred by him in this Court, and in the inferior Court, and remit," &c.

Judicial factor—Investment in railways—Expense of unsuccessful application for audit.—A judicial factor appointed on a lapsed trust, having realised and invested the funds of the estate, applied for interim audit of his accounts, but was refused, on the ground that he had invested part of the funds in railway securities. He uplifted these funds, and invested them on heritable security, and again applied for interim approval of his accounts;—Held, on the second application, that he was not entitled to take credit for the business charges relating to the first application to the Court. Opinion, that in the circumstances they formed a good charge against the income, but not the capital of the estate. THE petitioner was appointed judicial factor on the trust-estate of the late Mrs Robertson in 1852, and having realised and invested the funds, he applied, on 29th June 1854, for an interim audit of his accounts. The Court then pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, on report of Lord Neaves, Ordinary, as it appears that a large portion of the funds has been invested in railway securities, refuse to approve of the accounts, and dismiss this petition, and decern."

The factor now presented this petition, stating that, in consequence of this disapproval by the Court of the investment of the trust-funds in railway securities, he had called up the funds (L.5000), and invested them on sufficient heritable security—that by the terms of the trust-deed under which he was acting, the ultimate division of the estate might be postponed for a considerable number of years—and that he was therefore desirous that his accounts, embracing the whole realisation of the trust-estate, should be audited ad interim, and his commission and the balance in his hands fixed and ascertained.

The Lord Ordinary now reported the case on the point, whether the factor was entitled to take credit for L.28, being the expense of the former unsuccessful attempt to get his accounts approved of?—and if so, whether it should be made a charge against the fee or income of the estate? By the trust-settlement, the truster's son and his wife enjoyed a liferent of the estate, their children being the ultimate fiars. The investment in railway debentures had been with consent of the liferenters, and although the former petition had been dismissed, the factor's accounts had been adjusted under it, down to 16th December 1853, and a report prepared, which saved expense under this petition.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that we cannot sanction this as a charge against the fee of the estate. On the other hand, I think that if there was any authority from the liferenters for the investment in railway debentures, it is a very fair charge against the income of the estate. The money was so invested, because the interest was large. That was for the interest of the liferenters. We objected to that, because the security was not, in our opinion, sufficient. That was for the interest of the fiars. But I think that, as in a question between the parties, equity is clearly in favour of the factor. Intimation, however, should be made to the liferenters that this sum is to be stated as against them, and let them appear for their interest if they think proper.

LORD IVORY.—It may save expense in the meantime to approve of the accounts, and find the amount of the balance now due.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, on report of Lord Mackenzie, and subject to the exception after-mentioned, approve of the accounts of charge and discharge, referred to in the petition, from the date of the factor's appointment (16th December 1852) to 16th December 1855: Find that the balance in the factor's hands at the date last mentioned was, according to these accounts, L.404, 11s. 10d., but that to this balance there was to be added the sum of L.21, 18s., being business charges relating to the factor's former application to the Court, and not, like the Accountant's fee, available in the present application; but reserving the factor's right to claim this sum of L.21, 18s. as a charge against the revenues receivable by the liferenters, either at the next audit, or otherwise, if so advised: And the Lords declare, that in his next account the factor is to charge himself with L.1026, 9s. 10d. as the balance due by him on the 16th of December 1855, and decern ad interim."

Entail—Process—Objection to recording a deed of entail.—A petition for authority to record a deed of entail was opposed by the heir, called as institute, who declined to take under the deed;—Held, that as he did not aver any positive injury to result from recording the deed, the Court could not withhold their authority, and that it was not the proper stage for considering objections to the validity of the entail.

Dec. 6, 1856.

1st DIVISION.
C.

THE late Allan Gilmour of Eaglesham, by trust-disposition, directed his trustees to execute an entail of his lands of West Walton, in favour of the series of heirs therein specified. His trustees having executed such a deed of entail, now applied for warrant to record it.

Answers were lodged by the institute, the nephew of the testator, stating that he was satisfied in his own mind that the trust-disposition of his uncle did not express the true will of the deceased. That he had instituted a reduction of it on the ground of facility and circumvention; and although he failed in that action, and, acting under legal advice to the effect that the evidence was insufficient for reduction, abandoned it at the trial, yet the deed was executed under such circumstances as to deprive it of all authority in his estimation. That in these circumstances the respondent could not conscientiously take any benefit under it, or even consent to the execution and recording of an entail in his favour, as institute or first heir, in terms of its provisions. The entail referred to in the petition was executed without any previous communication with the respondent, and he objected to it in so far as his name was inserted in it, not only without his consent, but against his will. He also objected to the recording of the deed with his name in it. He was resolved to take no benefit under the settlement in question; and, in so far as the law allowed him, he was resolved to prevent his name being inserted as a beneficiary in any deed executed under it. He was willing that the petitioners should retain the property as trustees.

D. F. Inglis, for the petitioners:—The trustees only want to do their duty. They have executed the entail as directed, and having done so, it was very doubtful whether the Court had power to refuse authority to record it. If the deed be informal, or to the prejudice of the respondent, he can afterwards set it aside by competent action.

The Lord Advocate, for the respondent:—It is not necessary that the respondent should state a reason for declining to be institute. He may be acting from caprice, or he may think it a damnosa hereditas, but he is entitled to renounce his position, and to object to the recording of a deed containing his name as heir of entail. The statute does not compel the Court to record a deed which is not a good deed, and this cannot be considered a good deed when the institute has renounced.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—The question is, whether, if there be a deed at all, we can refuse to record it? The objection, as I understand it, is that there is no entail.

because there must be a grantor and grantee, and the respondent says he is not grantee, and cannot be made so without his consent. Suppose that were the case, and suppose there were here a formal renunciation by the respondent, there are other parties who are grantees. Therefore, we have not a deed without grantees. It appears to be a deed, and therefore I inquire no further. There may be many difficult questions raised under the deed. But these are not matters to be dealt with in considering whether we are to obey the Act of Parliament.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It rather appears to me that we have at present simply to interpose our authority to this deed being recorded. The parties presenting it aver that it is a good entail, and to consider the validity of every entail at this stage would be a very serious affair indeed. Many deeds have been recorded, the validity of which has been afterwards successfully impugned. If the respondent had stated any clear, tangible, and positive injury that he was to sustain by the recording of this deed,—that would have been another question. We could have understood it if he had said that in this entail there was a grievous libel on his character, and on that ground had objected to the recording of it. But he has not made out to my satisfaction any injury to result from it. As to the validity of the entail, I abstain from giving any opinion upon it. This is not the time for considering objections to it.

LORD DEAS.—Upon the whole, I agree with your Lordship. I think that the respondent has it in his own power to defend himself against all consequences by executing a renunciation. He does not say that he will suffer any injury by recording the deed, and as there are interests beyond his, I do not think that he is entitled to stand in the gap to their prejudice. By executing a renunciation, he will save himself, and that is all that he can insist on.

LORD IVORY.—I incline to agree. I see much harm that would result from this deed not being recorded ; and, upon the whole, I think it the safer course to follow what your Lordship has suggested.

THE COURT interposed their authority in usual terms.

Process—Issues.—An action was directed against a law firm, on the allegation that, in violation of their duty as agents, they had become the purchasers of certain railway shares, which they had advised their clients to sell, knowing they would increase in value ;—Form of issues to try the question.

SEE ante, vol. xviii. p. 619.

This case was before the Court on 20th February 1856, on an objection by the defenders to the pursuers' title to sue, which objection was repelled. The action was a reduction of certain transfers of railway shares which had belonged to a joint-stock company, called the Dundee Foundry Company, of which the late Mr Gourlay—represented by the pursuers—had been a partner ; and the sale of these shares, it was alleged, had been advised by the defenders, Christopher Kerr and John Kerr, writers in Dundee, who acted as law-agents for the company, ostensibly for the benefit of the company, but in reality for their own behoof—the purchasers holding the shares in trust for the defenders, whose position as agents for various railway companies enabled them with certainty to anticipate a great increase in the value of the shares in question.

The case was now reported on the adjustment of issues.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The record here is loosely expressed. The action is directed against Christopher Kerr and John Kerr, who are described as a firm ; and that gives point and meaning to the words Christopher Kerr and John Kerr, distinguishing them from their individual capacity. At same time, the statement in reference to the purchase is not so worded as necessarily to imply that it was a purchase by the firm. It might have been a joint purchase by Christopher Kerr and John Kerr to distribute among themselves. There are various ways in which the purchase might have been made by them in violation of their duty as agents. It might have been made by the firm. It might have been made by Christopher Kerr and John Kerr jointly, and in any proportion they thought proper. It might have been made as a separate and independent purchase by Christopher Kerr and by John Kerr; or the whole purchase might have been made by Christopher Kerr, or by John Kerr. The summons is not so framed as to reach this last case; but we think that it does reach the case of a joint purchase, whether it be held for the firm, or in any proportion the individuals may choose; and, therefore, that the issue should be so framed as to make that clear. It does not appear to us that the record ties down the purchase to a purchase by the firm, although the summons may do so. Therefore the issue must be so framed as to prevent it applying to the third alternative; and we also think that the phrase, "became the purchasers," properly expresses the species facti set forth in the record.

THE following issues were approved of:—"Whether, in September 1845, the said Christopher Kerr and John Kerr were employed by the Dundee Foundry Company, or those interested therein, and by William Gourlay's trustees, as their agents, to sell certain shares of the Dundee and Newtyle Railway Company, belonging to them respectively?—and Whether, in violation of their duty as such agents, the said Christopher Kerr and John Kerr did, as a company, or did jointly as individuals, in the said month of September, or of October immediately following, become the purchasers of 217 of the said shares, or of any, and what part thereof?"

THE respondent was incarcerated on a civil debt, and thereafter presented a petition to the Sheriff for cessio. On 12th September 1856, the Sheriff-substitute appointed Tuesday the 14th October, for the examination of the petitioner. Of that date, all parties being present, the incarcerating creditor objected to the competency of the process, in respect the petition did not contain a list of all the petitioner's creditors; and a list of omitted creditors was produced. The Sheriff authorised the petitioner to call the persons named in the list, and adjourned the diet till the 30th October current; and, of that date, in respect the additional alleged creditors had then been called, he repelled the objection. The minute of procedure then proceeded:—"Edinburgh, 14th November 1856.—Present, &c.—Mr Arthur moved that the Sheriff would fix a diet for the petitioner's examination.

"Mr Pattison objected, that the motion was incompetent, in respect that the process had fallen, by reason of the party petitioner not having been examined, or proposed that he should be examined, either at the original diet of appearance fixed in terms of the statute, or at the subsequent diet to which the original diet was adjourned; and not having made any motion for an adjournment at the second diet, or proposal to proceed with the cause, and no adjournment of the diet having been then made by the Sheriff.

“Eo die.—The Sheriff-substitute having heard parties, finds that the petitioner was present on the 14th October last: Finds that the objection that all his creditors had not been called was then taken, whereby his examination was rendered impossible, or at least inexpedient: Finds that there is no nullity attached by the statute to the non-examination of the petitioner on his first appearance, nor to the failure to fix a diet for that purpose: Finds that this case, in these circumstances, substantially falls under the 9th section of the Act of Sederunt, 6th June 1839: Therefore repels the objection, and ordains the petitioner to appear within the sheriff-court room, Edinburgh, upon Monday, the 24th day of November current, at one o'clock afternoon, for examination.”

Mason.

Against this interlocutor the objecting creditor reclaimed.

The pursuer of the cessio now objected to the competency of the reclaiming note. The Act 6 & 7 Will. IV. cap. 56, which regulates the procedure in a cessio, authorises a review of the Sheriff's judgment only where it disposes of the question whether cessio was to be granted or not (sect. 6). The statute was not intended to give an opportunity of bringing under review all the proceedings before the Sheriff; but, if such a reclaiming note as this were sustained, every possible objection, however frivolous, might be brought under review,—a result inconsistent with the object as well as the words of the statute.

The reclaimer pleaded;—That the judgment of the Sheriff, in effect, sustained the process, repelling the objections taken to its competency. There was no restriction in the statute as to the nature of the interlocutor that might be reclaimed against.¹

LORD PRESIDENT. — The objection to the competency of this reclaiming note is sound. The power of review is truly of a judgment disposing of the petition for cessio, which this is not. Section 8 of the statute plainly contemplates the review of the ultimate judgment in the case, with the power of reviewing the previous judgments; and the whole policy of the statute is in that direction. There is thus a limit to the power of reclaiming. But, if the other reading were to be sanctioned, there would be no limit to reclaiming notes, and we would be enlarging the power of reclaiming exactly where it is least desirable to encourage it. Therefore, I am of opinion that this objection is well founded.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion. The words of the statute will not admit of any other reading than what your Lordship has put on them.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur.

LORD DEAS.—I concur. The authority of Mr Bell, p. 35 of his Commentaries on this statute, is directly against this proceeding; and I think rightly so.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor: — “Sustain the objections to the competency of the reclaiming note, and dismiss the reclaiming note accordingly: Find the pursuer of the cessio entitled to the expenses of the discussion of the reclaiming note: Allow an account thereof to be given in,” &c.

BROWN brought this action against Mason, concluding for L.32, 6s. 1½d. as the balance of wages payable weekly, at the rate of 9s. or 9s. 6d. per week, due to him from September 1852 till October 1854.

The defender stated that the pursuer was engaged to take charge of his horse and gig, and also to work in his garden, and that he was also required, during the defender's absence in town, to make all necessary disbursements on his behalf, connected with the garden, and other matters. To enable the pursuer to do so, the defender advanced to him money from time to time, and the pursuer undertook to keep a correct account of his receipts and payments so received. The pursuer refused to account for the advances made by the defender, and he had also demanded payment of a large sum as the amount of wages due to him, without giving credit for several payments received by him to account thereof. The defender lodged a state showing only L.26, 5s. 9½d. to be due, and stated that he was willing, and had all along offered to pay the pursuer L.28 for a discharge of all claims, but that the pursuer had refused to accept it.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor :—" Finds that the pursuer was engaged to serve the defender as a servant, and entered on his service 11th September 1852, at a weekly wage of 9s. : Finds it is not alleged by the defender that his wages were paid weekly or regularly to the pursuer, but that sums to account of wages and disbursements were from time to time paid to him : Finds it specially alleged by the defender that the pursuer's wages were all settled up to 14th March 1853, whilst the pursuer denies this, and alleges that, in respect of wages due from 11th September 1852 till 14th March 1853, amounting (twenty-eight weeks at 9s.) to L.12 12s., two sums, L.3 and L.4 respectively, only were paid : Finds that in the Minute, No. 17 of process, the defender admits that he took no receipts for the said wages, and that he cannot even condescend upon the time at, and the particular sums by which, the said wages down to 1853 were paid. Allows him a proof by the oath of the pursuer that his wages were fully settled till 14th March 1853."

The defender reclaimed, and pleaded ;—That in the circumstances he was entitled to be assoilzied ; but, at any rate, that the proof ought not to be limited to the pursuer's oath.

The pursuer pleaded ;—That the proof ought to be limited, because the whole sum in dispute was only L.4. He also objected to a general proof, because of the indefiniteness of the defender's statements.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am disposed to alter the interlocutor in so far as it limits the mode of proof, but quoad ultra to adhere.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—It is a fatal objection to this interlocutor that the proof, which is thereby allowed, is a proof by oath of party, without there having been any reference to his oath by the other party. Without such a reference the Lord Ordinary had no power to allow such a proof. And further, as none of the alleged payments amounted to L.100 Scots, the proof cannot be so limited.

LORD DEAS.—I do not wonder at the desire of the Lord Ordinary to bring this matter to a close, for the whole amount upon which the parties split was only L.4 ; and the difference between them, even now, is only the difference between the admitted balance of L.26, 5s. 9½d. and the balance claimed of L.32, 6s. 1½d. What the Lord Ordinary really meant was to find that, as there was no offer to prove by writ, the defence could only be proved by oath. But the question is, whether this was a case necessarily to be limited to writ or oath. Now I am not prepared to say, where the action is for weekly wages of 9s. or 9s. 6d., that, because the aggregate sum claimed exceeds L.8, 6s. 8d., the proof is therefore to be so limited, nor do I wish to give any opinion as to whether, in the case of wages, although the amount of the termly payment were actually above L.8, 6s. 8d., the party is in all cases to be limited to writ or oath to prove that the wages were paid. I give no opinion upon that. Moreover, the actual sum in dispute here is less than L.8, 6s. 8d.

so that in every view the defender's proof ought not to be limited to the writ or oath of the pursuer. No. 35.

Public officer—Messenger-at-arms.—The Court refused to grant a warrant to sheriff-officers to execute a decree of the Court of Session against a party in Orkney.

THE petitioners, a majority and quorum of the trustees of the late Mrs Elizabeth Miller, raised an action of exhibition, count, reckoning, and payment, against a co-trustee who had acted as agent for the trust. They obtained a decree in absence. The decree was extracted. This was a petition for warrant to sheriff-officers in Orkney to charge the defender on the extracted decree, and, if necessary, to carry it into execution by poinding, arrestment, and imprisonment—the defender being resident in Kirkwall, and there being no messenger-at-arms in the county of Orkney. Process—Suspension.—The pursuer of an action of filiation in the Sheriff-court was unsuccessful, and was imprisoned on a decree for expenses. In an advocacy on juratory caution, the lawyers for the poor reported that she had no probabilis causa litigandi. She raised a reduction of the Sheriff's judgment. The Court passed a note of suspension and liberation on juratory caution.

MARY RODGER, sometime a servant to John Young, a farmer in Perth-shire, raised an action against him in the Sheriff-court of Perth, concluding for payment of inlying charges and aliment of an illegitimate child. The Sheriff (Mure), reversing the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, assailed Young, and found him entitled to expenses. She presented a note of advocacy on juratory caution; but the lawyers for the poor having reported their opinion that she had no probabilis causa litigandi, no further proceedings were taken in the advocacy. She then raised a summons of reduction of the Sheriff's judgment, which was executed. Young extracted the Sheriff's decree for expenses, and in default of payment incarcerated Rodger. Process—Declarator—Proof—Onus probandi.—Creditors raised an action concluding for declarator that their debtor's jus mariti was not validly excluded by a disposition of heritable property in favour of his wife, excluding his jus mariti. The Court repelled pleas to the effect that the presumption being that the price of property purchased by a married woman was paid for from funds forming the communion of goods, the onus lay on the defenders to prove their allegation that the price of the property had been paid from funds bequeathed to the wife while still unmarried, excluding the jus mariti of any husband she might marry.

- Dec. 6, 1856. THE pursuers, creditors of Thomas Young, the defender, raised an action, concluding for declarator that his jus mariti had not been validly excluded by a disposition of heritable property in his wife's favour, and that the rents thereof, which had been arrested, were liable for his debts. In the condescendence, it was stated (art. 7), Mr and Mrs Young were married on 23d May 1843. On 29th June following, the property was purchased for L.1200. Of this sum, L.500 was then paid; and, after an action against them in the Court of Session for the price, at the instance of the sellers, the balance of the price was paid on 19th February 1852, when the disposition in favour of Mrs Young was granted. At that time Thomas Young was largely indebted to the pursuers. (Art. 8.)—"The price of the said subjects and others was not paid from funds which belonged to Mrs Young exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of the said Thomas Young, but from funds falling under the communion of goods."

 Ld. Ardmillan.
 R.

The pursuers' pleas now disposed of were—(1.) The subjects having been purchased during the subsistence of the marriage, it was to be presumed that the price was paid out of funds forming part of the goods in communion. (2.) That the onus of proving that the price was paid out of the funds from which the husband's jus mariti was excluded, rested on the defenders.

Defences were given in, stating that the L.500 paid on the 29th June 1843, was a sum contained in a bond specially conveyed to Mrs Young, exclusive of the jus mariti of any husband she might marry, by the settlement of her aunt, to whom Mrs Young had succeeded before her marriage; and that the balance found due by the Court was raised on a bond and disposition in security over the property granted by Mrs Young, with concurrence of her husband.

The Lord Ordinary reported the case, in respect of the interlocutor in a process of furthcoming, on arrestments of the rents of the property at the instance of the pursuers. (See ante, vol. xviii. p. 856.)

The pursuers argued;—To hold that the pursuer was bound to prove that the price of property acquired by Mrs Young was paid for out of the funds forming the communio bonorum, would be to establish a dangerous precedent; and there were no statements in the disposition on which there were grounds for shifting the onus the presumption of law laid on her.

It was answered;—The title being clearly in favour of the wife, the pursuers were bound to disprove the narrative of it, and the facts averred accounting for the state of it. All the argument of the pursuers was founded on a presumption of law, for which, in the circumstances set forth, there was no room. The defender, Mrs Young, was shown to be possessed of funds of her own, while it was not even averred that her husband was possessed of any means from which he could have paid for the property.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think the statement of the pursuers is sufficiently precise, or in accordance with practice. It is averred that the price of the subjects was paid from “funds falling under the communion of goods between the spouses.” That statement must be altered. The goods in communion, during the subsistence of the marriage, are the property of the husband. It should be averred that the price was paid from funds, the property of Mrs Young.

With consent of the defenders, the statement on the record was amended as directed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think there is any doubt upon this point, that the pursuers are bound to prove their own case, and not to throw the onus of proof upon the defenders.

This property was purchased for Mrs Young at a public sale, and the price of it, she avers, paid by her out of funds of her own, and from which her husband's jus mariti was excluded. A part of the price was paid at the date of the purchase; and, after nine year's possession, the balance of the price was paid also from funds belonging to herself, and the title is a conveyance in favour of the lady, exclusive of the jus mariti, the term of entry, be it observed, being in 1843. On that title she is infeft, and it is through that title that the pursuers, as her husband's creditors, sought to arrest the rents of the property. Nine years after the acquisition of this property a bill was granted by Thomas Young, which was protested. And his creditors on that obligation say, that in this process the lady, infeft as I have stated, and that long before the bill was granted, must prove the narrative of the title in her own favour. It might have been alleged that the conveyance in Mrs Young's favour was fraudulent. This action, however, is not even in the form of a reduction, but of a declarator, and there is no averment of fraud. I cannot imagine any ground on which we can so dislocate a proper process of declarator, as to throw upon a defender the onus of proving what the pursuer undertakes to prove. This case must proceed in the usual way.

LORD MURRAY. — I need not take up the time of the Court by repeating the opinion stated by your Lordship, in which I entirely concur.

If the creditors of the husband wish to make out that this property possessed by the wife on a title excluding his jus mariti is the property in reality of her husband, on the ground that the price was paid out of his funds, they must make out that case.

LORD COWAN.—By our former judgment we held that the rents of the property of which the right was vested in Mrs Young, exclusive of the jus mariti of her husband, could not be de plano arrested for the debts of her husband. His creditors, before they could attack the rents, were considered bound to get behind the title by some action, as of declarator or otherwise, to set it aside. The ground of action is that the price of the property was paid out of the funds of Mr Young, and that the property, though by the form of the title vested in his wife, was truly his, and open to be attacked by his creditors. In the ordinary case, the onus lies on the pursuer to make out his averments, and we have only to consider whether anything has been stated or admitted by the defender on record which shifts the onus of proof. Now, so far from this being the case, the whole statements in the defence are quite consistent with, and support the case of the defender. The pursuers must make out that the property belonged to the husband, having been purchased with his funds. The only difficulty is, whether their statements are sufficient to allow them to be admitted to proof; but, on the whole, I think that they may be held sufficient.

THE record in this case was made up in several conjoined suspensions of successive charges served upon the suspender, Mr Small, at the instance of the charger, Mr Millar, for payment of a ground annual of L.273 per annum, from Martinmas 1842 till Whitsunday 1853 inclusive.

The subject, on account of which this ground annual was claimed, consisted of a yard, with a warehouse and other erections thereon, lying on the south side of the Seagate of Dundee. The obligation upon which the charges to pay that ground annual had been given, was contained in a contract of ground annual, dated 30th and 31st October 1835, which was entered into between the trustees of the Dundee and Union Whale Fishing Company, and the suspender, Mr Small, and certain cautioners; and to which contract the charger, Mr Millar, had right by a conveyance from the Whale Fishing Company to him, dated 23d May 1836.

One of the questions raised in the first of these conjoined suspensions, viz., whether the suspender was liberated from his obligation in consequence of his having sold the subjects to a Mr Adamson, had been the subject of discussion in this Court, and in the House of Lords, and had been ultimately decided in favour of the charger. But there remained another question, viz., whether the suspender was free from his liability for the ground annuals charged for, in respect that, as he alleged, the charger had not a valid right or title to a large portion of the subjects in question at the date of the contract of ground annual in 1835, or for a period of about eighteen years thereafter, when, in 1853, he acquired such from the Crown, or the town of Dundee, as representing the Crown, to whom the subjects really belonged. The suspender proposed to establish the verity of his allegations which he had made in the record in support of that ground of suspension. The charger objected to this, on the ground that all these averments were irrelevant, and insisted for decree, on the case as it stood on the record, finding the letters orderly proceeded.

On 31st January 1856, the Court pronounced an interlocutor allowing the suspender to put in a minute of the matters on which he proposed to have investigation.¹ The suspender thereafter lodged a minute, averring, inter alia, that in the year 1843 the Magistrates and Town-Council of Dundee instituted an action of declarator against the Dundee and Union Whale Fishing Company, the charger, the suspender, Adamson and his sureties, and certain other parties to the contracts of ground-annual, concluding that it should be found that they had the sole right to part of the subjects in dispute; and that defences having been lodged, a record was made up in the process. That Adamson and his cautioners instituted, in the year 1843, an action of reduction against, inter alios, the Dundee and Union Whale Fishing Company and the charger, concluding for reduction of the contracts of ground-annual and other relative writings. That the action at the instance of the Magistrates and Town-Council having stood for advising in the roll in the month of May 1853, it was delete from the roll upon a joint minute for the parties; and that thereafter an extrajudicial arrangement was entered into, by which the case was taken out of Court without a judgment on the merits; and this settlement of the case was made by concert between the Dundee and Union Whale Fishing Company, the charger, and the Magistrates and Town-Council of Dundee, or at least between the two former, for the purpose of evading the trial of the question raised in the action at the instance of the Magistrates and Town-Council. That on or about the month of June 1853, the Dundee and Union Whale Fishing Company purchased the right and interest in the subjects in question, which belonged to and was vested in the Magistrates and Town-Council of Dundee, and which they claimed in the action which was settled extrajudicially, as above mentioned; and that they or the charger had also purchased the right of the Crown in the said subjects.

Conjunct probation having been allowed, the suspender adduced as a haver John Ogilvie, writer in Dundee, law-agent for the Dundee and Union Whale Fishing Company. Being called on to produce (1.) excerpts from the minutes of the committee of management of the Dundee and Union Whale Fishing Company, dated 11th May 1853: (2.) Excerpts from the minutes of the annual general meeting of the Company, dated 8th June 1853: and (3.) Minutes of meeting of the committee of management of the Company, dated 9th November 1853, he objected that all of these minutes related to the private communings of the partners of the Company, and those in the management and direction of their affairs, regarding the action then in dependence against them at the instance of the town of Dundee, and the protection of their interests therein—the same matter being involved in the then also and still depending action against the Fishing Company at the instance of Adamson. The minutes in question were, therefore, privileged, and he, as the law-agent of the Fishing Company, was not bound or entitled to produce the same.

He also objected to produce a correspondence between his firm and their Edinburgh correspondent, regarding the depending actions at the instance of the town of Dundee against the Whale Fishing Company, and the conduct thereof on the part of the latter—the same matter being involved in the then and still depending action against the Fishing Company at the instance of Adamson. The objection to the production of this correspondence was, therefore, that, being of the nature of communications between the agents of a party litigant in a depending action, and in relation to the conduct of the proceedings therein, it was privileged and protected, and production thereof could not be enforced.

The commissioner made avizandum with these objections to the Court.

Macfarlane, for the haver, pleaded;— That the documents called for were of so confidential a character that he was neither bound nor entitled to produce them.¹

Fraser, for the suspender, pleaded ;—That the documents called for were not properly of a confidential nature, inasmuch as they were not between co-defenders of an action, nor were they, while relating to a pending suit, called for by one of the parties thereto from his adversary.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—This objection is a peculiar one. The case is not exactly like any of the cases referred to by either party. The person Small is resisting a charge for payment of ground-annuals, and he says that the property did not belong to the charger Millar, but to the town of Dundee. He pleads no title. Millar, on the other hand, says that he has a good title, but the answer is—"you made a transaction with the Magistrates of Dundee for the purpose of excluding a trial of the question, and for the purpose of giving you the appearance of a title." That is part of the question raised in this action between these parties. We have allowed a minute to be given in of the averments offered to be proved, and we have allowed a proof of the facts alleged in the minute. We have not sustained the relevancy of the averments, but we have determined that they are a fit subject of enquiry in this case. It follows that if the minutes and documents in the possession of this haver bear upon these averments, the suspender is entitled to get at them. We only say that the averments are fit to be enquired into, but that being so, the enquiry must relate to the averment that there was a collusive settlement to evade the trial of the case at the instance of the Magistrates against the Whale Fishing Company and others. I cannot see any confidentiality so far as that goes. In the first place, what is asked for is not anything that has passed in reference to the present case, and that is of some consequence. It may be that in the documents called for, there may be matters not fitting for this party to see. It is not said so, but it may be right to guard against letting in those things, if they do exist ; and I therefore think that these documents ought to be exhibited to the Commissioner, in order that he may order such excerpts as bear upon the matter admitted to proof.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion. My only hesitation would be as to the necessity of any qualification—there being no allegation of the kind—that may tend to introduce difficulties which the parties have not suggested to us.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur.

LORD DEAS.—This appears to me to be a very special question, arising in complicated and peculiar circumstances. There were two actions between the same parties—the Town, Adamson, the Whale Fishing Company, Small and Millar—and relating to the same subject-matter, with which these parties were all connected by the deeds narrated in the record, the particulars of which I need not go over. The leading allegation in the minute of 8th February 1856, of which a proof was allowed, is, that one of these actions was settled by collusion and concert between the other parties, including the Whale Fishing Company, to defeat the rights of Small in the other action ; and the writings in dispute are sought to be recovered in this action to prove that allegation. The objection to the production is taken by Mr Ogilvie, the clerk or agent of, and as in right of, the Whale Fishing Company ; and the opinion I have formed agrees with that of your Lordships, that the objection, in the circumstances, cannot be sustained.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—"Repel the said objections, and ordain the haver, within six days, to make production as called for,—but with this explanation, that, in so far as the writings, or any of them, may, on inspection by the Commissioner, be found to contain any matters of a confidential nature not bearing upon the question at present under probation, excerpts shall be taken at the sight of the Commissioner, excluding such matters only."

No. 40.

Dec. 12, 1856.

Bankruptcy—Discharge.—Held (diss. Lord Cowan), that under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, Taylor v. Crow. any creditor is entitled to appear and oppose a bankrupt's discharge at any time before the Lord Ordinary has confirmed the Sheriff's deliverance discharging him, where no objection was stated before the Sheriff, although no appeal was taken against his interlocutor within twenty-one days. Question, Whether the creditor could have appeared without a regular appeal, if the Sheriff had given judgment after hearing the objection?

THE estates of the firm of J. and A. Taylor, and James Taylor and Allan Taylor, the individual partners thereof, were sequestrated under the Bankrupt Statute in the end of 1854, and the total value of the assets amounted to the sum of L.33, 19s. 6d., which sum was swallowed up by payment of taxes, rent, and commission to the interim factor. 2^d DIVISION.
Bill-Chamber.
I.

On 7th August 1856 the bankrupts applied to be discharged; and the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire appointed their petition to be intimated in the Gazette. The subsequent procedure was as follows:—The Sheriff-substitute (Bell) pronounced this interlocutor:—"9th October 1856.—Having resumed consideration of this petition, with the report by the trustee on the bankrupts' conduct, and minute of concurrence of creditors, and having seen the Edinburgh Gazette of the 12th August last, containing the intimation ordered by last interlocutor, in respect more than twenty-one days have now elapsed since the publication of the said intimation, and that no appearance has been made to oppose the prayer of the petition,—Finds the bankrupt petitioners, James Taylor and Allan Taylor, entitled to their discharge; but, before granting the same, appoints them to make a declaration in terms of the statute." The declaration was taken of the same date, and in it the bankrupts "severally declare that they have made a full and fair surrender of their estates," &c. After which, also on 9th October, the following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having advised the declaration made of this date, by the bankrupt petitioners, Finds the same satisfactory; discharges the said James Taylor and Allan Taylor, of all debts and obligations contracted by them, or for which they were liable, either as partners aforesaid, or as individuals, at the date of the sequestration," &c.

When the extract of this deliverance was presented to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Neaves) for confirmation, it was opposed in name of Mr Crow, and his Lordship pronounced a judgment, in which he, "before answer, appoints the proceedings before the Sheriff in the sequestration to be transmitted to the Bill-Chamber." *

The case then came before Lord Mackenzie, who allowed the opposing creditor to lodge a note of objections to the confirmation of the discharge.

Objections were accordingly lodged, to the effect that, notwithstanding the sequestration, James Taylor had immediately commenced business anew, under the firm of James Taylor and Company. And although the whole

* "NORM.—As at present advised, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that if there was here, as there ought to have been, a substantive interlocutor by the Sheriff, finding the bankrupt entitled to his discharge before proceeding to take his declaration, and if there has been no appeal in due time against that interlocutor, according to the course followed in Samson v. Campbell, 29th June 1849, that interlocutor is now final, and must receive effect. Any objection now raised against the actual discharge would, in that view, be confined to the question, whether the bankrupt's declaration was satisfactory; or, at least, to some other point not inconsistent with the original and final interlocutor fixing the bankrupt's right. But, in the meantime, the proceedings have been ordered to be transmitted, that the true state of the case may be seen."

assets in the sequestration had amounted only to about L.33, he had been known to advance L 180 to one man, and afterwards to receive L.100 from another. The objections were summed up in the following article:—"James Taylor has thus not made a full and fair surrender of his estate. His creditors have received no dividend or composition, and never will, if his discharge is now confirmed by your Lordship; and he has given no account either of how he became possessed of the L.180, and other funds, to enable him to start business afresh, nor of what has become of the L.100 received by him. In these circumstances, the objector, who is a creditor to the extent of L.70, humbly submits that the bankrupt, James Taylor, is not entitled to his discharge until he satisfactorily accounts for said funds, and makes a full surrender of his estate to his trustee."

For the bankrupts, it was now contended;—That it was too late for a creditor now to object. They were now proceeding under sect. 123 of the late Bankrupt Act, which enacted, that an extract of the Sheriff's deliverance, granting the discharge, should be presented to the Lord Ordinary, who "shall confirm" the same. His functions were thus purely ministerial, and not judicial in any sense; at the utmost they could not be so in a higher sense than was pointed at by the Lord Ordinary, of having a right to judge of the sufficiency of the affidavit; and in the present case it was admitted even by the objector, that it was quite satisfactory, and in terms of the statute. When the bankrupts had applied to be discharged, intimation had been given in the Gazette—that was the proper time for the objector to have appeared—or he might even have taken to appeal, within twenty-one days of the subsequent deliverances of the Sheriff; but having adopted none of the ordinary modes of appearing allowed by the statute, he had no right whatever to oppose the purely ministerial act of confirmation by the Lord Ordinary.

For the objector, it was replied;—That the question of the bankrupt's discharge was sub judice till it was confirmed by the Lord Ordinary, and the discharge could be stopped on sufficient cause being shown. Here the bankrupt had made false statements; and a creditor having ascertained this, came forward before confirmation and offered to prove that, and that the declaration upon which the discharge bore to proceed was false from beginning to end. The answer made by the bankrupts was, that the confirmation by the Lord

* "NOTE.—From the proceedings which have been transmitted to the Bill Chamber, it appears that the petition for discharge was appointed to be intimated in the Gazette on 7th August 1856. That, on 9th October 1856, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor, which bears that no appearance had been made to oppose the prayer of the petition, and finds the bankrupts entitled to the discharge. On the same day the bankrupts made their declaration, and the Sheriff-substitute having found the same satisfactory, discharged them of all debts contracted by them prior to the sequestration. No appeal was taken by the respondent John Crow, or any of the creditors, against the interlocutor of 9th October 1856, finding the bankrupts entitled to their discharge, and that interlocutor is now final. But when the bankrupts applied for the confirmation of their discharge, the respondent appeared and objected, on the ground that they had not made a full and fair disclosure of their affairs.

"It appeared to Lord Neaves, who first heard the case, that any objection now raised against the confirmation of the discharge should be confined to the question Whether the bankrupts' declaration was satisfactory? or at least to some other point not inconsistent with the original and final interlocutor finding that the bankrupts were entitled to their discharge. As at present advised, the Lord Ordinary inclined to think that this view is correct. But as doubts have been thrown up on the point in consequence of the opinions expressed in Samson v. Campbell, 12 July 1851 (13 D. 1395), he has deemed it advisable to report the case to the Court."

Ordinary was a mere mechanical process, and his Lordship had no jurisdiction whatever. But a more reasonable view was, that the statute intended that so important an Act as relieving bankrupts of all liability for their debts was too momentous to be left to any inferior court; and that no discharge, therefore, should be granted till the authority of this Court was interposed, and that till that was done there was jurisdiction to entertain any objections which creditors chose to state.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is a great distinction in questions arising in sequestrations—between those arising between the creditors themselves—say, between creditors as to ranking, or between claimants of goods and the general body of creditors—and those which arise between any of the creditors and the bankrupt. As to the first class of cases, they naturally were left, under various modifications, very much on the footing of ordinary litigations in civil causes; but as to those arising out of the relation of the creditors, or of any one of them, to the bankrupt, the state of matters was very different. The sequestration is essentially the creditors' process, and they are entitled to appear in it throughout. I know of no steps the bankrupt can take in it, whether to obtain his discharge or otherwise, in which they are not entitled to appear. What is the object of this very application for discharge now before us, but to recall their process of sequestration under which they hold him and his funds and acquirenda liable for their debts, and to discharge and relieve the bankrupt of these very debts? Then, unless the bankrupt has got fairly out of the process, I have no difficulty in sustaining the creditors' right to appear.

I apprehend the relation between parties not yet ranked or claiming against each other, and that of creditors to the bankrupt, to be quite distinct and clear in principle. I hold the creditors entitled to maintain their interests to the very last, in what is properly their own process, in which nothing can be done to put an end to it at the instance of the bankrupt which the creditors have not a right to resist. This appears from the study of the statute in the various sections referring to this matter, from sect. 113 to sect. 123, where we have frequently the direction "shall," without the Judge being tied down to any course of procedure; nay, as in sect. 114, where it is manifest that objections are to be heard and discussed, so in the next section (115), a deliverance shall be pronounced in the same manner as in sect. 114, showing that here again it is competent for creditors to appear; and I read the words, "shall pronounce," and "shall confirm," in sect. 116, as obligatory in no higher sense than in the previous sections. Then, again, if sect. 117 be looked at, it is quite apparent that objections are competent under it also; and the same is equally manifest under sect. 122, as we come nearer the section we have specially to deal with, the 123d. By it, notwithstanding the previous deliverance, the discharge is to be granted by the Judge, only "on being satisfied" with the oath. These words imply the power of judgment where the sequestration comes directly before the Lord Ordinary; and I hold the direction as to confirmation, where the order has in the first instance been pronounced in the Sheriff-court, to imply that he is to act, not ministerially, but judicially.

Three views have been taken of the meaning of this section—1. That the Lord Ordinary is, in this matter, to be regarded as a mere machine, with no power to judge, or do anything but confirm; but if the only object were, that an extract might be sent to the Bill-Chamber, why was it not provided that the extract should be recorded at once, without the interference of the Lord Ordinary at all? That view will not do, and is rejected by both the Lords Ordinary before whom the case went; and they seem to take the 2d view, namely, that the creditors may appear, but only state objections raised upon the declaration. This narrows the right to object, in a manner for which I find no warrant in the statute, if there be a right to appear at all. The 3d view was, that notice of the application to the Sheriff having been given, and twenty-one days allowed to elapse before anything was done, and no objector having appeared, the Sheriff regularly pronounced the deliverances of the 10th October. Now, I very much doubt the regularity of the proceedings here. Assuming the first finding to be correct, what follows is clearly calculated to defeat the object of the statute, which was to have every bankrupt examined as to his conduct, instead of which, we have the two partners brought together before the Sheriff; and then they "severally declare," &c. This is a very loose mode of

No. 40. procedure; and I concur farther in Lord Wood's opinion, which he has sent to me that it was quite irregular on the same day with the first finding to take the ——— declaration and pronounce the discharge. Yet, founding on such procedure, the
Dec. 12, 1856. bankrupts say, you took no appeal from the interlocutors of 9th October, as you
Taylor v. might have done, in twenty-one days, which made them final, as if in a deliverance Crow. regarding a claim of a creditor. I consider this view as ill-founded as the other two. This section is not to be construed by itself, but in connection with the whole group relating to this one matter of the discharge; and when so regarded
 I hold it clear that creditors are entitled to appear and oppose the confirmation.
 Consider what is to be done; the extract is sent, not at once to be recorded, but to the Lord Ordinary, to be confirmed. How is it possible that it should be competent for a bankrupt to make a motion in process, which they who instituted it shall not have a title to appear in? These bankrupts have declared that they have made a full surrender. Now, no doubt, no appearance is made for the objector at first, but one of the creditors finds out that there has not been a full surrender—or that a succession has opened without their knowledge, and that the bankrupt wants to get rid of all his obligations, and get quit of the debts which they have constituted, without handing them over this succession. That he should be entitled to do this without the creditor having a right to appear, would lead to monstrous injustice.
 I hold that, equally upon the merits as upon the sufficiency of the declaration, they are entitled to ask for the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, just as if these objections had been stated before the Sheriff. Therefore, I am for sustaining the right of Mr Crow to appear.

A totally different question would have had to be considered if these matters had been brought before the Sheriff, and decided by him, and no appeal taken.
 I say nothing as to whether, then, he could have followed the matter before the Lord Ordinary. That is not the case here.

LORD MURRAY.—I agree as to the principles on which the proceedings as to discharge are to be dealt with. This case has not yet received the final decision of the Lord Ordinary, and till it has, farther inquiry is not excluded. The party seeking his discharge is asking a great favour; and if he is to go out of the sequestration with clean hands, he cannot suffer by the inquiry. Any other view would often lead to great injustice.

LORD COWAN.—This question would have been very important indeed, but for the passing of the recent statute, under which the whole procedure in such a case must hereafter be before the Sheriff, without the intervention of this Court. And were not our decision thus to be of very limited application, I should have pressed your Lordships, before disposing of the case, to consult our brethren of the other Division, so that the point might be definitively settled; for after repeated consideration of the argument, I regret to be compelled to differ very strongly from the views which your Lordships have expressed.

The case depends upon the construction of sections 122 & 123 of the Bankruptcy Act, 2 & 3 Vict., which refer to the discharge of the bankrupt without composition; and is of the greater importance, because the same principle of construction must be applied to the similar terms contained in sections 116 & 134, which relate to his discharge on composition-contract, and to the discharge of the trustee.

Since 54 Geo. III. c. 137, and the earlier Acts, a great alteration has been introduced into the law on the subject of sequestration. Formerly, the process was competent only in this Court, but by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41 sec. 27, it was enacted that while sequestration could be applied for only in the Court of Session, the process should be remitted to the Sheriff, who is to exercise the whole "powers and jurisdiction" previously exercised by this Court (except where special provision made to the contrary), but that only "subject to review"—which review is provided for in section 128, whereby, within 21 days, any decision of the Sheriff may be brought in the way pointed out directly to the Inner House. Failing that review being applied for, the decision is declared to be final; and the discharge of the bankrupt I take to be exactly on the same footing as any other proceeding in the sequestration within the competency of the Sheriff.

What, then, are the provisions of section 122? The bankrupt may petition the Lord Ordinary for his discharge when the proceedings are in this Court, or the Sheriff when they are in the inferior court. Intimation is to be made in the Gazette, and if, after 21 days have elapsed, there be no opposition, it is provided that a deliverance shall be pronounced, finding the bankrupt entitled to his discharge. These provisions are somewhat altered by the 16th section of the Supplementary Act of 1853, but not in any respect essentially to affect the case to be now disposed of, farther than that it is made imperative on the bankrupt, before he applies for his discharge, to have a report from the trustee as to his conduct, and specially as to whether he has made a fair discovery and surrender of his estate. Now, the bankrupt applied for his discharge to the Sheriff on 7th August 1856. Of this, notice was given in the Gazette. No appearance was made for any opposing creditor; and on 9th October, long after the lapse of the period of 21 days, he renews his application, and the Sheriff takes the matter up, not under the bankrupt's application alone, but along with the necessary consents by creditors, and also with the aid afforded by the trustee's report. Then the Sheriff, seeing a majority of the creditors consenting, and the trustee's report favourable, and no one opposing, pronounced an interlocutor, finding the bankrupt entitled to his discharge. That deliverance by the Sheriff was strictly within his powers and competency. Any opposing creditor was fully entitled to have brought it up for review within twenty-one days, but if not brought under review, then that deliverance, the statute says expressly, shall be final. Here no appeal was taken within twenty-one days.

The procedure subsequent to the deliverance now mentioned, is regulated by section 123; and with deference, I apprehend, a very limited jurisdiction is there conferred upon the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be. The only question to be entertained by either is, whether the oath or declaration of the bankrupt be satisfactory. If it is, he "shall" then discharge him. This is expressly provided: but if the deliverance discharging be pronounced by the Sheriff, then an "extract" is to be sent up to the Bill-chamber clerks, to be by them forthwith presented to the Lord Ordinary, "who shall confirm the same by a deliverance," an entry whereof is to be made in the Register of Sequestrations. My understanding of this last part of the statutory procedure is, that as every sequestration required to commence by presentation of the original petition in this Court, the process, even after the remit to the Sheriff of the bounds, when that has been made, still remains a depending process in the Court of Session and Bill-Chamber, so that it is proper and necessary, in point of form, that the Lord Ordinary interpose his authority, to the effect that the decree may appear in the Register of Sequestrations kept in this Court. That is the view which I think has been generally taken. There is a decision in which so far sanctions it. The case regarded a discharge on a composition—under section 116—Stephen, 19th November 1853.¹ All the steps taken had been quite regular; but the application to the Lord Ordinary for confirmation had not been made "forthwith," the party having hung back for seven years, and meanwhile he and his cautioners failed to pay the composition. The question was, whether the Lord Ordinary was not bound to confirm, even in these strong circumstances; but the Court held he was not, as the terms of the statute had not been complied with. It was not said that the Lord Ordinary had the power here contended for, which would have at once removed all difficulty. It was, on the contrary, plainly because he was held to possess no such power, where the statutory forms were observed, that the case was considered to be difficult. Accordingly, it was decided solely on the ground of the mora in the procedure,—a ground of decision which does not exist here, for every step has been timeously taken. The case of *Samson*² does not affect this one,—it came to this Court by direct appeal within twenty-one days.

Assuming, therefore, that the case has been duly brought before the Lord Ordinary in terms of section 123,—I am of opinion that objections now taken for the first time on the ground that there has not been a due surrender by the bankrupt, or on any other ground affecting his right to his discharge, come too late, and that neither the Lord Ordinary nor this Court has jurisdiction to receive them. I cannot but think that the opposite view,—adverse as I hold it to be to the express provisions of the statute relative to the discharge, whether of the bankrupt or of the trustee,—may be attended with the very serious consequence of intending objectors refraining from opposition at the proper time, and only making appearance at the very last stage. I cannot regard this to be competent, and yet it is the necessary result. The procedure here, however, has been somewhat premature and the opinion which your Lordship has read from Lord Wood, goes partly on that ground. The Sheriff, without allowing twenty-one days to intervene, on the same day on which he found the bankrupt entitled to his discharge and ordained him to emit his declaration,—proceeded to take the same; and then, having considered the declaration, he granted the discharge, and pronounced his last interlocutor. Both deliverances are dated 9th October 1856. I think it would have been better if the emitting of the declaration and the pronouncing of the second interlocutor had been delayed until the first had become final. But the statute does not prescribe this. Hence, if every thing else be regular, and no appeal entered within the twenty-one days, it does not appear to me that there is any solid ground for holding the finality of the leading interlocutor affected by what was done. In Samson's case, although the discharge by the Sheriff had been confirmed it was set aside, because, within twenty-one days after the first interlocutor finding him entitled to it, an appeal had been taken to the Inner-House, in terms of the statute, and the interlocutor under that appeal recalled. There is no occasion to deal with this case on any such footing, for no appeal whatever against the deliverance of the Sheriff has been taken. The only point raised regards the competency of the Lord Ordinary, when required to confirm the discharge granted by an interlocutor admittedly final, entertaining objections that go to open up the whole question as to the bankrupt's right to his discharge at all. This seems to me not within his statutory competency.

I have had difficulty in forming an opinion in this case, and have at different times taken a different view of it.

No appearance to oppose the application for discharge was made before the Sheriff, and a deliverance was pronounced on the 9th October 1856, finding the bankrupt entitled to a discharge. On the same day, the declaration required by the statute as an essential antecedent to the bankrupt's being discharged—that he had complied with the provisions of the statute, was taken; and being satisfactory to the Sheriff—as it could hardly fail to be—the discharge was then also granted of the same date. This I think was irregular, seeing that any creditor—whether he had previously appeared or not—had a right, within twenty-one days from the first of these interlocutors, to appeal against it. This right was recognised in the case of Samson, where the appeal was not taken till after the interlocutor of the Sheriff granting the discharge had been confirmed by the Lord Ordinary, the Court having to disregard the later procedure, in order to secure the creditor's right to have the appeal heard and disposed of.

But although the procedure was irregular, the fact here is—that there was no appeal within twenty-one days from the first interlocutor of the 9th October,—that it was not till after their expiry, when that interlocutor had become final, that the interlocutor of the same date granting the discharge was acted upon, by a confirmation of it by the Lord Ordinary (before whom it had been laid, as provided by the Act) being moved for in the Bill-Chamber, which was necessary to give effect—and that it was only at that stage of the proceedings that the objector appeared to oppose the confirmation.

In this state of matters, with a final interlocutor finding the bankrupt entitled to his discharge, and having regard to the provisions of the 122d and 123d sections of the 2d and 3d Vict. c. 41, and the 16th section of the 16th and 17th Vict. c. 53, required to be observed, in order to secure against a discharge being obtained where the bankrupt has not so conducted himself as to be entitled to it,—and to the provisions in the 128th and 129th sections of the first of these Acts for review of deliverances by the Sheriff or Lord Ordinary, as the case may be, I confess that my first impression was, that the time for opposing the discharge in the form of a simple compearance was past, even although founded, as it is, upon the ground that the bankrupt had not made a fair discovery and surrender of his estate. But upon farther consideration I have come to doubt the soundness of that view, when applied, not to objections of a mere formal nature—which I am clear could not be entertained—but to objections on the merits, of such a description as the one we have here to deal with.

By the interlocutor finding the bankrupt entitled to a discharge, his right to discharge is not absolutely decided. Whether or not he has complied with those provisions of the statute, his compliance with which may be called the fundamental requisites to his obtaining a discharge, is still open for inquiry. Where, indeed, the particular failure in compliance has been made the subject of litigated inquiry before the Sheriff, and disposed of by the interlocutor finding the bankrupt entitled to a discharge, it may be, that if not taken to review by appeal, the creditor would be concluded upon it. But otherwise, I do not think that the objection is strictly matter of review; or that, although it might be brought forward in that way, the taking an appeal is necessary to its being competently proponed. On the contrary, assuming the particular objection—as, for instance, the one here in question—not to have been previously litigated and decided, and that the proceedings in the Sheriff-court were regularly conducted, instead of being all carried through on the same day, I think it might be competently stated, as long as the process was before the Sheriff—that is, till an interlocutor discharging the bankrupt had been pronounced. In that case, I cannot hold the interlocutor finding the bankrupt entitled to his discharge as amounting to more than a finding to that effect for any thing yet seen;—or that in the course of the farther procedure its finality precludes all inquiry, except by the declaration or oath of the bankrupt. It would, I think, be a singular consequence to attach to it, that while the discharge was not yet granted by the Sheriff, a creditor should thereby be barred from coming forward and offering, and being allowed positively to prove, that the bankrupt had not complied with one of those provisions, his compliance with which is made essential to his obtaining a discharge,—that however conclusive might be the evidence he possessed to establish his objection, it must be excluded, and no inquiry allowed, except by the declaration or oath of the bankrupt:—And this although the objection may be, as here it is, the most important as affecting the patrimonial interests of the creditor, and resting on a fact which it is always to be presumed has only not been sooner brought forward, because till then the creditor was ignorant of it, and therefore had not at an earlier date appeared to oppose the discharge.

Take the case, that the proceedings had been before the Lord Ordinary, and that an interlocutor by his Lordship finding the bankrupt entitled to a discharge had become final, could it be maintained that, the proceedings being resumed after the lapse of the reclaiming days, it would have been incompetent for a creditor to appear and object to the discharge being granted, on the ground that the bankrupt had concealed his funds—and that, in the face of an offer to prove that fact, the Lord Ordinary must have gone on to grant the discharge, if nothing unsatisfactory was elicited by his declaration or oath? I cannot adopt that view.

It is, however, no doubt true, that no objection was stated in the Sheriff-court—any opportunity of doing so, had the objector been then prepared to appear, having been precluded by the precipitate course of procedure which was adopted)—and that before the objector's compearance, the twenty-one days for review by appeal had expired, and the case had been removed from the Sheriff, by the deliverance discharging the bankrupt, or an extract of it having, in terms of the statute, been laid before the Lord Ordinary, in order to obtain his confirmation. But it does not appear to me that this farther step in advance towards the completion of the proceedings necessary to the bankrupt being effectually discharged, can operate as a bar to the admission of the objection in question. Although for certain purposes submitted to the Sheriff, it is by the 27th section of the statute declared that the process still to be held is to be in the Bill-Chamber of the Court of Session, and when, in terms of the Act, the deliverance of the Sheriff was brought up before the Lord Ordinary, the proceedings came properly to be in dependence before him:—and I apprehend that it would have required very strong words indeed to warrant the conclusion that he had no jurisdiction to deal judicially with the matter of the bankrupts' discharge, but was bound to go on blindfold, as it were, to confirm the discharge as granted by the Sheriff, let the objection to it be what it might. But I find no such words in the Act.

If the finality of the interlocutor finding the bankrupt entitled to a discharge should not have rendered the present objection incompetent in the course of subsequent proceedings before the Sheriff, or in those before the Lord Ordinary, had the application for a discharge been originally presented to him, (which, as I have stated, I am of opinion that it would not), I do not see how that finality, or the interlocutor discharging the bankrupt, shall be held to produce that result, when

No. 40. the objection is brought forward before the Lord Ordinary on his being moved to confirm the discharge. Neither Lord Neaves nor Lord Mackenzie have adopted the view that the duty of the Lord Ordinary is merely ministerial. To a certain extent they hold that he may deal judicially with objections to the confirming discharge. But, with great deference, I am unable to discover ground for stopping there, and holding that inquiry is limited to a consideration of the sufficiency of the bankrupt's declaration or oath as to his compliance with the provisions of the statute to which I have referred, and that the Lord Ordinary must shut his eyes to all statements, however pregnant, and all offers of proof, however specifically made, that one of these provisions—for instance, the discovery and surrender of the bankrupt's estate—has not been complied with. That, I think, would be a very dangerous view to adopt, and which might be productive of the greatest injustice, and that too, when the continued dependence of the proceedings still afforded the means of preventing it; for, as I have already observed, I cannot consider the ground of objection now insisted in as being of a character which rendered it admissible on a review by process of review against the interlocutors of the Sheriff. I think, on the contrary, that the objection is of that fundamental nature, which makes it, as it were, travel along with and accompany the proceedings throughout their whole course, that as between the bankrupt and his creditors—looking to their relative positions and the respective interests and rights of each under a sequestration,—a creditor has a right to insist in it must, in justice, continue alive, and open to be acted upon, as long as the proceedings are in Court;—that this is a legitimate, inherent condition attaching to the bankrupt's claim to the statutory privilege and indulgence of discharge, from which it can at no stage of the proceedings be relieved;—and that there is nothing in the provisions of the statute, according to a fair reading of them, to exclude its receiving effect.

I am therefore of opinion that, if duly qualified in point of statement, and there is no room for concluding that there has been any wilful delay in bringing forward, the objection here insisted in was competent before the Lord Ordinary when moved to confirm the bankrupt's discharge.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that the objector, John Crow, is entitled to appear to oppose the motion for the confirmation of the bankrupt for the confirmation of his discharge, and to insist on his objections to the discharge being completed,—Reserving all questions of expenses."

THE WESTERN BANK OF SCOTLAND, Defenders.—D. F. Inglis—Blackburn.

Transaction—Pledge—Retention—Right in security.—A bank having discounted certain bills of large amount, received as collateral security a delivery order, in virtue of which certain specified goods in a bonded warehouse were transferred to the name of the manager in the books of the warehouse-keeper. The bills were duly retired, but previous to their being so, the bank made a large advance to the owners of the goods;—Held (altering judgment of Lord Handyside), that the transaction did not constitute a contract of pledge by which the bank were bound to retransfer the goods on the bills being retired, but that it was a mere transference of proprietary right, under which the bank were entitled to retain the goods until all advances made to the owners were repaid.

Dec. 13, 1856. In December 1853, Miller and Company, merchants in Glasgow, applied to the defender Taylor, as manager of the Western Bank, to discount a bill drawn by them upon and accepted by A. S. Sichel of Manchester. The bill was dated 28th December 1853, payable at four months, and it consequently fell due on 1st May 1854. In March 1854 the defender, having previously discounted the bill, required security for the advance, and on 16th March 1854, Miller and Company addressed the following letter to Mr Taylor:—"Enclosed we hand you transfer and delivery order for 30 cases brandy now lying in Messrs James M'Lean and Company's bonded warehouse."

stores, the same to be held by you as collateral security, until retirement of our draft on A. S. Sichel, Esq., maturing 1st May next, for L.630, 10s. sterling." No. 41.

Dec. 13, 1856.
Hamilton v.

In art. 3 of his condescendence, the pursuer stated "that the brandy was transferred by the warehouseman to the defender, in terms of the said delivery order." The delivery order was as follows:—

"Glasgow, 16th March 1854.—Deliver to John Taylor, Esq., manager, Western Bank, the undernoted 300 cases ex 'Euphemia Fullarton,' charging us rent from date of storage.—Marks, J. M., Nos. H. 251 @ 550.—RICH^d. MILLER AND COMPANY. To James M'Lean and Company, 65 Jamaica Street."

When the bill of L.630, 10s. fell due, Miller and Company arranged with the bank for a renewal to the extent of L.500, dated 28th April, and payable at four months, being 31st August 1854. On 9th May 1854, Miller and Company wrote the following letter to the defender:—"Referring to our letter of 16th March last, and in consideration of our draft on A. S. Sichel, Esquire, for L.630, 10s. which matured on 1st instant, having been renewed to extent of L.500, and said renewal having been discounted by you on 28th ultimo, we authorise you still to hold 300 cases brandy transferred to your order 16th March last, as collateral security until Mr Sichel's next acceptance to us matures and is retired."

Mr Sichel's acceptance was duly retired on 31st August, but the defender continued to hold the brandy. On 9th September 1854, Miller and Company became bankrupt, and the pursuer, Dundas Hamilton, was appointed trustee on their estate. He applied to the defender for delivery of the brandy, but was refused, for the following reasons embodied in art. 7 of his condescendence:—"On or about the 21st July 1854, the bankrupts applied to the defender for further accommodation to the extent of L.400. The defender having good reason to believe in the solvency of Mr A. S. Sichel, the acceptor of the foresaid draft for L.500, which would mature on the 31st August immediately following, consented to allow the accommodation required, on the distinct verbal condition and agreement, that the brandy in question was thenceforth held by the defender in security of this additional advance, as well as of the L.500 draft aforesaid."

This action was accordingly raised by the pursuer, concluding for delivery of the brandy, and for L.200 of damages in consequence of its wrongful and illegal detention; or, in the event of the defender having wrongfully disposed of the brandy, then for L.1000 of damages.

He pleaded;—1. The brandy in question having been transferred to the bank as a collateral security for the due payment of the bill for L.630, 10s. and the renewal for L.500, and these bills having been duly paid and retired, the bank have no right to retain the brandy, but are bound to deliver and retransfer the same to the pursuer. 2. The bank having wrongfully withheld delivery, are liable for the loss and damage which has thereby been sustained, or may yet be sustained, by the pursuer as trustee foresaid. 3. In the event of its appearing that the bank have disposed of the brandy, and cannot deliver the same, they are liable in damages, in terms of the alternative conclusions of the libel.

The defender pleaded;—1. That being in possession of the brandy, and that under a transfer ex facie absolute, it rested with the pursuer to prove that his possession was of a more limited nature, and what was the nature thereof. 2. The brandy in question having been transferred and delivered to the defender absolutely and unconditionally, and in security of advances made by the defender to the bankrupt from time to time, the defender was entitled to deal with the same as his absolute property until the advances were fully repaid. 3. The brandy having been specially pledged in security

No. 41. of the advance of L.400, which had not been repaid, might be properly retained and dealt with by the defender, so as to effectuate payment of the advance.

Hamilton v.
Western Bank
of Scotland.

The case was reported by the Lord Ordinary on the adjustment of issues, on 22d January 1856. It then appeared to the Court that if the defenders' averment in art. 7 were established, it would be conclusive of the whole case. A remit was therefore made to the Lord Ordinary, who allowed a proof to both parties. The defender deponed to the facts as given above, and with reference to the advance of L.400 on 21st July, deponed: "I made the advance of L.400, so asked by Miller, relying on these grounds stated by him. In particular, I relied specifically on the security of the brandy which had been originally transferred to me, and, in fact, I would not have made the advance but for this: Depones, Miller and Company never made any demand on me for re-delivery of the said last-mentioned brandy: Interrogated, Did you consent to allow the advance of the said L.400, on the distinct verbal condition and agreement that the brandy in question was thenceforth held by you in security of this additional advance as well as of the L.500 renewal before mentioned? Depones, I allowed it only on the distinct verbal understanding that the brandy in question should be so held."

On the other hand, Mr Miller deponed as follows:—"I am perfectly positive that there was no agreement entered into between me and Mr Taylor on the said 21st July in relation to the said 300 cases of brandy: There was no reference made to it at all at that time: Depones, I saw my partner immediately on returning from the bank to my counting-house on said 21st July 1854, and I then communicated to him the terms on which I had got the advance from the bank. The terms which I mentioned to him were the same terms on which I have above deponed the advance was made. Depones, there was no understanding at any time between the bank and myself or my firm, that the 300 cases of brandy were to be held in security for the said advance of L.400."

The Lord Ordinary, on 7th June 1856, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender has not proved the agreement specified and averred in article 7 of his statement of facts: Orders the cause to the roll."*

The defender reclaimed. In July 1856 the case was again remitted to the Lord Ordinary, who pronounced an interlocutor on 18th July, allowing the defender to lodge the following additional pleas:—4. The brandy in question having been transferred and delivered by the bankrupts to the defender under a real contract of pledge, he is entitled to retain the possession so acquired until all advances made by him to the bankrupts, subsequent to his attaining such possession, at least all such advances made on the faith of such possession, and especially the L.400, mentioned in statement 7 of his defences, are repaid. 5. The said brandy having been transferred to

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary is unable to come to any other conclusion than that the defender has failed to establish his averment. Assuming the adequacy of point of law of Mr Taylor's evidence to establish the verbal condition and agreement alleged, had it stood uncontradicted by conjunct probation on the part of the pursuer, the evidence of Mr Miller, the bankrupt, negatives the account given by Mr Taylor of what passed between them, and, unless Mr Miller is to be wholly discredited, the result is an unfortunate opposition in the testimony given by the only two parties to the transaction. The Lord Ordinary sees no sufficient ground for discrediting Mr Miller, though there are discrepancies between him and his partner, Mr Cowper, on collateral points. But that gentleman gives corroborative support to Mr Miller, by stating that he had no knowledge, as a partner, of the alleged pledge of the cases of brandy for the over-draft. There is no corroborative circumstance to aid the evidence of Mr Taylor."

the defender by conveyance ex facie absolute, and possession attained and held under such conveyance, he is entitled to retain possession thereof until all the advances made by him subsequent to said conveyance and possession are repaid. No. 41.
Dec. 13, 1856.
Hamilton v.
Western Bank
of Scotland.

On 4th November 1856 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender has not proved the agreement specified and averred in article seventh of his statement of facts: Repels the whole pleas in law for the defender, the additional pleas in law allowed to be given in by the interlocutor of 18th July last, as well as his original pleas upon record: Finds that the defender was bound to transfer or deliver over to the pursuer the cases of brandy specified in the summons, and that the detention of them from the pursuer was wrongful and illegal; and in order that, if necessary, a specific decerniture may be pronounced under the alternative conclusions of the summons, orders the cause to be roll for that purpose: Finds the defender liable in expenses to the pursuer," &c.*

* "NOTE.—When this question was formerly before the Lord Ordinary, the only question raised by counsel for judgment was upon the proof led, and upon that the cause was taken to avizandum. The interlocutor which followed expressed the opinion of the Lord Ordinary on the proof, which he does not go back upon, and it was not the subject, and properly, of any further argument; and the interlocutor is therefore repeated. If an opposite view shall be taken of the proof, the contention between the parties is at an end. Should the finding of the interlocutor be affirmed, then only the point now to be adverted to is presented for consideration. This point not having been the subject of specific pleas on the record, the Lord Ordinary thought it fitting that additional pleas should be lodged. Referring to the note to the former interlocutor for explanation of the view which the Lord Ordinary took of the proof, he has now to state the grounds of his judgment on the point last debated.

"Assuming, as must be done, that his finding on the proof is equivalent to a verdict on the matter put in issue, the question is now, Whether, under the real contract of pledge, the pledgee is entitled to retain in security of advances subsequently made beyond, and independent of, the original consideration for the pledge, and that against the creditors of the pledger? The question is interesting, because it at once suggests a reference to the Roman law; and it is important, as it cannot be said to have been the subject of decision, or apparently of consideration, by authorities in our own law, with the exception of Professor Bell.

"By the earlier Roman law, it would seem that the extent of the creditor's right over the pledge was limited to securing the debt for which it had been given. The Pandects contain no law recognising a further security. But by a law of the Emperor Gordian, book viii., tit. 27, of the code, it was decided that an action for the restitution of the pledge might be met by the Exceptio doli mali—'Jure enim pecunia tibi a debitore reddatur vel offeratur quæ sine pignore debetur.' And the reason assigned is, 'nisi ea contendis debitores, eam solam pecuniam cujus nomine ea pignora obligaverunt, offerentes audiri non oportere, nisi pro illa etiam satisfecerint quam mutuam simpliciter acceperunt.' This law is referred to by Pothier in his digest of the Pandects, book xiii., tit. 7, in treating 'De actione pignoratitia directa,' and by Voet, in his commentary on the Pandects, under the same title. In his Traité du contrat de Nantissement, Pothier states that this law had been adopted in French jurisprudence, and makes some observations on the principle of it, and the circumstances under which it could be applied. He distinguishes as to the power of retention of the pledge for another debt than that for which it had been originally pledged, according as it might be certain, and liquid, or otherwise, holding that it could only be exercised in the former case, giving as a reason, that where the debt is certain, and liquid, the creditor may obtain authority to seize the goods of the debtor in his own hands and those of third parties, and so he ought to be permitted to retain them attached in his own hands for such debt. By the modern law of France, under the Code Civile, section 2082, if a second debt be contracted subsequent to the pledge being made, and become payable before the term of payment of the original debt, the creditor is not bound to relinquish without payment of both, although there had been no stipulation to engage the pledge in payment of the second. See also Merlin—Répertoire, voce Gage. The Lord Ordinary is not aware how the law may stand in other countries following the civil law, but which have not adopted the Code Napoleon.

“The doctrine of the civil law upon this subject is undoubtedly entitled to the utmost consideration with us. It is rather remarkable that, until the publication of Mr Bell’s Principles, the particular question now raised should not have been adverted to specially by any of our authorities. Nor is there any case reported the circumstances of which appear to have admitted of a reference upon this particular point to the civil law. The case of Harriot v. Cunningham, May 21, 1791, Morr. 12,405, cited at the debate, involved a quite different point of law, and the circumstances excluded any other being raised. Mr Erskine treats very shortly of the contract of pledge; and all that can be said is, that his authority is negative by exclusion of the present point. But Lord Stair treats of pledge in different parts of his Institute very fully, and with particular reference to Roman law, yet there is nothing to be gathered which tends to lend his Lordship’s authority to retention of the pledge for other debts. Lord Bankton is also silent upon the subject; and to refer back to an earlier writer, Balfour (Practicks, p. 194,) treats of pledge under the title ‘anent things laid in wad,’ and that pretty fully, and on sound principles, but without going beyond the ordinary case of the pledge being specific.

“The views of Professor Bell may now be considered, and they deserve particular notice, not only from the deference due to so learned a Jurist, but from his attention having been directed almost to the very point at issue in this case. In his Commentaries, at more than one place, he discusses the contract of pledge both in its general character and as a real contract, and under the latter he connects with it his statement of the law of securities for debt under an absolute disposition with back bond. An important passage is, where, after stating that the contract may be parole or in writing, and that the real right of the creditors is completed by delivery and continued by possession, that possession of the subject is proof of the creditors’ right, for possession of moveables is in law held to infer property, unless in so far as the right is limited by evidence either written or parole, but that usually the terms of the contract of pledge are established by writing: He says,—‘If the precise limits of the security and special appropriation to a particular debt are not established by the clearest evidence, the pledge will continue as an effectual security for all the debt due by the person who pledges on the principle explained already.’ The reference made is to the principle of the right of retention for further advances, where the creditor has an absolute disposition to lands qualified by a back bond, declaring it to be in security of a specific debt. The cases cited are Brough’s Creditors v. Jolly, and others applying the same doctrine to the absolute conveyance of a ship, or of a moveable bond.

“Now, as a good deal of argument was founded on this passage, it may be remarked that the application of the principle of the decision in the case of Brough’s Creditors to a proper contract of pledge requires circumspection, for a fallacy lurks in running an analogy between an absolute disposition of lands, or anything else, and the creditors’ right in the subject of the real contract of pledge. In it the property of the subject remains in the pledger, the possession only being in the pledgee—a doctrine acknowledged on all hands. But where an absolute disposition is granted, the property passes to the disponent, and all that the debtor obtains by his back bond is the personal obligation undertaken by it; and so before he can enforce that personal obligation, it is reasonable that he should discharge all his own personal obligations incurred to the granter of the bond though of a subsequent date. But indeed the passage quoted does not go so far as has been supposed, for the terms of it being carefully attended to, and taken with the context preceding, it assumes the want of evidence in writing or by parole that the property was held in special pledge, and if so, then the possession of the holder of the moveables inferring by law property in them, the analogy of the absolute disposition, and its effects, become apparent and decisive. Nay, under the case of Harriot v. Cun- ningham, referred to by Mr Bell at this place, the want of evidence of the nature of the pledge being special and limited, might give the creditors the right of holding it as a general pledge.

Hamilton v.
Western Bank
of Scotland.

“ In his Principles, however, Mr Bell adverts more directly to the subject. The heading of section 1367 is,—‘ Tacit Extension of Pledge.’ He observes,—‘ It is an important question, whether a pledge is maintainable against third parties for more than the original advance where additional advances have been made to the creditor ;’ and stating, as the first case, that when an absolute conveyance is made, though only intended as a security, and a new loan takes place during its subsistence, the restitution is not demandable without payment of the whole debts, adding, that this is a peculiarity applicable to heritable securities by absolute disposition with an unrecorded back bond ; and after giving as other instances the mortgage of a ship under the old law, and an absolute assignation of a moveable debt, he says,—‘ All these cases proceed on the ground of a right ostensibly universal and absolute, requiring to be resolved, not being mere securities ex facie.’ Next, he adverts as to the second case, as follows :—‘ 2. Where a jewel or other moveable has been given in pledge without limitation of the security, it may seem, that on the principle which regulated the above cases (Brough and Others), the universal right presumed from possession will effectually cover further advances, which cannot be supposed to be made but on that footing. But if there be proof to limit the pledge to a specific advance made at the time of its constitution, there does not appear to be any ground on which, as against purchasers or creditors, the original security by pledge can be held as extended.’ Without analysing these sentences to point out the carefully qualified terms in which Mr Bell lays down the law as viewed by him, the Lord Ordinary will just say, that he apprehends that they exclude any recognition in the law of Scotland of the rights of the creditor under a pledge originally specific as to its subject, to have it extended, so as to entitle him to retention in security of subsequent advances. It will be noticed that Mr Bell refers to the interests of purchasers or creditors, which is really the important and testing point ; for, as to the question, if arising between the pledger and the pledgee, it need not be considered.

“ Now, in the present case, the acknowledged facts are, and that proved scripto, that the pledge was originally specific, and that the goods were delivered over and received, to be held in security of a particular draft. It is pleaded, indeed, that the delivery-order, under which possession was obtained of the subject of pledge, is ex facie absolute in its terms ; but it is conceived that the letter accompanying it, and accepted and held by the creditor, made the pledge clearly specific. There was a pledge constituted, not a conveyance of property made. The subsequent extension of the pledge to other drafts, one under another letter received and retained by the creditor, and the other being averred by him, though he has failed to establish it under the proof, disentitles him, in the Lord Ordinary’s opinion, to read the delivery-order otherwise than as the instrument of giving that possession required to make the contract of pledge real.

“ In his illustrations, Mr Bell refers to some English cases, and both parties at the debate entered upon the law of England and of America upon the subject of pledge. The cases in England have occurred in the Courts of Equity ; for at common law, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that all pledges and pawns are specific. See Addison on Contracts, 4th Edit., p. 317. The case of Demembray, which is cited by Mr Bell, and commented on by him, will be found in Vernon’s Reports, vol. ii., p. 697. It was a decision of Lord Chancellor Harcourt, and is referred to in all the subsequent cases. Jones v. Smith, 2 Vesey, Jr., p. 372, decided by Lord Alvanley, and Adams v. Claxton, 6th Vesey, Jr., p. 225, decided by Sir William Grant, were also noticed at the debate. The Lord Ordinary will not enter into an examination of these cases, further than to observe, that he gathers from them, that, in regard to mortgages and pawns, a Court of Equity will not enforce redemption in a question with the party or his executors, except on payment of all that is due, but that if the interests of third parties or creditors arise, retention cannot be pleaded beyond the specific amount by the mortgagee or pawnee. Upon the law of America, Kent’s Commentaries, vol. ii., p. 583, were

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case now comes before us on the third reclaiming note. It has been varying and changing its aspect every time it has come before us. When we had to consider it on the record with proposed issues, it appeared to us that the defender's statement in article 7, as to a distinct condition and agreement in July 1854, if established in evidence, would be conclusive of the case, whether the original transaction was to be regarded as a proper pledge or a conveyance in security, or whatever else it might be. We accordingly allowed a proof, which was taken on commission, and has now been reported to us. I have no doubt upon that proof, that the defender has failed to establish his averment. Taylor's own statement, taken by itself, would not have established it. On the contrary, the import of that statement is merely that there was on his part an "understanding" that he was to retain the brandy in security of the advance. But he will not say that there was any "distinct verbal condition or agreement" to that effect, which was the averment he had put upon the record. The question was put to him in so many words, but he does not answer it. He avoids doing so, and only says there was an "understanding" to that effect. But the evidence on the other side is explicit that there was no such agreement. It is impossible, therefore, to hold that the defender's statement is established. That part of the case for the defender has failed.

But we now have to consider the case apart from that alleged separate arrangement, and to consider whether the transaction that was entered into at an earlier period, in reference to this brandy, viewed in connection with the evidence before us, does constitute a right on the part of the Bank to retain it in security of advances subsequently made to Miller and Company. That is the question. In considering it, we must look to the statements of the parties on the record, and to the documents produced. Both parties have renounced farther probation.

On looking to the record, I have found considerable difficulty in knowing on what averments the parties respectively rest. They vary at different parts of the record, and it rather appears to me that the case of the pursuer is to be found in the averments of the defender, and the strength of the case of the defender is to be found in the averments of the pursuer. Then, again, I have been perplexed by the pleas in law. The difficulties in the way of disposing of the case with reference to these pleas are considerable, for the case appears to have been pleaded by both parties on the footing that this was beyond all question a transaction or contract of pledge, in the proper and legal sense of that term. The issues proposed on the part of the pursuer as proper for the trial of the case, put it as a transaction of pledge; and the referred to, which notices the English cases, and adverting to the general question, Whether the pawnee could retain the pledge, independent of a special agreement, for any other debt than that for which the chattel was specifically given, states that the question had been extensively discussed in the Court of Massachussetts, and the weight of opinion was against retention of the pledge, which Chancellor Kent declares to have been his own opinion.

"The Lord Ordinary has thought it right to explain thus fully his views on the authorities bearing upon the novel question raised in the present case, and he has only to state in conclusion, that he has not been able to satisfy himself that he would be warranted in recognising, as a principle of the law of Scotland, the extension of a specific pledge into a general security for further advances."

issues proposed on the part of the defender also put it as a transaction of pledge. But the argument latterly submitted to us on the part of the defender disowned altogether any transaction of pledge, and put the case upon a different footing,—upon the footing of a transfer of property. It was contended that the transaction was to be so regarded, and that the defender had, ex facie, an absolute title and right to the property of this brandy, whatever the separate qualifications or conditions of that right may have been. Additional pleas were added by the defender when the case was last before the Lord Ordinary; one of these additional pleas still puts the case on the ground of pledge, but the other is more general, and is to this effect,—that the brandy having been transferred to the defender by conveyance ex facie absolute, and possession attained and held under such conveyance, he is entitled to retain possession thereof until all the advances made by him subsequent to said conveyance and possession are repaid. That was the plea to which the defender adhered in the conclusion of his recent argument. But the pursuer treated the case altogether as a case of pledge, and it appears to have been so argued before the Lord Ordinary by both parties, for his Lordship's judgment and his note both proceeded on that footing. But the question must be dealt with by us now on the aspect of the facts as we gather them from the record and the documents before us, and upon the argument submitted to us, which I think some of the pleas as now shaped are broad enough to embrace.

In the first place, it appears that this was a transaction whereby the brandy in question, being then in a bonded warehouse, was transferred from the name of the bankrupt into the name of the defender in consequence of a written order of delivery presented to the warehouse keeper, and followed by transference in his books. That is a fact upon which parties are not quite agreed; but I think it is sufficiently made out by the documents, that the goods being in a bonded warehouse belonging to the pursuer were transferred to the defender's name by authority of a delivery order, addressed to the keeper of the warehouse, and that they remained in the bonded warehouse standing there in the name of the defender as the person to whom they belonged. Taking the fact as I have now stated it, I think that this cannot be regarded as a transaction of pledge. It had reference, no doubt, to the advance of money. That appears from the letters that passed between the parties, and particularly from the letter that accompanied the delivery order. But the contract of pledge, properly so regarded, does not, and never did, exist in this case. There never was any custody by the defender of these goods. On the contrary, it is clear that they were never intended to be put into the defender's custody. Evidently it was not the intention of Miller and Company that the defender should present that delivery order, pay the duty, and carry off the goods,—and it is equally evident, that without paying the duty he could not carry off the goods. The intention plainly was, that the goods should remain in the bonded warehouse, and that an entry of the transfer of the property should be made in the warehouse books. That transaction does not, in my opinion, constitute a contract of pledge. If the goods were pledged at all, they were pledged only for the duties as before. They certainly were not pledged with the defender. They were not in his custody. By presenting the delivery order to the storekeepers, and getting the goods transferred to his own name in the books, the defender obtained what has been not unfrequently called constructive delivery. That is not actual delivery or custody—not even such actual delivery or custody as consists in giving over the key of the warehouse in which goods are. It is a thing introduced for the convenience of trade, and which is held to supply the place of actual delivery in reference to the transference of property so situated. But it is not a thing which has been recognised, by any authority I know, as coming in place of that custody, which is of the essence of the contract of pledge—the value of which consists in having the custody without the property of the goods. Nor is there in the dicta of our writers any encouragement to go farther in that direction. It would tend to complicate transactions and create confusion. For these reasons I cannot hold that the transaction in question constituted the contract of pledge. But although the defender did not get the goods pledged with him, still, if there is enough to constitute a transference of property, qualified, though it may be, by the writing and understanding of parties, it may give the defender a right to retain the goods for subsequent advances, which it is to be presumed he made on the faith of these goods. Looking to the whole aspect of the case, the facts to be gathered from this record, and the leaning of the authori-

No. 41. ties, I think this is to be regarded not as a transaction of pledge, but of transference of property. No doubt it may not have been the intention of parties that the property should permanently or ultimately remain with the defender. The same may be said in any case where there is an absolute conveyance qualified by a back bond, the intention of which is to give no more than a right in security, yet whereby an effectual right of property might be constituted. Such rights arise as between parties in a great number of cases, and I do not see why this case should be differently dealt with from them.

of Scotland.

The question is not whether there can here be any right in the defender higher than that which actual possession of the goods would have given him, but whether the facts result in a contract of a different kind from pledge, and, of course, giving different rights, and leading to different consequences. The transaction wants the essential character of pledge—viz. the custody of the goods; and it has this other attribute—viz. a transference of the property of the goods on a written title, ex facie absolute, though with the understanding and qualification, in a separate writing, that they may be got back. If that qualification had been engrossed on the order for delivery, I am not sure that the keeper of the warehouse would have been bound to recognise any transaction of that kind, and complicate his books with such a qualification. The object of that register is for the transference of property. But, at all events, that was not here attempted to be done. It stands a transference of property. It must be taken with its qualifications, but the defender is entitled to retain the goods in satisfaction of his subsequent advances on 21st July 1854.

LORD IVORY.—This is a case in some respects of much novelty and importance. As regards the special agreement averred in art. 7 of the defender's condescendence, I am clearly of opinion that the defender has failed in establishing it. So far, therefore, I adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. But as regards the rest of the interlocutor, I am for altering it. The Lord Ordinary has put the case entirely on the footing of the security having been a transaction of proper pledge. I am not surprised at that. The record in its original shape must have presented itself to the Lord Ordinary as a case of pledge and nothing else. Had it been a case of pledge, it certainly would have raised questions of such importance and novelty as to merit the elaborate discussion which the Lord Ordinary has bestowed upon it. I do not say what opinion I would have had in that case. It might, perhaps, lean strongly to the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, but I wish to be distinctly understood as not now pronouncing any opinion upon that aspect of the case, for it is not the ground on which the judgment is to rest, and it would be, therefore, better to reserve it till the point comes before us in proper shape. The defender ultimately rested his case on that last plea which brings out a question, not of pledge nor of security, but of absolute transfer of right from the debtor to the creditor. It is upon that shape of the case that I think it safest that our judgment should now rest.

In this class of questions, and others bearing analogy greater or smaller to them, there has been a good deal of confusion introduced into our practice from a loose and not correctly discriminating use of the phraseology and doctrines of English law. That is unfortunate, for in regard to the passing of property, no two laws can possess terms of more opposite significancy, or be founded on more conflicting principles. It is in this way that the expressions "lien" and "set off" have got introduced into some of our books,—superseding,—as if they were in their practical bearings equivalent, or nearly so, to—our old Scotch doctrines of compensation and retention. And, perhaps, this is not to be wondered at, considering the analogies that do exist between the two laws. But it is most dangerous, in matters of this sort, to be carried away by analogies and similarities. That the two laws are perfectly distinct, even in origin and in their principles in regard to this class of questions, has been most clearly demonstrated by Professor More in a very learned passage in his Commentaries on Lord Stair, with which I may say that I am very much inclined to agree. In England there is much of statute, in Scotland there is wholly common law. The law of "set off" is altogether the creature of statute. The bankrupt law, again, has introduced a principle of set off of mutual debits and credits, which has still more closely approximated the law of England to the broad principle of the common law of retention. But, when you are dealing with statutory law on the one hand, and the common law on the other, it is impossible not to see the danger of trusting to the analogy between our own law and that of the sister country.

No. 41.

Keeping this in view, there have, in our own law, arisen sometimes considerable difficulties as to the distinction between custody and possession. Questions may arise as to goods, which, in a certain sense, are in custody, if in the hands of a workman who gets them for the special purpose of performing operations upon them,—which being performed, the article has been changed in shape, and is, in its changed state, restored to the owner. The workman has the custody, but the possession is still in the proprietor. Again, a carrier has a limited custody, but not possession. A manufacturer has, perhaps, a higher right, but still he has not possession. He is merely the hand which holds the goods for a certain purpose, and his custody is the possession of the proprietor.

Dec. 13, 1856.
Hamilton v.
Western Bank
of Scotland.

The second shape in which possession comes into operation is in the case of proper pledge, where not only custody in that sense in which I have now been explaining exists, but a title of possession is given,—that which in England is said to confer a special property in the article itself. The party possesses the article by force of his own title to it. It is, no doubt, possession of a limited kind, but still of a broader kind than that which exists in cases where it has been distinguished by the name of custody.

Lastly,—and this case falls under it,—the question of possession arises where property is held by absolute title or right,—where the property passes into a new possession, and where the right of property is, no doubt, qualified, but where the qualification does not exist in absolute right. It operates extraneously to that right. It is a personal obligation. The party in possession is absolute proprietor, but under a personal obligation to divest himself, and reinvest the original proprietor of the goods.

Now, in applying the law to these different categories, one might anticipate that different principles would have to be applied, and different results arrived at, and such has been the case. Under which of these classes does the present case fall? Not under that of custody, not under that of proper pledge, but it falls under the class of proprietary right. As to its being a case of pledge, the situation in which the property stood in the bonded warehouse excludes it. The statutes in regard to bonded warehouses provide for the sale and transfer of property, over which rights are to be conferred. But they deal with nothing except the sale and transfer of goods. They do not speak of any security, nor do they give termini habiles in which it can be passed. They do not speak of pledge. It is transfer alone with which they deal; nor could it be otherwise, for the goods are liable to the duties for which they have been bonded. They cannot be removed until these are paid; and, therefore, there could be no actual delivery to the pledgee, without which proper pledge could not exist. In a transaction of this sort, it never was meant that the duties should be paid by the creditor. What he was to get was the right to the goods, subject to these duties. He is to get the possession by which the property of the original party is to be transferred to him; and the goods, therefore, cannot come into the active possession of the creditor, for they can only do so by his adding to the loan already given, by advancing the duties to which the subjects are liable under the bond.

It seems to me that that is a state of a matters where the question of property does not arise. What is given over is the absolute right in that jus, whatever it be, which the owner has over the goods in the warehouse, by which the transferee is to be substituted in his place, quoad the warehouse keeper, and quoad the right to the property in the goods. The party debtor ceases to be proprietor, and the party creditor comes in his stead to hold the jus domini. It is that which is given. Possession remains where it was. Therefore there can be no pledge of the goods themselves. There is a transfer of the right, but that is very different from delivery of the goods. The right cannot here be given to the creditor without divesting the debtor of all right he had in the goods, and transferring it to the creditor, and that is a different contract altogether from the contract of pledge. There might, possibly, be pledge of goods in a bonded warehouse. If delivery orders had passed from hand to hand, these might have been a pledge of so many writings. One can understand such a document as would interpose difficulties in the way of the original proprietor getting the goods out of bond. It might be a security of its own kind, and there might also be questions whether there might not be an assignment in security. But that, again, is different from the present case. If that

No. 41. which is in the hands of a third party be so assigned, then it is a security alone which the party gets, and the right of property is not altered, just as, in an assignation of a bond, if duly intimated, the assignee comes to have an absolute right to the security. It is by force of law, and not by the intention of parties, that the ultimate right of parties arises. The goods here are in a somewhat like predicament, as in the case of a debt meant to be made the means of security and credit. You cannot pledge the debt, but you may grant an absolute assignation of it. The party cannot get possession except by a change of circumstances, to which he is not bound to be a party. But the bond may be pledged, in virtue of which the debt may be claimed, and thereby an obstacle interposed to the creditor getting his money. There may be assignation in security—there may be transference by absolute title—but there are no termini habiles for pledge.

Dec. 13, 1856.
Hamilton v.
Western Bank
of Scotland.

In the present case the security is created by the delivery-note. It is absolute in its terms. It is intimated as an absolute transfer to the warehouse-keeper, and it is entered in the books as transferring the goods to the party; and, in short, if it had been a sale out and out, there would have been no difference in the use made of this delivery-order. The formal title being thus absolute, the legal right follows by force of law. The property has passed on absolute title, but on the other side there is a personal obligation to reinstate. This precisely comes within the category of cases with which we are familiar. It is the same as a disposition in security ex facie absolute, but with a back-bond apart; or an absolute intimated assignation of a bonded or other debt with back-titles; or an absolute vendition of a ship; or a trust constituted by absolute deed; or a seller's retention for a separate debt; or a cautioner's retention for a separate debt; or, in the case of a purchaser under mandate, of the purchaser's refusal to convey; or a wadsetter's right to apply rents; or a refusal to purge incumbrances. These are cases in every one of which decisions have been pronounced by this Court; and in one and all of them, the creditor's right of retention has been held to arise by force of law. It thus arises from the shape of the title, from its character as an absolute divestiture of the party granting it, and out of the very circumstance that the formal or legal title is absolute in him, with a mere personal obligation to apply it only in a particular way. It is just a right of retention under our common law, as applied to cases where compensation is shut out. It is compensation extended to the case of a bankrupt, or as Bell calls it, the settlement of accounts of a bankrupt. It gets quit of the ground of objection which applies in the case of compensation, if the debts are not of the same character as an obligation ad factum præstandum against a money claim, a present against a future claim, and many others. In one and all of these cases the law of retention has been held to apply, more especially where bankruptcy intervenes, for then there is by force of law given a wider right to the party, and he is entitled to all the remedies of retention, which applies alike to liquid and illiquid obligation.

But objections are raised, that this is against the good faith of the contract; and it may at once be conceded, that at first the intention of parties here was of a limited character. But so it was in all the cases to which I have referred, and never was held to be a good answer. The ruling principle is the absolute character of the title, and the intention to operate as against such a title. This leaves it open to presume an extension of purpose, where there is an extension of debt to the party having the absolute right. Therefore, I hold this to be in no sense a case of proper pledge. It is a question arising from a title giving an absolute right of property, where the debtor can only be reinstated by the act of the creditor, where he cannot call that act into existence, except by force of the personal obligation, and where he cannot insist upon that personal obligation, except by performing the obligations which he himself lies under to the creditor.

LORD CURRIEHILL. — The decision of this question depends upon the legal character of the right of the defenders to the brandy in question. If the right of property thereof was transferred to them, then, although the purpose for which that transfer was made to them originally was to secure the payment to them of a specific debt, yet, as the debtors parted with their right of property, their reversionary right was reduced to a mere personal claim, or jus crediti, entitling them to call upon the defenders either for restitution of the goods, upon the debt being paid aliunde, or to account for any balance of the price if the defenders should sell the goods in order to obtain payment of the debt. This is clearly the law of Scotland, as has been established by a train of decisions, and a long course of practice, in reference to securities granted by means of completed transfers ex facie absolute, and qualified only by separate personal obligations. Hamilton v.

Western Bank
of Scotland.

Another elementary principle in the law of Scotland is, that in such a case the holder of a security so constituted, when called upon to perform his personal obligation to restore to the original owner the subject of the security, or the balance thereof, on the specific debt in reference to which it was constituted being satisfied, is entitled to retain the same in security or satisfaction of any other debt which may then be owing to him by that original owner. That in the practice of Scotland the plea of retention operates in such a case, is triti juris. This right of retention is jus natura different from a right of lien; inasmuch as retention entitles a party who is the owner, or dominus of property, to withhold performance of some personal obligation to transfer his right of ownership to another, until the latter perform a counter obligation; whereas lien entitles a party who is in possession of what is another party's property, to continue to withhold it from its real owner, until the latter perform a counter obligation. And, on the other hand, the corresponding right to demand possession of the property, on the counter obligation being performed, is, in the former case, merely a personal right, or jus crediti; while, in the latter case, it is the real right of property.

The defenders maintain that they are in the predicament in which such right of retention is available to them. They state this plea, somewhat ambiguously, under the second head of their original note of pleas in law, and quite unambiguously under their fifth head in the additional note of pleas recently lodged by them.

In support of this plea they found upon an order, dated 16th March 1854, which was given to them by Miller and Company, the former owners of the brandy, directing James M'Lean and Company, the keepers of the bonded warehouse in which the goods were then deposited, to deliver the same to the manager of the defenders. The pursuer not only admits that this delivery-order was granted by Miller and Company, but farther sets forth, in explicit and unqualified terms, in the third article of his statement of facts, that the brandy "was transferred by the warehouseman to the defender in terms of the said delivery-order." And, were there nothing more in the case, it would be clear beyond question that the right of property of the goods was passed to the defenders by a completed transfer; and that any right thereto which may have remained in Miller and Company was nothing more than such a personal claim for restitution as I have referred to.

In the first place, it is another well established principle of our law, that, in cases of this kind, the effect of such a delivery-order, when it is intimated to the warehouseman, and a fortiori when (as is stated by the pursuer himself) the goods are actually transferred by the warehouseman to the grantee of such delivery order, is that the real right of property is transferred as effectually as if the goods had been actually delivered to him. The effect in law of such a proceeding is established to be not only to transfer from the granter to the grantee, the personal obligation of the warehouseman or depository to deliver up the goods, but also the real right of property or jus domini of the ipsa corpora of the goods.

And, in the next place, the delivery order, which in such a case is the written title of the transferee, was granted in terms ex facie absolute, and the delivery of it to the warehouseman put an end to all connection between him and Miller and Company, and thenceforth the defenders were the only parties for whom he held the goods.

But this was not all. Of the same date as that of the delivery-order, Miller and Company wrote to the manager of the defenders, stating that they enclosed the delivery order for the brandy, and that it was to be held as a security for a specific debt of L.630 in a bill therein mentioned. And, on 9th May 1854, they wrote to him that, as that bill had been renewed for L.500, they authorise him to hold the brandy which had been transferred to him on 16th March preceding, until this bill should be retired. And the pursuer maintains that the effect of these documents was to prevent the transfer of the goods, in the warehouseman's books, from operating a transfer of the right of property according to the rule of law above mentioned.

I am of opinion that this was not the case. The delivery order being ex facie in

No. 41. absolute terms, and the transfer in the warehousemen's books being confessedly in similar terms, the letters in question, even had they been back letters granted to the defenders to Miller and Company, would not have prevented the real right of property from passing to the defenders in terms of the delivery-order, so long as least as such back writings remained latent. In all the cases in which securities by transfers ex facie absolute have been found to pass the real right of property, there have been such separate latent back-letters delivered to the granters of the transfers; but their legal effect was held to be merely to create personal rights, as already mentioned.

Dec. 13, 1856.
Hamilton v.
Western Bank
of Scotland.

The pursuer has maintained that the right which the defenders obtained was in natura a right of pledge for the debt above mentioned; that that debt was paid; and that on the debt for which goods are pledged being satisfied, the creditor's right of pledge is extinguished, and he is not entitled to retain the subject of it for other debts. I do not find it necessary to inquire whether or not in our law the right of retention for a separate debt would operate in such a case; because, in my opinion, the effect of the transfer was to pass the right of property to the defender and not to create a right of pledge merely in their favour. There is no such limitation of the right in any of the written documents. In the record the pursuer does not allege that such was the nature of the right. On the contrary, he admits, and indeed expressly states in his own condescendence, that the brandy was transferred to the defender in terms of the delivery-order; and what he concludes for in the summons is, that the defender should now transfer or deliver the brandy to him.

That the right to the brandy created in favour of the defender was not a right of pledge, appears farther from this, that such a right could not have been completed without actual delivery of the goods to the creditor. Actual delivery is essential for that purpose. But the right which was transferred to the defender was of such a nature as admitted of being completed, and was actually completed, without actual delivery, by the warehouseman entering the transfer in his books, and indeed by the mere intimation thereof to him. Moreover, if the right had been merely a right of pledge, the defenders could not have sold the goods without judicial authority. But there can be no doubt that the right which was transferred to the defenders was such as would have enabled them to sell the goods without any such authority.

The reversionary right of Miller and Company to the brandy was thus only a personal claim, or jus crediti. But the defenders, while they were under this personal obligation, confessedly lent to Miller and Company the L.400 mentioned in the 9th article of their statement of facts. And as, in this state of matters, the latter became bankrupt, the former, in virtue of the rule of law already referred to, are entitled to retain their right to the brandy, and to operate payment of that debt out of the same.

On the ground I have stated, I think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, except in so far as it finds that the defenders have not proved the agreement alleged in the 7th article of their statement of facts, ought to be recalled; and that the defence of retention ought to be sustained.

LORD DEAS.—I am clearly of opinion, with all your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary, that the defender has failed to prove the verbal agreement set forth in his 7th statement of facts. Assuming this to be so, the Lord Ordinary says, in his note, "The question now is whether, under the real contract of pledge, the pledgee is entitled to retain, in security of advances subsequently made beyond and independent of the original consideration for the pledge, and that against the creditors of the pledger?"

I do not doubt that this was the question argued to the Lord Ordinary. It is the only question distinctly pointed at in the record and pleas in law as they originally stood. And, although a different question is covered by the last of the additional pleas, added after the remit from the Inner-House of 10th June 1856, that plea was not urged, even in the opening speech upon this reclaiming note, otherwise than as entitling the defender to a presumption that the pledge was general, unless the pursuer distinctly proved the contrary, the onus of which lay, it was said, upon him; and, in connection with this, it was farther said that a specific pledge was not a limited pledge; and so we had the Roman law, and the French law, and the English law, very ably gone over again; but still all in support of a case of pledge. Just as in the issue, alluded to by your Lordship, which the defender had proposed for the trial of the whole cause, although he insisted upon putting it so as to imply the necessity of a re-transference, he still put it as applicable exclusively to a case of pledge,—the words he proposed being, “Whether the defenders wrongfully failed to re-transfer and deliver to the pursuers 300 cases of brandy pledged by them in security of advances” to Miller and Company.

Hamilton v.
Western Bank
of Scotland.

Now I do not hesitate to say that, upon that shape of the argument, I should, as at present advised, have agreed with the Lord Ordinary. Assuming this to be a case of pledge, I think the pledge was specific, and thereby limited, first to one bill and then to another bill; and, if the brandy had been directly handed over to and placed in the cellars of the defender as a pledge, I should have held him bound to restore it on payment of the particular debt for which it had been so pledged.

Not only so, but had the object of the delivery-order been simply to enable the defender to go direct to the bonded warehouse and remove the brandy to his own cellars, and he had at once done so, I am not prepared to say that this would not have been a proper case of pledge,—perfected so soon as the defender had obtained the actual custody of the brandy.

But the species facti here are different. The pursuer himself distinctly states that the brandy had been stored by Miller and Company, and entered in their names in the books of Maclean and Company's bonded warehouse,—that it was transferred in these books to the name of the defender, “in terms of the said delivery-order,”—that nearly two months afterwards, when the L.500 bill was granted, a second letter was given to and accepted by the defender, bearing, “We authorise you still to hold the 300 cases brandy transferred to your order 16th March last,”—thus acknowledging the legality and propriety of the matter having been allowed to stand upon that transference,—and accordingly the summons, dated in January 1855, concludes that the defender should be ordained “to transfer or deliver over to the pursuer” the 300 cases of brandy, “now or lately lying in the bonded stores belonging to Messrs James Maclean and Company,” with an alternative conclusion, applicable to the case of such transference and delivery having become impracticable,—thus again shewing that to leave the brandy in the bonded warehouse in the name of the defender was the proper and legitimate result of the transaction. Now, in this state of matters, I am of opinion that, whatever else was done, no effectual pledge was constituted of the brandy, whether general or special. That the parties intended to pledge it, I have very little doubt; and, if a pledge could be constituted by constructive delivery, such as we have here, then I should say this brandy was pledged, and that the consequences deduced by the Lord Ordinary from that contract of pledge would follow. The constructive delivery, if it perfected the contract of pledge, could have no higher consequences than actual delivery would have had. But no authority has been quoted to us for constituting a pledge in this manner. I agree with Mr Campbell that pledge is limited to corporeal moveables which pass from hand to hand, and so is termed a real contract. But to constitute that contract, must not the thing actually pass from hand to hand, which it did not do here? Mr Campbell said, very adroitly, that he would concede to the defender that his case was the same as if Miller and Company had delivered the brandy into the defender's own cellars. But I fear that is a concession for which the defender would have no reason to be grateful. At all events, I should say that if the case were to be taken upon that footing, cadit questio. But it is not so. Actual delivery was neither given nor intended to be given, probably because it could not have been given without payment of the duty. The object was to use the brandy as a fund of credit where it lay, by transferring it into the defender's name; and this, as I have already said, did not, and could not constitute the contract of pledge.

The debateable question, if there be one, I think is, whether, having failed in creating a pledge, there was any good right or security created in favour of the defender at all? All the cases referred to of absolute conveyances of property, heritable or moveable, which, although intended to be special securities, have been held to cover the general balance, have been cases in which delivery, neither actual nor constructive, was necessary for their completion. Whereas here, constructive delivery was admittedly necessary, while actual delivery, if stipulated for and given, would, I think, have constituted the different and inferior right of pledge. The subject-matter of the right was a corporeal moveable, which, but for the peculiarity of its position, could only have been the subject of pledge; and it is this peculiarity of position which alone can render it, if at all, the subject of a different, and, to the creditor, necessarily a higher right. Nevertheless, I am satisfied that, although different from any case quoted, this peculiarity of position is enough to make way for a security in the form of an absolute transference of a corporeal moveable, which otherwise, while it remained in that position, could not have been made the subject of any security at all. I do not enquire whether plate in the hands of a banker, or goods in the hands of an agent could be dealt with in a similar manner. Or whether the only available course, in such cases, would be to get up the articles and pledge them, or to give a delivery-order for the avowed purpose of enabling the pledgee forthwith to get them up, and so to constitute an effectual pledge so soon as he did actually get them. Neither do I say that a delivery-order, even if applicable to goods in a bonded warehouse, given for the avowed purpose of enabling the creditor at once to get up the goods, and to hold them as a pledge, could be used for the different purpose of getting the goods transferred into the creditor's name, and so enabling him to hold them by an ex facie absolute title. There, not only the resulting legal rights would be different from what had been intended (which may often enough happen), but something would be done which the granter of the delivery-order had not intended or authorised to be done—namely, the using of that order to obtain a transference in the books in place of using it to obtain actual delivery. But here nothing was done which the parties did not intend to be done. They intended the goods to remain in the bonded warehouse—the transference to be made in the books of that warehouse,—and the matter to stand upon that transference; and, although the resulting legal rights turn out to be different from those which were contemplated or intended, that is a difference which, as I have already said, may often happen, but which can neither render the transaction wholly ineffectual nor give it different consequences from those which the law attaches to it.

I have not hesitated to express my opinion upon the legal question decided by the Lord Ordinary, because not only was that question fully and learnedly argued to us, but it is precisely upon the difference of principle applicable to a case of pledge, and to the case of an ex facie absolute transference, like what took place here, that my opinion rests. In a case of pledge the property remains with the pledger, and, consequently, if the article be pledged for a specific debt, the right to withhold it is limited to that debt. But in a transference like this the property passes to the transferee, subject only to a personal obligation to reconvey, and consequently the right of retention for the general balance, competent by the law of Scotland to a party in whose favour the property has been transferred, comes to be applicable—just as happens in the case of an absolute disposition to heritage, or an intimated assignation to a debt, qualified by a back-bond.

D. F. Inglis, for the pursuer, moved for expenses.

Sol.-Gen., for the defender objected. The party had put forward a case which had not been decided. Neither party should be entitled to their expenses.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Then, why did the defender put forward a case of pledge? The pursuer should get the expenses of the averment which was sent to proof. But as to the general expenses of the case, which is of a complex kind, the defender should have expenses, subject to modification.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, in so far as it finds that the defender has not proved the agreement specified and averred in article 7th of his statement of facts. Quoad ultra, alter the interlocutor reclaimed against, and Find that the defender is entitled to retain the brandy in question, until the advance made by him subsequent to the original transaction is repaid; Assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find the pursuer entitled to his expenses, occasioned by the averment of the defender sent to proof; and remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and to report : Find the defender entitled to his expenses in the other parts of the cause, but subject to modification ; and before modifying the same, Remit the account thereof when lodged, to the Auditor to tax and report.

Commonly.—Question whether, in the division of a commonly, the valued rent of the lands belonging to the claimants, or the extent of possession had by each in the common, is to be taken as the rule for allocating the share of commonly to the several claimants ?

THIS was a case of division of commonly, in which no point of law was determined, the decision having turned entirely upon the special facts of the case. It was argued by Miss Jaffray, one of the parties, that the commissioner to whom the Court had remitted to divide the commonly had held a portion of it to belong, as a road, to Lord Blantyre, which ought to have been included in the division, and had, moreover, allocated to her a less quantity than she was entitled to, in consequence of his adopting an erroneous principle for estimating the extent of her right. The commissioner, it was said, had looked to the valued rent in the valuation-rolls of the county, and had allocated a portion of the common to her corresponding to such valuation in proportion to the valuation of the other claimants in the process. It was said that this was unfair, because two portions of her estate were not found in the valuation-roll at all ; and it was contended, with reference to such cases, that the rights of parties in the common should be taken according to the use that they previously had of it, and not according to the valuation. The objector proved that she had been in use to pasture, by her tenants, a certain number of sheep upon the common, and ought to get a portion of it sufficient to pasture that number of sheep in future.

1ST DIVISION.

In reference to this point, it appeared that there had been a decree-arbitral between Miss Jaffray's predecessor and the neighbouring proprietor, by which her interest was limited in the common "to the cumulo valuation of their several lands," which, it was contended, settled the mode by which the allocation of the commonly must take place. Further, the first interlocutor in the case granting the commission to divide the common, directed the commissioner to "divide the said ground among the several parties having interest therein, and that according to the several valued rents of the lands." This interlocutor was pronounced in absence, no defences having been lodged, and was in the usual style of the interlocutor pronounced in cases of division of commonly, where no special circumstances are stated ; and Miss Jaffray contended that it must now be disregarded by the Court, who ought, in considering the report of the commissioner, to determine the case according to the proof, which shewed that there was no valuation at all of a portion of the lands, and the state of possession must therefore be taken as the measure of the quantity of the common to be allocated.

The Court did not consider any general question to arise, but held the point to be settled by the terms of the decree-arbitral and the interlocutor. The following is a portion of the opinion delivered, which was adopted by the other Judges as the opinion of the Court :—

LORD DEAS.—As to the valuation being the proper rule, this appears to me to be fixed both by the decret-arbitral upon which Miss Jaffray necessarily founds, and by the interlocutor allowing a proof and remitting to the commissioner. The decret-arbitral was pronounced upon a submission to which her predecessor was a party. It divides a certain portion of the common muir of Kilpatrick, and it sets

No. 42. Dec. 14, 1856. Magistrates of Dundee v. Lindsay. aside a certain other portion of it (being the portion now under division), as the common property pro indiviso of the objector and various other parties. The decret-arbitral is, therefore, the objector's own title. It was the pro indiviso share allotted to her predecessor by that decret-arbitral which was conveyed to her by the disposition of 1792. Had it not been for the decret-arbitral, the disposition would probably have been held to be inept,—for I am not prepared to say that the interest of a feuar in an undivided commony could be validly conveyed without conveying also the dominant tenement to which that interest attached. But by the decret-arbitral the interest of the feuar was converted into an interest of common property in a specific portion of ground allotted to him and the other feuars as pro indiviso proprietors, and it is this fact alone which makes the disposition clearly a habile conveyance. Now, by the decret-arbitral, the ground is allotted to “the parties submitters as effeiring to the cumulo valuation of their several lands;” and, under that title, I do not see how the objector can claim a share of the ground on any other footing than in proportion to her valuation. Then the interlocutor of 17th June 1851 directs the commissioner “to divide the said ground among the several parties having interest therein, and that according to the several valued rents of the lands;” and here, again, I do not see what the commissioner could do, under such an interlocutor, but take the valued rent as his rule. Moreover, as I have already indicated, the interlocutor is in the only terms it could have been, looking to the nature and terms of the title of the parties among whom the division was to be made. (His Lordship here stated the grounds upon which he held the Commissioner to be right upon the other objections also.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Having heard counsel for the parties on the objections by Miss Agnes Colquhoun Jaffray to the interim report of the Commissioner; repel these objections, and remit to the Commissioner to place march stones on the boundary lines as now adjusted, and to report: Find Lord Blantyre entitled to the expenses of this discussion,” &c.

Process—Multiplepounding—Stat. 1584, c. 3.—In a multiplepounding to try who was entitled to a succession as heir-at-law and next of kin of a deceased, parties who claimed to be legatees were cited, but did not appear. After decree of preference, they raised an action against the trustee and the parties preferred, concluding for declarator that by certain testamentary writings a valid bequest was made in favour of the pursuers;—Held, that the pursuers of the declarator were entitled to insist in that action without reducing the decree of preference, and without being obliged to pay the expenses incurred by the defender in the multiplepounding.

Dec. 14, 1856 In the multiplepounding raised at the instance of the judicial factor on the estate of the late John Morgan (see ante, vol. xvi. p. 82,) the defenders, John Morris and others, were preferred as next of kin to the deceased. When these parties moved for decree of preference, the nine incorporated trades of Dundee applied for leave to lodge a condescendence and claim, which was refused (see ante, vol. xvii. p. 817.)

The incorporated trades claimed to be entitled to a legacy bequeathed to them by Mr Morgan by holograph writings found in his repositories:—to make good their right to that bequest, this action was raised at the instance of the Provost and Magistrates of Dundee, and the Convener and Box-master of the nine incorporated trades of Dundee, concluding for declarator that certain testamentary writings of the late Mr Morgan contained a valid legacy and bequest of his moveable estate, or at least of as much of it as might be necessary for erecting and establishing in the town of Dundee an hospital to accommodate one hundred boys—that his succession was burdened with the said bequest—that his executor, and the parties who might succeed to his moveable estate, were bound to retain the residue of the estate, or so much of it as might be necessary to satisfy the bequest; or, if they had intromitted therewith, should be decerned to pay to the pursuers L.100,000, or the amount which should be fixed by the Court as necessary for the execution of the bequest, and that a scheme for the application of the funds should be prepared and fixed in terms of the bequest.

Defences were given in for Donald Lindsay, the judicial factor on the deceased's estate, and for John Morris and others, who had been found to be the next of kin of the deceased.

The Lord Ordinary, after hearing parties on the defences so far as dilatory and preliminary, ordained parties to print and box the summons and defences, in order to report.*

The first four pleas in law stated for the defenders were :—1. The pursuers had no sufficient title to sue. 2. As the whole of Mr Morgan's estate still formed the fund in medio in a depending process of multiplepoinding, this action was incompetent, or not maintainable independently of the multiplepoinding. 3. The pursuers were barred from maintaining this action by the process of multiplepoinding, so long as the interlocutors therein remained unchallenged in the multiplepoinding itself. In particular, the nine incorporated trades were so barred by the Act 1584, c. 10, in respect of their having been duly called in the multiplepoinding ; and the

* "NOTE.—On the suggestion of the defenders, this case has been reported to the Inner House for the disposal of the defences, preliminary and dilatory. Though generally indisposed to take this course, the Lord Ordinary has, after consideration, deemed it fitting to adopt the suggestion. He has no difficulty as to the pursuers' title to sue, whether of the convener and box-master of the nine incorporated trades, if the alleged bequest is special or limited to the trades, or of the Magistrates of Dundee on behalf of the community, if the charity is for a more general purpose, but still of a local character. But the 2d plea in law, and in connection with it the 3d and 4th pleas, raise questions for consideration which have immediate reference to proceedings before the Inner House in the multiplepoinding, and which are reported in the current volume of the Session Reports, pp. 817–18. The pursuers rely on the opinions there given as sanctioning, at least suggesting, the action now raised, and, as the defenders do not acquiesce in this view, the Lord Ordinary thinks it preferable to report the case rather than give judgment. He will remark, however, that had the multiplepoinding been at an end, he apprehends nothing has occurred as regards either class of the pursuers to conclude them from bringing an action of the present kind against the parties preferred under the multiplepoinding to the succession. The apparent difficulty is in this action being brought when the multiplepoinding is still de facto a depending process, no decree for payment having been pronounced, and certain interlocutors being under appeal. But as decree of preference over the whole fund in medio has gone out and been extracted in favour of the defenders called in this action, the difficulty is rather perhaps technical than of substance. The Lord Ordinary would have been disposed to disregard it. Further, he does not see that any reduction of the decree of preference is necessary, nor, if otherwise entitled to bring this independent action, the pursuers can be required, as preliminary to being heard, to satisfy the defenders' expenses in obtaining the decree of ranking and preference in the multiplepoinding. Whether, should the pursuers ultimately succeed under the present action in vindicating out of the hands of the defenders called in this action the succession which they have been preferred to, that succession is to be estimated otherwise than at the net value of it, which came or was presumed to be in their hands, after allowing for deduction of the expenses incurred in vindicating their primary right to the same by the present pursuers having lain by till now, is a question which it is not necessary to anticipate."

No. 43. Magistrates could not, by themselves, maintain the action in the manner in which it was libelled; and, at any rate, they were also barred from suing this action, they and their predecessors having been aware of the process of multiplepoinding: and, 4. The pursuers ought not to be allowed to insist in this action, or to disturb the interlocutors in the multiplepoinding, except on payment of the expenses incurred by the defenders.

Dec. 14, 1856.
Magistrates of Dundee v.
Lindsay.

The defenders were allowed to lodge two additional pleas in law to this effect—1. The action as libelled was incompetent, as there were no conclusions for reduction of the decree of preference; and, 2. The pursuers were in no event entitled to insist in this action, except on condition of paying to the defenders their expenses in the multiplepoinding.

The pursuers moved for an order to make up a record.

The defenders, John Morris and others, objected, and argued;—By the decree of preference in their favour, absolute beneficial enjoyment of the deceased's whole moveable estate was vested in them. Their right under that decree could not be competently questioned in an action of declarator. The only competent mode of doing so was by a reduction of the decree.¹ In ordinary cases parties could only be reponed against a decree in absence on payment of the expense incurred in obtaining the decree.² But a decree in absence in a process of multiplepoinding was in a different position, parties who allowed a decree in absence in such cases to go against them being precluded by special statute from opening it up.³ The fund in medio as condescended on amounted to L.97,000; and as the summons concluded for declarator that the pursuers were entitled to a legacy of L.100,000, the result of success in the present action would be that the whole funds vested in the defenders would be swept away, and the large sums of money they had spent in litigation would be entirely lost, and that because the present pursuers had chosen not to appear in the multiplepoinding, although they had been cited in that process. Had they appeared, the first question that would have been settled would have been whether the late Mr Morgan's succession was testate or intestate,⁴ and whether the writings founded on by the pursuers constituted a valid bequest? These points might have been settled at small expense, and if the pursuers prevailed, would have saved further litigation. The case of the pursuers was not strengthened by the Provost and Magistrates having lent their names as nominal pursuers. The Magistrates had not been cited; but they were well aware of the proceedings, and besides had no interest under the alleged testamentary writings founded on. The real pursuers, the nine trades, who were cited and did not appear, could not be in a better position than other claimants who had not been cited, and whose claim the Court had refused to admit when the decree of preference was moved for unless on payment of expenses.⁵ The position contended for was most equitable and reasonable: one claimant was not to be allowed to lie by and see another spend his whole funds in making out his case, and then, with his means unexhausted, deprive the successful litigant of the benefit of his decree. Or could twenty different claimants raise successively as many different actions, not as law but as policy might dictate, with the view of crushing the claimant who has a preferable title to them

Magistrates of Dundee v.
Lindsay.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This action is met by the plea of incompetency ; and 2dly, by the demand, as the condition of the action being entertained, for payment of all the expenses incurred by the defenders, the Morris and others, in the competition as to their propinquity to the late John Morgan in the multiplepoinding raised by the judicial factor, which has been so often before the Court ; and the latter condition is urged not only against the Nine Incorporated Trades of Dundee, who were cited in that multiplepoinding, but also against the Magistrates and Council of the burgh, who were not cited in that action. At the close of the additional argument yesterday, Mr M'Farlane intimated, that if the present pursuers were successful, his clients were willing to give obligation that they would repeat and pay back the expenses, which they insisted should be paid down now, as the condition of being allowed to go on with the action. Under the head of incompetency, it is further maintained that the only form of action which could be in any circumstances entertained, is that of reduction of the decree of preference, which the Morris and others obtained in the multiplepoinding, after establishing that one of them was the heir in heritage, and the others the next of kin of the deceased. Any other form of trying the question proposed to be raised by the pursuers, it was maintained, was necessarily excluded by the decree of preference, which, therefore, the pursuers had to reduce on competent grounds.

The question of competency is quite distinct from the condition as to payment of the expenses in the multiplepoinding—although the condition was in one light said to be the result of the form of action—(a reduction) which it was said was the only form of action competent. The question as to the necessity of a reduction will be considered in disposing of the competency of the action.

The character, object, and effect of this action must be carefully attended to, as well as the statement of facts on which it is founded. The action is directed against Mr Lindsay, as still judicially holding the estate of the deceased, and against the Morris and others, as next of kin and representatives of the deceased John Morgan. In that character, and in that character only, are they called. Then the conclusion—we shall see on what statements grounded—is first, that “ it should be declared that the testamentary writings contain a valid legacy and bequest of the whole of the residue of his moveable estate, or at least of so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose of erecting and establishing, in the town of Dundee, an hospital to accommodate 100 boys, and that the same are valid and effectual as testamentary deeds of the deceased to that effect.”

No doubt the conclusion says, in the first part, the whole of the residue of the deceased's moveable estate, and the whole argument of the defender was really rested on that expression in that part of the sentence. But most clearly the claim, if it exists at all, can only be, as stated in the main part of the conclusion, for so much as may be necessary for the intended hospital. To no other extent can the claim exist, and it is needless to say that if the Court shall now be called upon to allow, on due information, a proper sum for the purpose, we should not withdraw one sixpence for the purpose of any other sort of building than what suits the eleemosynary character of an hospital for poor boys, as the deceased very sensibly says in one writing ought to be its character. And as the fund was several years ago stated to be about L.100,000, the surplus which would remain would necessarily be very considerable.

The summons then asks to have it found and declared that the “ succession of the deceased is burdened with the said bequest, and that the defender, the said Donald Lindsay, as executor foresaid, or the parties found entitled to succeed to the deceased's moveable estate, are bound to retain the residue of the moveable

The other conclusions are really subsidiary to these two, and are further directed against the defenders if they should have intromitted as the representatives of the deceased. The object of the action, then, is merely to establish that, under a certain writing, there has been constituted a certain claim or burden on the succession, whoever may be the representatives, which must be satisfied and fulfilled out of the moveable estate, to be drawn by such representatives to the extent which the Court may direct, if they have any materials for carrying out the object, in the writings left by the deceased. And the effect of any decree, in terms of the summons, will not disturb, in the smallest degree, or subvert the decree of preference which the defenders have obtained qua next of kin. That decree proceeds upon the verdict which found them to be the next of kin, and sustains their claim in express terms as next of kin, to the whole moveable estate of the deceased, and ranked and preferred them accordingly. That a party brings an action to constitute a burden on that succession, created by the act of the deceased, whether by bond or by legacy, which it is alleged the next of kin must fulfil, in no respect disturbs the basis on which the claim of the defenders, and the verdict in their favour, rested—viz. that the deceased died generally intestate, and that the defenders are next of kin. That he died intestate is quite consistent with the statement that he gave directions for the application of a part of his funds for a certain purpose, if that was effectually directed to be done. Neither does such a claim to any extent disturb or affect the actual decree of preference which the next of kin have obtained, or the character established in their favour. The decree is in the usual words of style applicable to such a case. As next of kin, the defenders are and will be entitled to the whole moveable estate of the deceased. If these had been debts, open, apparently, to objections, and which the judicial factor had thought it better that the next of kin, as the parties truly interested, should dispute, than himself, the defenders—notwithstanding their decree, and, indeed, in respect of the very decree in their favour—must have paid if well founded. Or, if the judicial factor had paid unquestionable debts, such would be deduction to be borne by the defenders, although the decree finds them entitled to the whole moveable funds of the deceased,—a form of expression which relates to their character as universal representatives, but necessarily entails all burdens on the succession, just because they are representatives. Therefore, neither the form, character, nor effect of the present summons will disturb or overturn in any respect the decree of preference. Nor is there any repugnance or contradiction between the same and his claim.

On this point I have a very firm opinion.

In this view it is very plain that a reduction of the decree of preference cannot be necessary in order to constitute the claim; and, indeed, would be quite inapplicable to the case to be tried, and inconsistent with the only object of calling the defenders. The pursuers state no grounds for reducing that decree, and have no case which would warrant that form of action. The decree sustains the claim of the defenders as next of kin, and prefers them on that ground. The pursuers have not a word to state against that decree. They do not seek to establish in themselves the character established by the decree of preference. A reduction would be totally inapplicable to the case. They go against the defenders, because they are in the character of next of kin, legally established in them by that very decree of preference. The effect of the action will not then impeach or invalidate that preference as next of kin.

Further, in the statement of facts on which the conclusions are rested, there is not one word which disputes the validity of the decree of preference obtained by the defenders, or interferes with its operative effect. A reduction could not be relevantly laid in the circumstances of the case.

It is therefore, perhaps, unnecessary to say much on the Act 1584, c. 3, and on the argument founded on that statute in regard to the finality of a decree of preference. The object of the statute has been quite misapprehended. Its main object is to protect the raiser of the multiplepoinding against subsequent demands by new claimants and creditors who had not appeared in the former action. In the course of the statute there are terms which also seem to protect those who have drawn the rents from the raiser of the multiplepoinding, so far as not extant, from the claims of subsequent parties having a better right; and to that extent it shews that the preference was not final to the extent alleged, nor the decree exempted from all after challenge. The authorities quoted are, to my apprehension, decidedly opposed to the view taken of the statute by the defenders. But it is needless to say more on the subject, because there is not a word in the statute, or in any law book, which exempts the next of kin from liability to make good either legacies or obligations of the deceased, although he may have died intestate, and parties may have, in a competition, obtained a decree of preference as the next of kin in mobilibus. It is only by keeping out of view the character of this action, and by a total misstatement as to its object and effect, that the general argument was raised against its competency as to the finality of decrees of preference and the necessity of reduction. These pleas are wholly inapplicable to the case.

But then it is further contended, that, as a general rule, the action could only be sustained on condition of paying to the defenders the whole expenses which they had incurred in the multiplepoinding, and this again was latterly rested, so far as it was said to be a general rule, on the supposed necessity of a reduction. What might in such a case be the rule, if a new claimant as nearer of kin should now appear, and be found entitled to institute a reduction of the decree of preference in favour of the defenders as next of kin, it would be out of place to consider. What I have stated as to this action, and its character and effect, shews that all the reasoning addressed to us on a totally opposite view of the action is wholly misplaced. Whether a rule as to payment of expenses in previous proceedings extends beyond the case of a reduction of a decree in which expenses are decerned for personally against the raisers of the reduction, or applies in every such case of a reduction, I need not inquire. But, in the law of Scotland, we have no equitable rule as to payment of prior expenses, even in cases of great hardship. I called attention to the case of Scott v. Campbell, Feb. 20, 1840, as a very pointed and marked instance of a different view being entertained. Nor have the remarks made on that case in any degree tended to shake the conclusion that it shews that the law of Scotland does not entertain, to any great extent, the views of equitable interference with the rights of parties to institute actions, by attaching thereto the condition of paying expenses previously incurred in another process, although relating to the very same matters as to which the party is harassed in another process. The claim for expenses in that case was extremely strong. Nor is the remark that there was no reduction in that case of any weight, unless we first find that the pursuers cannot raise any action, except in the form of a reduction. The case of Goodsir v. Chalmers' trustees was quoted by the defenders only from one of the reports, which does not mention the most important question in the case in point of precedent. Chalmers' trustees raised a process of multiplepoinding and exoneration. They disputed a variety of claims of creditors, and incurred in that way considerable expense. At last they obtained a judgment of exoneration. Then another party came forward, and they maintained that, as the condition of being allowed to open up the exoneration in their favour, the compeerer must pay the whole expenses incurred by the trustees. But the Court found that the party was only bound to pay the expenses incurred since the date of the interlocutor of exoneration, but no part of the expenses incurred in the discussions with other claimants, which had resulted at last in that interlocutor of exoneration.

This case—I have examined the session papers—turns out to be a precedent, nearly against the claim of the defenders. In that case, the party sought directly to open up the interlocutor of exoneration, which the trustees had obtained after full discussion; but the trustees failed in the attempt to obtain payment of all the expenses incurred in the process in the litigation with other claimants,—and that, on the principle, such litigation you must have had, even if no new party came forward. You chose to try these points, and hence, the new claimant cannot be compelled to pay such expenses as the condition of now appearing, notwithstanding your decree of exoneration. The case is very important as a precedent: and representatives of the nine trades were called for their interest in the multiplepoinding. They might have appeared, and it was said that if they had then appeared, and had a good case (a supposition which the pursuers cannot refuse to take) the whole expenses of the competition would never have occurred, and hence they have thus caused enormous expense to the defenders, which they now propose to render altogether fruitless by allowing the multiplepoinding to proceed on the assumption that the deceased died intestate.

It is therefore, perhaps, unnecessary to say much on the Act 1584, c. 3, and on the argument founded on that statute in regard to the finality of a decree of

Every part of this view of the case is open to various and complete answers.

If the office-bearers of the nine trades neglected their duty by not appearing, I apprehend that in this case the Magistrates and Council would clearly be entitled to appear for the town, and vindicate the right now claimed. It was said that the Magistrates and Council knew of the claim from not only general report, but information communicated to them, and ought on that account to pay down the whole expenses incurred by the defenders. That is much too loose, and I suppose any such ground for the condition of paying the expenses of another law-suit, in which the party was not cited—viz. that he knew of it—was never previously imagined by any one. The objection as to the nine trades would not therefore much avail the defenders, even if it were well founded.

As to the nine trades, I much doubt whether neglect of their office-bearers at the time—five years ago—to appear, could entail any such result as the forfeiture of their right, or the condition of paying down L.5000 or L.6000 of expenses before they can be heard. If they had appeared, a judgment against their office-bearers would no doubt have been res judicata. But I am not prepared to admit that neglect to appear must be attended with the result now demanded—the claim not being one in the competition to which the decree of preference applies.

No question of an intestate or testate succession is raised by the pursuers' case. The pursuers do not propose to establish a general will, appointing executors, and conveying, if good, the whole succession of the deceased. They simply set forth a particular writing or writings said to contain a bequest, which they say must be fulfilled by the party entitled to the intestate succession, to the extent which the Court may choose to allow, for the purpose stated in that writing.

Suppose the trades had appeared in the multiplepoinding, what would have been the course to be taken at the outset? No one was acknowledged to be any relative at all. Great doubt existed as to all the parties: even those who have prevailed had to prove a great deal, and they disproved altogether the relationship of those who claimed to be the nearest relations. It might turn out that none of the parties were relations, and the case of M'Lean shews how claimants in such a case may successively be shewn to be impostors. In that state of things, would the Court have gone on to try the validity of this paper for an hospital in Dundee, as the purpose to be fulfilled by the party entitled to the intestate succession, when it did not appear that there was any one entitled to the character of next of kin? Or, were the present pursuers to be put to the expense and vexation of trying this question with all the parties who had come forward as next of kin, when it might turn out that one and all were mere impostors? I have no notion that the Court would have begun the multiplepoinding by adopting any such course. I think the proper and natural course was first to enter into the competition between the claimants for the character of next of kin, and then, when it was ascertained who was the next of kin, would arise, in some form or other, the question as to the validity of any particular bequest claimable from such party. I have no doubt whatever that the competition would have gone on exactly as it has done between the claimants for the character of the next of kin. I look on the representation, therefore, that if the claim had been preferred in the multiplepoinding no expenses would have been incurred in the competition if the pursuer had been successful, as altogether groundless. I have no doubt that the question as to the validity of this bequest would have been superseded, and the competition gone on, just as it did actually do. Hence I see no room whatever for the demand from the pursuers for the expenses incurred in the multiplepoinding in establishing their character as next of kin, as the condition of the pursuers being allowed to come into Court.

Whether the matter is to be viewed with reference to the objects of this action, or the character and effect of the decree of preference, to any rules as to such decrees, or any views sanctioned by the Court as to the expenses of previous litigations, the pleas maintained by the defenders in this stage of the litigation must be repelled.

LORD MURRAY.—I have come to the same conclusion; and having listened to the very able arguments from the bar, I see no grounds for differing. The Act 1584 is a very valuable Act, but it is for the protection of parties subjected to double distress, and the reason of it is, that when a party has raised a multiplepinding, he ought not to be troubled by any parties who do not appear. Res judicata pro veritate habetur. The party must be protected, and here Mr Donald Lindsay would be entitled to the protection of the Act, if he had paid away the money. I do not see what benefit it would have been to the defenders had these parties here come forward earlier, and I do not think their delay has caused any otherwise unnecessary expense. The same expense would be incurred either way. That these parties incurred much expense in making their claim, cannot affect the law: they are the nearest of kin, and the pursuers do not seek to interfere with their title, or to reduce their rights in any way.

LORD COWAN.—When these parties proposed to appear in the multiplepinding, the proceedings had reached such a stage as to require, in the opinion of the Court, and in justice to the successful competitors, that decree should be pronounced, putting an end to that process. The whole competition had been directed to the enquiry as to which of the claimants were nearest of kin and heirs of line of the deceased, and entitled in that character to take up his whole succession, heritable and moveable. After years of litigation, decree was on the point of being pronounced, when the compearance was made; and in that situation, it was considered that some such proceeding as the institution of an action like the present was indispensable.

It is all important to attend to the precise nature and extent of the claim advanced in this action by the pursuers. Their contention is that the deceased left certain testamentary writings, containing a valid bequest for the purpose of erecting an hospital in the town of Dundee. It is not alleged that these writings contain a valid conveyance of the universitas of the deceased's estate. All that is maintained is, that they afford evidence of the deceased's intention to bequeath a specific legacy of so much of his estate as may be necessary to accomplish the purpose he had in view. Thus the claim is not such as to bring into competition the right of parties claiming to be executors-nominate with the title and right of the next of kin, and proper representatives of the deceased. On the contrary, it might have been advanced against executors-nominate, had there been a regular settlement left by the deceased equally, as against the intestate heirs in mobilibus. Again, as regards its extent, from the very nature of the claim that cannot be ascertained until the action has been proceeded with. The fulfilment of the bequest may cut deep into the succession of the deceased, or it may leave a large residuary fund to the next of kin after it is satisfied. But whatever be its extent, it is a claim to be made effectual against, and in competition with, the parties entitled to the estate generally, disburdened of debts and legacies, whether those parties be executors-nominate, or heirs ab intestato.

The summons contains conclusions declaratory and petitory, aptly and relevantly framed for trying the validity of the alleged bequest. It asks the Court to find that the erection and establishment of this hospital in Dundee is a burden on the succession of the deceased, for which funds must be provided out of the residue falling to the next of kin. The parties called as defenders are Mr Lindsay the judicial factor, the confirmed executor-dative, and the parties who have succeeded in establishing their right as next of kin against all the other claimants in that character. The parties called are the proper defenders in such an action; and although the title of the pursuers is objected to in the defences, it is beyond dispute that the Magistrates and Council of this royal burgh have sufficient right and title to institute proceedings in regard to a matter affecting the interests of the community, while the fact set forth in the summons that the hospital is destined for the education of "the poor children of the nine trades" is conclusive of the title of the other pursuers, as representing the nine incorporated trades of Dundee.

In this state of things, what are the objections taken to this action being allowed to proceed in the usual course? Having regard to the proceedings in the action of multiplepinding, and to the decree of preference pronounced in their favour, the defenders say that the action is objectionable, as incompetent, both generally and on the special grounds of the summons, containing no recissory conclusions. No. 43.

 And farther, they maintain that the payment of the expenses incurred by them in the action of multiplepoinding is, in any view, a condition compliance with which is indispensable before the action is allowed to proceed. Dec 14, 1856.
 Magistrates of Dundee v. Lindsay.

I entertain no doubt either of the competency of the action or of its sufficiency, without recissory conclusions, to try the question which it is the object of the pursuers to have tried. It may be that the claim could have been made the subject of discussion in the multiplepoinding. I think it might; but, although it had been made even at an early stage of the proceedings, I am not satisfied that its discussion would have taken precedence of the competing rights that were disposed of between the parties alleging themselves respectively to be next of kin. The nature of the claim, as I have said, is limited. It is not for the universitas of the estate, but for a specific legacy or bequest, burdening and affecting the universitas. No matter, although it may by possibility swallow up the personal estate,—which cannot, however, in hoc statu, be taken for granted, for it may, in course of the proceedings, be found to be of comparatively limited extent,—this does not affect the essential nature of the claim as specific and not universal, and burdening merely the general succession. Even if made in the multiplepoinding, therefore, it by no means follows that the discussion of it either would have taken the lead, or would have prevented the parties competing for the character and rights of next of kin from going on with their competition. But whether it would or not, is truly of no consequence in the question of competency. The fact comes just to be this, that the universitas of the estate was the subject of competition in the multiplepoinding, that decree has been pronounced in favour of the defenders, and that the special claim here made must now be directed against the parties preferred to the succession.

The decree of preference does not require to be reduced. Clear it is that the decree relative to the heritable estate is not in the least affected. But neither is that relative to the moveable estate, farther than this, that the succession to which the defenders have been preferred may, to a greater or less extent, be burdened, should the pursuers be successful in their declaratory conclusions. Subject to that burden the decree stands.

It is said, however, that as the pursuers representing the nine trades were called in the multiplepoinding, and as the other pursuers, the Magistrates and Council, pursue for the same interest, there is necessity for reduction by the very terms of the statute 1587, c. 3. I do not think that the present case falls within the statutory provisions. I concur in the observations of your Lordships as to that point. But, as I have said, no reduction of the decree obtained by the defenders, properly speaking, is required, or would have been competent,—certainly not in toto, nor as preliminary to the discussion of this claim. If creditors of the deceased were appearing and claiming payment of their debts, they could not be required to reduce the decree of preference. Proceeding on the footing of that decree being fixed on the defenders the character and liabilities of representatives of their debtor, the demand against them would have been direct for payment. So this claim by special legatees. Reduction is no more necessary in the one case than in the other.

But then comes the question of payment of expenses as a condition of the action being proceeded with. A sum, said to amount to about L.6000, expended by the defenders in establishing their character of next of kin, is asked to be paid down by the pursuers before they are permitted to state the grounds of their claim. In far as the demand was based on the necessity of a reduction, that has been disposed of. It is alleged, however, that on grounds of equity such payment ought to be enforced in limine, and, as I understood the defender's counsel, absolutely, whatever may be the result of the action. I know of no principle or rule of justice recognised by the decisions of this Court sanctioning the proposition, which, in my opinion, might lead to the most inequitable results. Take it that the pursuers are unsuccessful in asserting their right to this specific bequest, the defenders would not only go out of Court with absolvitor, and their full expenses of this process, but be enriched to the extent of the L.6000, although it is by the expenditure of that sum they have fixed their right to the general succession as next of kin. I think there would be little equity in that. But say that the pursuers are successful, the claim sustained by the Court may be to a comparatively

- No. 43. limited extent, keeping in view the largeness of the moveable succession, with its accumulations, set forth in the condescence of Mr Lindsay. The bulk of the funds may still be left with the defenders, after satisfying this specific bequest, and they will take that in their character of next of kin. Yet it is gravely proposed, although this may possibly be the result, that all the expense of establishing their title to it shall now, ante omnia, be paid over to the defenders. There is, I humbly think, as little equity in this view of the result of this litigation as in the other, to justify the claim. Were it to turn out, indeed, that the whole succession will be absorbed by the claim of the pursuers, there might be ground for a claim in equity of the kind pleaded on the part of the defenders; and this, I think, is what the Lord Ordinary points at in his note. But plain it is, that no such equitable view or question can arise for consideration until the extent of the bequest, if it shall be sustained to any extent, be ascertained under the record in this action.

L.

THE late Adam Fairholme, of Chapel, executed on 8th December 1841 a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he conveyed his whole property, heritable and moveable, in favour of Mr Pringle, of Whytbank, and others, as trustees—1st, for payment of debts, &c.; 2d, of legacies; 3d, to hold the residue, “subject to such directions or appointments relative to the disposal thereof as I shall think fit to give or make by codicil hereto, or any other writing or writings under my hand, even although executed on deathbed, and however informal the same may be, if clearly indicative of my intentions; and, failing any such directions,” to convey the same to his nearest heirs and executors whomsoever. The truster died on 24th May 1853. On opening his repositories the trust-deed was found, having appended to it a holograph codicil in these terms:—“Chapel, 1st Jan. 1842.—I hereby direct and appoint my trustees to assign, convey, and make over the whole of my trust-estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, to and in favour of James Fairholme, second son of my brother George Fairholme of Greenknowe, and his issue lawfully begotten; and, failing him and them, to George Fairholme, third son of my foresaid brother, and his issue lawfully begotten, subject to such alterations as I may hereafter make. (Signed) A. FAIRHOLME. In witness whereof I have written with mine own hand, and subscribe this codicil at Chapel, the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two.” There was no attestation of witnesses to the execution, and no authentication of the date when it was written. George Fairholme, of Greenknowe, predeceased his brother, the truster, although alive at the date of the trust-deed, and his eldest son, William, who thus was the heir-at-law of his uncle, brought the present action of reduction of the settlement, so far as it conveyed heritage à capite lecti. James Fairholme had joined Sir John Franklin's expedition to the polar seas, and George Fairholme, the party favoured next after him, was abroad when the action was raised; but, on his return to this country, he adopted the defences which had been given in by the trustees.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Having considered the closed record and productions, and heard parties' procurators, Finds it admitted that the pursuer is the heir-at-law of the deceased Adam Fairholme, Esq. of Chapel, who died on the 24th May 1853: Finds that this action has been raised by the pursuer, for the purpose of reducing a writing or codicil, holograph of the said deceased Adam Fairholme, bearing to be dated 1st January 1842, in so far as it contains directions for the disposal of his heritage, to the hurt and prejudice of the pursuer as his heir-at-law, on the ground that the same was executed on deathbed: Finds it alleged by the pursuer that the said writing or codicil was written and subscribed by the said Adam Fairholme when he was on deathbed, and within sixty days previous to the said 24th May 1853, when he died: Finds this averment is denied by the defenders, who allege that the said writing or codicil was executed by the said deceased Adam Fairholme, of the date it bears, that is, on the 1st January 1842, and that he was then, and continued for some years thereafter, in sound health, and in the enjoyment of all his faculties, mental and bodily: Finds it admitted by the pursuer that the said deceased Adam Fairholme was in good health on 1st January 1842, and continued to be so for some years after that date: Finds, with reference to the conflicting statements of the parties as to the period when the deed sought to be reduced was executed, and having regard to the facts and circumstances averred by the defenders on the record”—[These were that “for seven years prior to the truster's death, he had not heard from his nephew James,” and had “given up all hopes of his return long before the date at which, on the pursuer's supposition, the codicil must have been written, and had in consequence contemplated altering the codicil so early as August 1852, though he never completed the alteration;” and the “date as given, both in figures and in writing, is holograph, as the body of the document is, of Mr Fairholme himself, and the handwriting in which it is written and signed, when compared with other writings, also holograph of Mr Fairholme, written before and shortly after January 1842, appears to correspond with the ordinary handwriting of the deceased at that period, and to bear no marks of being written at a time when he was enfeebled by disease or otherwise. Down to the end of the year 1849 or thereby, no perceptible change in the handwriting of the deceased took place, but from that date, down to the day of his death, a marked change was perceptible; his handwriting during the latter period having become smaller and weaker, so that it did not correspond in appearance with that in which the said direction or appointment has been written and signed by the deceased. The defenders have no doubt, whatever, that the said direction or appointment was, in point of fact, executed by him on the 1st of January 1842, as therein stated"] "That the pursuer is not entitled to insist de plano for decree of reduction of the said holograph writing or codicil, and to this extent repels the third plea* in law for the pursuer, and appoints him quam primum to lodge an issue for the purpose of trying the question whether the said writing or codicil was executed by the said Adam Fairholme on deathbed; and in the meantime reserves all questions of expenses." †

The pursuer reclaimed, and pleaded;—Where the presumption of deathbed was once raised, the onus lay on the party founding on the deed, to allege and prove such facts as should get the better of that presumption. In all previous cases where proof had been allowed, the allegations had amounted to positive evidence, either that the deed had existed previously, or that it could not possibly have been executed within the 60 days. There was not here a single averment which necessarily excluded the presumption. All that was said in regard to the handwriting was, that it appeared to correspond with that of the testator at the date the codicil bore, and that it did not correspond with his usual writing about the date of his death. That was not a relevant defence,—it should have been averred that it was impossible for the deceased to have so written.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have no doubt the statement here is relevant to go to proof.

LORD DEAS.—The defenders aver that the codicil was written of the date it bears. Surely that is relevant.

Draft issues were then lodged by the pursuer, throwing the onus on the defender, and the defender throwing it on the pursuer, but the pursuer's contention was, that, in the circumstances here, as the case must turn on delicate views of legal presumption and of the law of deathbed, jury trial was not a suitable way of disposing of it. There was the farther peculiarity that the party first called by the codicil, and so principally interested, had gone abroad, and might still be alive and return. In such a case, it was peculiarly important that the whole evidence should be preserved, in order that, if he

* The defenders have not set forth any facts sufficient to elide the legal presumption that the said writing or codicil was executed on deathbed.

† "NOTE.—It was contended by the pursuer at the debate, that he was entitled, de plano, to decree of reduction, on the ground that the defenders had not set forth on the record a relevant case to support the deed or writing challenged. A holograph writing does not prove its own date; and if it be prejudicial to the heir-at-law, the presumption is that it has been executed on deathbed, where there is no counter-presumption or legal evidence to the contrary. But it is quite competent for the defenders to instruct their averment that the deed was executed of the date it bears, in liege poustie; and it appears to the Lord Ordinary that they have set forth facts and circumstances which entitle them to a proof on this point, under the general issue usually adopted in practice for trying the question of deathbed."

Porteous v. Blair.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am a good deal moved by the peculiarity of the circumstances in this case. Although the general rule, undoubtedly, is to try deathbed cases by jury, yet there is no imperative rule on the subject, and when there are strong grounds for taking another course, it is open for the Court to adopt it. This appears to me to be such a case. The leading defender, if alive, is abroad, and it certainly thus becomes very desirable to preserve the fullest possible record of the proceedings. Then I do not think there need be an issue at all, when the proof is to be taken by commission. This is not a large record, and does not open up much ground for discussion.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, on report of Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary, and having heard counsel for the parties, remit to the Lord Ordinary to grant a proof on commission to both parties, and to each a conjunct probation; the pursuer to lead evidence first: Find that an issue is unnecessary: Reserve all questions of expenses."

THE nature of this action, as well as the allegations of parties, and import of the proof which was led, appear from the following interlocutor pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute at Ayr (Robison), which, on considering a reclaiming note, was adhered to by the Sheriff-depute (Christison):—"Finds that this is an action at the instance of the parish of Dalrymple to recover from the parish of Dailly certain alimentary advances made by Dalrymple to two individuals, husband and wife, of the name of M'Nish, residing in Dalrymple, and alleged to have there become proper objects of parochial relief at the time when the advances in question began to be made by the pursuer, namely, on the 19th day of October 1848; and the action also concludes for relief of future advances, and is directed against the parish of Dailly as being that in which James M'Nish, the husband, was born; while the defence set up by Dailly is, that the giving of relief to the supposed superfluous persons by the pursuer was merely a device to prevent them from acquiring a residential settlement in Dalrymple, which they were nearly completing when the said advances began to be made, but without being warranted by the circumstances of the recipients, who were then able to support them-

The other conclusions are really subsidiary to these two, and are further directed against the defenders if they should have intromitted as the representatives of the deceased. The object of the action, then, is merely to establish that, under a certain writing, there has been constituted a certain claim or burden on the succession, whoever may be the representatives, which must be satisfied and fulfilled out of the moveable estate, to be drawn by such representatives to the extent which the Court may direct, if they have any materials for carrying out the object, in the writings left by the deceased. And the effect of any decree, in terms of the summons, will not disturb, in the smallest degree, or subvert the decree of preference which the defenders have obtained qua next of kin. That decree proceeds upon the verdict which found them to be the next of kin, and sustains their claim in express terms as next of kin, to the whole moveable estate of the deceased, and ranked and preferred them accordingly. That a party brings an action to constitute a burden on that succession, created by the act of the deceased, whether by bond or by legacy, which it is alleged the next of kin must fulfil, in no respect disturbs the basis on which the claim of the defenders, and the verdict in their favour, rested—viz. that the deceased died generally intestate, and that the defenders are next of kin. That he died intestate is quite consistent with the statement that he gave directions for the application of a part of his funds for a certain purpose, if that was effectually directed to be done. Neither does such a claim to any extent disturb or affect the actual decree of preference which the next of kin have obtained, or the character established in their favour. The decree is in the usual words of style applicable to such a case. As next of kin, the defenders are and will be entitled to the whole moveable estate of the deceased. If these had been debts, open, apparently, to objections, and which the judicial factor had thought it better that the next of kin, as the parties truly interested, should dispute, than himself, the defenders—notwithstanding their decree, and, indeed, in respect of the very decree in their favour—must have paid if well founded. Or, if the judicial factor had paid unquestionable debts, such would be deduction to be borne by the defenders, although the decree finds them entitled to the whole moveable funds of the deceased,—a form of expression which relates to their character as universal representatives, but necessarily entails all burdens on the succession, just because they are representatives. Therefore, neither the form, character, nor effect of the present summons will disturb or overturn in any respect the decree of preference. Nor is there any repugnance or contradiction between the same and his claim.

On this point I have a very firm opinion.

In this view it is very plain that a reduction of the decree of preference cannot be necessary in order to constitute the claim; and, indeed, would be quite inapplicable to the case to be tried, and inconsistent with the only object of calling the defenders. The pursuers state no grounds for reducing that decree, and have no case which would warrant that form of action. The decree sustains the claim of the defenders as next of kin, and prefers them on that ground. The pursuers have not a word to state against that decree. They do not seek to establish in themselves the character established by the decree of preference. A reduction would be totally inapplicable to the case. They go against the defenders, because they are in the character of next of kin, legally established in them by that very decree of preference. The effect of the action will not then impeach or invalidate that preference as next of kin.

Further, in the statement of facts on which the conclusions are rested, there is not one word which disputes the validity of the decree of preference obtained by the defenders, or interferes with its operative effect. A reduction could not be relevantly laid in the circumstances of the case.

It is therefore, perhaps, unnecessary to say much on the Act 1584, c. 3, and on the argument founded on that statute in regard to the finality of a decree of

No. 43.

Dec. 14, 1856.
Magistrates of Dundee v.
Lindsay.

preference. The object of the statute has been quite misapprehended. Its main object is to protect the raiser of the multiplepoinding against subsequent demands by new claimants and creditors who had not appeared in the former action. In the course of the statute there are terms which also seem to protect those who have drawn the rents from the raiser of the multiplepoinding, so far as not extant, from the claims of subsequent parties having a better right; and to that extent it shews that the preference was not final to the extent alleged, nor the decree exempted from all after challenge. The authorities quoted are, to my apprehension, decidedly opposed to the view taken of the statute by the defenders. But it is needless to say more on the subject, because there is not a word in the statute, or in any law book, which exempts the next of kin from liability to make good either legacies or obligations of the deceased, although he may have died intestate, and parties may have, in a competition, obtained a decree of preference as the next of kin in mobilibus. It is only by keeping out of view the character of this action, and by a total misstatement as to its object and effect, that the general argument was raised against its competency as to the finality of decrees of preference and the necessity of reduction. These pleas are wholly inapplicable to the case.

But then it is further contended, that, as a general rule, the action could only be sustained on condition of paying to the defenders the whole expenses which they had incurred in the multiplepoinding, and this again was latterly rested, so far as it was said to be a general rule, on the supposed necessity of a reduction. What might in such a case be the rule, if a new claimant as nearer of kin should now appear, and be found entitled to institute a reduction of the decree of preference in favour of the defenders as next of kin, it would be out of place to consider. What I have stated as to this action, and its character and effect, shews that all the reasoning addressed to us on a totally opposite view of the action is wholly misplaced. Whether a rule as to payment of expenses in previous proceedings extends beyond the case of a reduction of a decree in which expenses are decerned for personally against the raisers of the reduction, or applies in every such case of a reduction, I need not inquire. But, in the law of Scotland, we have no equitable rule as to payment of prior expenses, even in cases of great hardship. I called attention to the case of Scott v. Campbell, Feb. 20, 1840, as a very pointed and marked instance of a different view being entertained. Nor have the remarks made on that case in any degree tended to shake the conclusion that it shews that the law of Scotland does not entertain, to any great extent, the views of equitable interference with the rights of parties to institute actions, by attaching thereto the condition of paying expenses previously incurred in another process, although relating to the very same matters as to which the party is harassed in another process. The claim for expenses in that case was extremely strong. Nor is the remark that there was no reduction in that case of any weight, unless we first find that the pursuers cannot raise any action, except in the form of a reduction. The case of Goodsir v. Chalmers' trustees was quoted by the defenders only from one of the reports, which does not mention the most important question in the case in point of precedent. Chalmers' trustees raised a process of multiplepoinding and exoneration. They disputed a variety of claims of creditors, and incurred in that way considerable expense. At last they obtained a judgment of exoneration. Then another party came forward, and they maintained that, as the condition of being allowed to appear to open up the exoneration in their favour, the compeerer must pay the whole expenses incurred by the trustees. But the Court found that the party was only bound to pay the expenses incurred since the date of the interlocutor of exoneration, but no part of the expenses incurred in the discussions with other claimants, which had resulted at last in that interlocutor of exoneration.

This case—I have examined the session papers—turns out to be a precedent, clearly against the claim of the defenders. In that case, the party sought directly to open up the interlocutor of exoneration, which the trustees had obtained after full discussion; but the trustees failed in the attempt to obtain payment of all the expenses incurred in the process in the litigation with other claimants,—and that, on the principle, such litigation you must have had, even if no new party came forward. You chose to try these points, and hence, the new claimant cannot be compelled to pay such expenses as the condition of now appearing, notwithstanding your decree of exoneration. The case is very important as a precedent: and

Dundee v.
Lindsay.

The first consideration which strikes the mind in regard to this demand for the expenses in the multiplepoinding incurred by the defenders in proving their propinquity, is that such expenses were not incurred in recovering, securing, or protecting the funds of the deceased. The fund was entire and safe in the hands of the judicial factor, and latterly of the Court. The expenses, then, were utterly unproductive of benefit to the present pursuers, if their claim is well founded. The fund has neither been recovered, enlarged, or protected by such expense. This is a very important—often a ruling consideration—in regard to such a demand for expenses, whether stated as a condition of instituting an action, or as resulting from its success, as in the case of Agnew. Accordingly, the demand for expenses is not rested on any benefit accruing to the present pursuers, or to the fund, from any such outlay. On the contrary, it is rested on the loss said to be occasioned to the defenders, if the case of the pursuers is well founded. And the defenders insisted on the condition of paying all the expenses in the multiplepoinding, in respect of the particular circumstances attending that multiplepoinding. These were stated at extreme length to us, but in truth may be summed in a very few words. The

* GOODSIR v. AIKEN AND OTHERS (Chalmers' Trustees.)

This was an action of multiplepoinding and exoneration raised by the trustees on the bankrupt estate of Chalmers and Company—the creditors were called as defenders.

The dividend on one debt ranked on Chalmers' estate having been claimed by Crawford as trustee for a creditor, and also by the Fife Bank in virtue of an assignment to the debt, Chalmers' trustees raised a multiplepoinding before the Sheriff of Fife, in which they resisted a motion for consignment of the dividend as the fund in medio, on various grounds. After much litigation between Crawford and the Bank, he was preferred. Various other questions, raised between the bank and Crawford, were undecided in the Sheriff-Court when the proceedings were advocated ob contingentiam of the multiplepoinding and exoneration raised in the Court of Session in name of the trustees. It was then alleged by Crawford, the only creditor who objected, that Aiken, the leading trustee, who was also manager of the Fife Bank, had sacrificed the interests of the creditors on Chalmers' and Company's estate to relieve the bank, and that as acting for the creditors he had not given a faithful account of his intromissions with the bankrupt estate. Crawford urged many objections to the state of the funds of the bankrupt estate forming the fund in medio. It was alleged that the trustees had taken credit for a large sum for law business, the accounts for which had not been taxed, and had never been rendered in detail,—that an illegal and unfair distribution had been made of the trust-funds,—that one of Aiken's co-trustees had, as trustee on another estate, retained a large sum of dividends due to Chalmers' estate,—that no proper state of the funds had been lodged in the process, and that the trustees had failed, by culpable negligence, to recover L.500 due to the estate.

Instead of investigating these objections, Aiken having entered into an extrajudicial arrangement with Crawford, his claim was purchased by the bank, and the objections urged by Crawford not being insisted in by the bank, the trustees, on 15th May 1819, procured a decree of exoneration.

Goodsir, another creditor on Chalmers' estate, presented a representation against the decree of exoneration, which was admitted after the discussion already reported.—(See 1 Shaw's reports, p. 12, N. E.) The grounds on which it was contended that the decree as against him was in absence were, that he had never authorised his name to be used in the multiplepoinding. The affidavit and claim put into process had been procured from him only in order to be used at a meeting of creditors; and the counsel who appeared both for the trustees to crave exoneration and to consent thereto for the creditors, were both instructed by the agent for the trustees. The Lord Ordinary (Alloway) found Goodsir was entitled to be reponed against the decree on payment of the expenses incurred by the trustees. But on a representation to the Inner House, he was allowed to be reponed on payment only of the expenses incurred subsequent to the 15th May 1819, the date of the decree of exoneration.

representatives of the nine trades were called for their interest in the multiplepoinding. They might have appeared, and it was said that if they had then appeared, and had a good case (a supposition which the pursuers cannot refuse to take) the whole expenses of the competition would never have occurred, and hence they have thus caused enormous expense to the defenders, which they now propose to render altogether fruitless by allowing the multiplepoinding to proceed on the assumption that the deceased died intestate.

Every part of this view of the case is open to various and complete answers.

If the office-bearers of the nine trades neglected their duty by not appearing, I apprehend that in this case the Magistrates and Council would clearly be entitled to appear for the town, and vindicate the right now claimed. It was said that the Magistrates and Council knew of the claim from not only general report, but information communicated to them, and ought on that account to pay down the whole expenses incurred by the defenders. That is much too loose, and I suppose any such ground for the condition of paying the expenses of another law-suit, in which the party was not cited—viz. that he knew of it—was never previously imagined by any one. The objection as to the nine trades would not therefore much avail the defenders, even if it were well founded.

As to the nine trades, I much doubt whether neglect of their office-bearers at the time—five years ago—to appear, could entail any such result as the forfeiture of their right, or the condition of paying down L.5000 or L.6000 of expenses before they can be heard. If they had appeared, a judgment against their office-bearers would no doubt have been res judicata. But I am not prepared to admit that neglect to appear must be attended with the result now demanded—the claim not being one in the competition to which the decree of preference applies.

No question of an intestate or testate succession is raised by the pursuers' case. The pursuers do not propose to establish a general will, appointing executors, and conveying, if good, the whole succession of the deceased. They simply set forth a particular writing or writings said to contain a bequest, which they say must be fulfilled by the party entitled to the intestate succession, to the extent which the Court may choose to allow, for the purpose stated in that writing.

Suppose the trades had appeared in the multiplepoinding, what would have been the course to be taken at the outset? No one was acknowledged to be any relative at all. Great doubt existed as to all the parties: even those who have prevailed had to prove a great deal, and they disproved altogether the relationship of those who claimed to be the nearest relations. It might turn out that none of the parties were relations, and the case of M'Lean shews how claimants in such a case may successively be shewn to be impostors. In that state of things, would the Court have gone on to try the validity of this paper for an hospital in Dundee, as the purpose to be fulfilled by the party entitled to the intestate succession, when it did not appear that there was any one entitled to the character of next of kin? Or, were the present pursuers to be put to the expense and vexation of trying this question with all the parties who had come forward as next of kin, when it might turn out that one and all were mere impostors? I have no notion that the Court could have begun the multiplepoinding by adopting any such course. I think the proper and natural course was first to enter into the competition between the claimants for the character of next of kin, and then, when it was ascertained who was the next of kin, would arise, in some form or other, the question as to the validity of any particular bequest claimable from such party. I have no doubt whatever that the competition would have gone on exactly as it has done between the claimants for the character of the next of kin. I look on the representation, therefore, that if the claim had been preferred in the multiplepoinding no expenses would have been incurred in the competition if the pursuer had been successful, as altogether groundless. I have no doubt that the question as to the validity of this bequest would have been superseded, and the competition gone on, just as it did actually do. Hence I see no room whatever for the demand from the pursuers for the expenses incurred in the multiplepoinding in establishing their character as next of kin, as the condition of the pursuers being allowed to come into Court.

Whether the matter is to be viewed with reference to the objects of this action, or the character and effect of the decree of preference, to any rules as to such decrees, or any views sanctioned by the Court as to the expenses of previous litigations, the pleas maintained by the defenders in this stage of the litigation must be repelled.

LORD MURRAY.—I have come to the same conclusion; and having listened to the very able arguments from the bar, I see no grounds for differing. The Act 1584 is a very valuable Act, but it is for the protection of parties subjected to double distress, and the reason of it is, that when a party has raised a multiplepinding, he ought not to be troubled by any parties who do not appear. Res judicata pro veritate habetur. The party must be protected, and here Mr Donald Lindsay would be entitled to the protection of the Act, if he had paid away the money. I do not see what benefit it would have been to the defenders had these parties here come forward earlier, and I do not think their delay has caused any otherwise unnecessary expense. The same expense would be incurred either way. That these parties incurred much expense in making their claim, cannot affect the law: they are the nearest of kin, and the pursuers do not seek to interfere with their title, or to reduce their rights in any way.

LORD COWAN.—When these parties proposed to appear in the multiplepinding, the proceedings had reached such a stage as to require, in the opinion of the Court, and in justice to the successful competitors, that decree should be pronounced, putting an end to that process. The whole competition had been directed to the enquiry as to which of the claimants were nearest of kin and heirs of line of the deceased, and entitled in that character to take up his whole succession, heritable and moveable. After years of litigation, decree was on the point of being pronounced, when the compearance was made; and in that situation, it was considered that some such proceeding as the institution of an action like the present was indispensable.

It is all important to attend to the precise nature and extent of the claim advanced in this action by the pursuers. Their contention is that the deceased left certain testamentary writings, containing a valid bequest for the purpose of erecting an hospital in the town of Dundee. It is not alleged that these writings contain a valid conveyance of the universitas of the deceased's estate. All that is maintained is, that they afford evidence of the deceased's intention to bequeath a specific legacy of so much of his estate as may be necessary to accomplish the purpose he had in view. Thus the claim is not such as to bring into competition the right of parties claiming to be executors-nominate with the title and right of the next of kin, and proper representatives of the deceased. On the contrary, it might have been advanced against executors-nominate, had there been a regular settlement left by the deceased equally, as against the intestate heirs in mobilibus. Again, as regards its extent, from the very nature of the claim that cannot be ascertained until the action has been proceeded with. The fulfilment of the bequest may cut deep into the succession of the deceased, or it may leave a large residuary fund to the next of kin after it is satisfied. But whatever be its extent, it is a claim to be made effectual against, and in competition with, the parties entitled to the estate generally, disburdened of debts and legacies, whether those parties be executors-nominate, or heirs ab intestato.

The summons contains conclusions declaratory and petitory, aptly and relevantly framed for trying the validity of the alleged bequest. It asks the Court to find that the erection and establishment of this hospital in Dundee is a burden on the succession of the deceased, for which funds must be provided out of the residue falling to the next of kin. The parties called as defenders are Mr Lindsay the judicial factor, the confirmed executor-dative, and the parties who have succeeded in establishing their right as next of kin against all the other claimants in that character. The parties called are the proper defenders in such an action; and although the title of the pursuers is objected to in the defences, it is beyond dispute that the Magistrates and Council of this royal burgh have sufficient right and title to institute proceedings in regard to a matter affecting the interests of the community, while the fact set forth in the summons that the hospital is destined for the education of "the poor children of the nine trades" is conclusive of the title of the other pursuers, as representing the nine incorporated trades of Dundee.

In this state of things, what are the objections taken to this action being allowed to proceed in the usual course? Having regard to the proceedings in the action of multiplepinding, and to the decree of preference pronounced in their favour, the defenders say that the action is objectionable, as incompetent, both generally and on the special grounds of the summons, containing no recissory conclusions. And further, they maintain that the payment of the expenses incurred by them in the action of multiplepinding is, in any view, a condition compliance with which is indispensable before the action is allowed to proceed.

I entertain no doubt either of the competency of the action or of its sufficiency, without recissory conclusions, to try the question which it is the object of the pursuers to have tried. It may be that the claim could have been made the subject of discussion in the multiplepinding. I think it might; but, although it had been made even at an early stage of the proceedings, I am not satisfied that its discussion would have taken precedence of the competing rights that were disposed of between the parties alleging themselves respectively to be next of kin. The nature of the claim, as I have said, is limited. It is not for the universitas of the estate, but for a specific legacy or bequest, burdening and affecting the universitas. No matter, although it may by possibility swallow up the personal estate, — which cannot, however, in hoc statu, be taken for granted, for it may, in course of the proceedings, be found to be of comparatively limited extent, — this does not affect the essential nature of the claim as specific and not universal, and burdening merely the general succession. Even if made in the multiplepinding, therefore, it by no means follows that the discussion of it either would have taken the lead, or would have prevented the parties competing for the character and rights of next of kin from going on in their competition. But whether it would or not, is truly of no consequence in the question of competency. The fact comes just to be this, that the universitas of the estate was the subject of competition in the multiplepinding, that decree has been pronounced in favour of the defenders, and that the special claim here made must now be directed against the parties preferred to the succession.

The decree of preference does not require to be reduced. Clear it is that the decree relative to the heritable estate is not in the least affected. But neither is it relative to the moveable estate, farther than this, that the succession to which the defenders have been preferred may, to a greater or less extent, be burdened, should the pursuers be successful in their declaratory conclusions. Subject to that order the decree stands.

It is said, however, that as the pursuers representing the nine trades were called in the multiplepinding, and as the other pursuers, the Magistrates and Council, pursue for the same interest, there is necessity for reduction by the very terms of the statute 1587, c. 3. I do not think that the present case falls within the statutory provisions. I concur in the observations of your Lordships as to that point. But, as I have said, no reduction of the decree obtained by the defenders, properly speaking, is required, or would have been competent, — certainly not in toto, but as preliminary to the discussion of this claim. If creditors of the deceased were appearing and claiming payment of their debts, they could not be required to reduce the decree of preference. Proceeding on the footing of that decree being fixed on the defenders the character and liabilities of representatives of the debtor, the demand against them would have been direct for payment. So the claim by special legatees. Reduction is no more necessary in the one case than in the other.

But then comes the question of payment of expenses as a condition of the action. £ L.6000, expended by the pursuers, is asked to be paid down in rounds of their claim. In reduction, that has been disapproved by the Lord's counsel, absolutely, of no principle or rule of actioning the proposition, capable of producing any desirable results. Take it that this specific bequest, the £ L.6000, and their full expenses £ L.8000, although it is by the decree preferred to the general succession as a condition of the action. But say that the pursuers may be to a comparatively hesitate to lay it down, that wherever there have been such defects, no sum that may have been paid to the party claiming relief can be held to have the character of proper parochial relief in a question of settlement; or that they can of themselves be conclusive against the plea, that, at the date contended for, and when the relief was afforded, he had come to be in that state which precluded his subsequent residence in the parish being of avail to give him a settlement in it. At the same time, I entirely agree with Lord Murray that there are many cases where relief or assistance may have been given by a parochial board, which could not be taken to be proper parochial relief.

But, then, there is the broader view of the case now before us—viz., whether in the circumstances, as appearing from the evidence, M'Nish, the alleged pauper, can be held to have been a proper object of parochial relief at the 19th October 1848; or, to state it more correctly, whether it can be justly said that he was not then able to maintain himself without having recourse to common begging by himself or his family, and without receiving parochial relief. I think there is not sufficient evidence to instruct that such was M'Nish's condition at the time, when it is contended by the parish of Dalrymple that he was entitled to relief as a pauper. In weighing the evidence, I conceive that the defects in the prescribed preliminary inquiries, and the want of any regular deliverance by the board, are important, and that the circumstances and condition of M'Nish, immediately and for some time both before and after the period when he is said to have become a proper object of parochial relief, are also most relevant matter for consideration. Taking the whole together, I concur in opinion with your Lordships that the interlocutors of the Sheriff ought to be adhered to.

LORD COWAN.—The observations of Lord Wood make it scarcely needful for me to say anything. The case might not have been unattended with difficulty had the pauper come forward and been demanding relief on the ground of residence for five years within the parish of Dalrymple. Could he, after he had asked for relief and got it within the five years, have maintained his right on the footing of his having acquired a residential settlement? This is the strongest way of putting the case for Dalrymple. The actual case, however, is different, and the facts are to be considered in their bearing on the relative rights of the two competing parishes. The pauper received two payments—one of 5s., and another of 2s. 6d.—within the five years. As regards the effect of relief given from mere temporary or occasional illness during the currency of the five years, there may be difficulty in holding the settlement period to be thereby interrupted. A single payment, such as was here made, could scarcely have that effect. But the case, as put by the advocator's counsel, does not raise that question. Permanent disability commencing at the date when the 5s. were paid, as in a case requiring permanent relief, is the proposition alleged to be established by the proof. And certainly if this be so, there was no acquisition of a residential settlement by the pauper in Dalrymple. But is this the truth of the case? This man's settlement was the parish of Dalrymple, unless he had bona fide received or applied for parochial relief within the five years. This is a matter of fact into which the Court is entitled to inquire. Suppose we had had to consider in the question of settlement, and as a part of the five years, the condition of this pauper and his family after Martinmas, when it appears they were receiving from the parochial funds 2s. 6d. a month,—would not the Court have been entitled and been bound to investigate whether there had been a bona fide exercise of their discretion by the parochial board in giving that relief in the proved circumstances of the pauper? If that power were not in the Court, very great abuse might occur in such cases. Now the pauper himself says, that at and from Martinmas he got 6s. a-week, including the 1s. spent on tobacco, and got besides bed and board. It would be a perversion of the statute to say that that man was entitled to parochial relief. Now, are not the 5s. in October, and the 2s. 6d. in November, in an equally bad position? The payment of 5s. was made to the wife on an untrue statement—viz., that the man was "lying," i.e. bedridden, which was not the fact, and we must put it out of the question. I quite agree as to that with the views which have been stated. Thus all that remains is the sum of 2s. 6d. paid on the 18th November. This was only four days before the expiry of the five years, and before the date when the pauper came into the enjoyment of wages and bed and board, which clearly removed him from the class of paupers. On that ground, and independently of the suspicious nature of the payment (for I do not go on the conduct of the inspector), I think this single payment cannot be held to have interrupted the currency of the period requisite to fix the pauper's settlement through residence in Dalrymple.

Trust—Construction.—Landed estates were conveyed to trustees, with directions to settle them upon the truster's granddaughter on her marriage or majority (in April 1849), but declaring that in the event of her marriage without the approbation of the trustees, her interest in the estates should cease and determine. The granddaughter having married (in August 1848) without the knowledge and consent of the trustees, they raised a multiplepinding for the purpose of ascertaining on whom they were to settle the estate, and, in obedience to an interlocutor of the Court, they lodged a minute stating that they were willing to give their consent to the marriage. The Court held that the subsequent consent was enough to avert the forfeiture.

(1.) Thereafter the heiress claimed the bygone and accruing rents from the date of her marriage in 1848, or of her majority in 1849. But, by subsequent agreement, she allowed the trustees to draw the whole of crop 1849 and the first half of 1850. Out of these rents the trustees expended L.145 in building a cattle shed for the tenant of one of the farms. This was objected to by the residuary legatees—amongst whom the accumulated rents of the estate, so long as vested in the trustees, were directed to be divided—as being an application of the trust-funds in favour of the heiress, and to the loss of the residuary legatees.—Objection repelled.

Trust—Expenses.—(2.) The trust-settlement provided that the expense of the entail should be defrayed out of the trust-funds. The heiress employed a separate agent to look after her title. Objection to his accounts being paid out of the trust-funds sustained.

Factor.—(3.) The trustees employed one of their number to act as factor, agent, and cashier ;—Held (applying judgment in the case of Lord Gray and others), that he was not entitled to any professional remuneration whatever.

(4.) The factor having placed the trust-funds realised in the management of the estate in his own banking account, charged himself with bank interest thereupon, and having at various times advanced funds to the estate, charged the trustees with bank interest thereupon ;—Held, that a factor so mixing up trust-funds with his own proper funds was liable to pay interest at the highest legal rate, but was entitled to charge bank interest on his advances.

THE late Mr Wellwood died in February 1847. He left a widow and an only child—Mrs Boswell—then also a widow, with a family of four children. By trust-disposition and settlement, Mr Wellwood appointed his widow and Mr

The trustees also accepted of the office of tutors and curators to the truster's grandchildren, so far as regarded the provisions settled upon them by the deed. To each of the trustees the truster bequeathed a sum of L.50. The trust-estate consisted of the lands of Foleyhill and Colinton Mains,—L.650 contained in a bond and disposition in security, and personal property amounting to L.7643, 19s. 1d.

Boswell or Hill.

By the eighth purpose of the trust, the trustees were directed, upon the marriage of Miss Boswell, or upon the death of Mrs Wellwood, if Miss Boswell should then have attained majority, or upon her attaining majority, in the event of her grandmother's predecease, to entail and secure the lands of Foleyhill "to and in favour of the said Maria Ann Boswell, and the heirs whomsoever of her body;" whom failing, to and in favour of Miss Boswell's mother. By the same purpose of the trust it was declared, that "in the event of the said Mary Ann Boswell marrying without the approbation of my said trustees first had and obtained, then and in that case her right and interest in the said lands shall immediately cease and determine; and if prior to her marriage the same may have been settled upon her, and she shall marry without such consent and approbation, the next heir of entail called to the succession shall be entitled to take up the succession in the same way as if the said Maria Ann Boswell were naturally dead; and which declaration, in the event of the lands being conveyed and entailed to her before her marriage, shall be engrossed in the deed of entail to be executed in her favour."

Mr Wellwood also directed his trustees to accumulate the surplus of the rents and produce arising from the said trust lands, "so long as vested in them," and to pay over the sums, with the whole residue of his means and estate, after payment of his debts, legacies, and obligations, so far as not directed to be made real burdens upon his said lands, to his four grandchildren, "equally between them, and the survivors or survivor of them, and that at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the entail of the said lands has been executed."

Miss Boswell attained majority on 29th April 1849. In August 1848 she married Mr Alexander Rattray, but without the consent of the trustees being asked or obtained to her marriage. In these circumstances Mr Wellwood's trustees, in 1850, raised the present action of multiplepoining and exoneration, for the purpose of having the rights of parties judicially determined.

Mrs Rattray (Miss Boswell) claimed to have the lands directed to be settled and entailed upon her and the other heirs of entail, in terms of the eighth purpose of the trust-deed.

The other heirs of entail maintained that Mrs Rattray's right had been forfeited in consequence of her marriage without the previous approbation of the trustees.

After the preparation of a record, the Lord Ordinary reported the case to the First Division, who pronounced an interlocutor on 30th May 1851, appointing the raisers "to state to the Court whether any, and if any, what steps have hitherto been taken towards obtaining their consent to, and approbation of, the marriage of Mrs Rattray; and also whether they are now willing to give their consent to, and approbation of, the said marriage." In compliance with this interlocutor the raisers lodged minutes, giving their consent; and thereupon the Court, on 21st June 1851, ranked and preferred Mrs Rattray on the fund in medio, in terms of her claim.¹

removed, Mr and Mrs Rattray, on 3d July 1851, lodged an additional claim, wherein, founding on the eighth purpose of the trust, and the interlocutor of 21st June 1851, she craved, inter alia, "to be preferred on the fund in medio, so far as consisting of the bygone and accruing rents of the lands of Foleyhills and others, to the effect of drawing the said rents from and after the month of December 1848, being the date of the claimant's marriage, or from and after April 1849, being the date of her majority, as the periods alternatively when the said lands ought to have been settled or entailed upon her, or from such other date as may be found to have been the proper terminus at which Mrs Rattray's right shall be held to have begun under the eighth purpose of the trust."

No. 47.

Dec. 17, 1856.
Wellwood's
Trustees v.
Boswell or
Hill.

Ultimately, in 1852, Mrs Rattray agreed to allow the trustees to draw the whole rent of crop 1849 and the first half of the crop 1850. This arrangement was embodied in a joint minute by Mrs Rattray and her husband on the one hand, and her brothers and sisters, including Sibella Boswell, now Mrs Hill, on the other. In the condescendence for the trustees, it was stated that "Mr Sands, who acted for Miss Sibella Boswell, had no special authority to make this arrangement on her behalf; but having long been the family agent, he took upon himself to make it, seeing that she might benefit by it." Following out the above arrangement, an entail in favour of Mrs Rattray was duly executed, providing for various legacies, and an annuity to Mrs Clarke, all directed to be made real burdens on the entailed lands.

The trustees now stated that the whole special purposes of the trust had been fulfilled. In the accounts lodged by them, they debited themselves for behoof of the general and residuary legatees with the rents of the entailed lands for crop 1849 and the first half of crop 1850; and, on the other hand, they took credit for all payments on account of these lands applicable to the same period. Among these payments was a sum of L.145, on 16th December 1850, for building a cattle-shed on the farm of Colinton Mains.

The accounts of Mr Sands, the factor, had been audited and adjusted by Mr Donald Lindsay, accountant, and Mr Thomas Ranken, S.S.C. The trustees now stated that the duties performed by Mr Sands far exceeded his own proper share of the general duties of his office, and had he not so acted, it would have been necessary for the trustees to employ some neutral party to act as factor, cashier, and law-agent for them. The fact of Mr Sands having acted as such, had not occasioned any extra charge or expense whatever to the trust-estate.

Miss Sibella Boswell, one of the truster's grandchildren, and, as such, interested in the succession, married, in 1853, Mr Hill; and she and her husband now lodged objections to certain proceedings of the trustees. They objected, in the first place, to credit being given to the trustees for the disbursement of L.145 for building a cattle-shed on the farm of Colinton Mains. There was no requirement in the lease of the lands between the truster and the tenant for the building of additional houses at Colinton Mains, and the trust-estate received no benefit therefrom. Such expenditure was unauthorised by the trust-deed. It was an application of the trust-funds in favour of the heiress of entail and her husband to the loss and damage of the residuary legatees.

With regard to this objection, the trustees explained that it was only after mature consideration that they agreed to erect the building referred to. It was right and proper in the circumstances, and only what any prudent landlord would have authorised. They acted in the matter in optima fide, and to the best of their judgment.

(2.) Again, under the trust-deed all the expenses connected with the making up of the title of entail were to be paid out of the trust-estate. Mrs Rattray's agent, Mr Gardner, S.S.C., under this provision, made a claim for the whole of his account connected with looking after his client's title, lodged it in process, and enrolled the case to get an order for payment. The trustees objected to this, and to save the expense of making up a record, the question was referred to Mr Ranken, W.S., who sustained the claim to the extent of L.25, 16s. 6d., after taking off above L.50.

This payment was objected to on the ground that the account was only due by Mrs Rattray, and payment thereof by the trustees out of the trust-estate was a misapplication of the trust-funds.

(3.) It was farther objected to the accounts of Mr Sands, that they contained charges for professional remuneration, trouble, or responsibility, on the ground that, as one of the trustees, he was not entitled to profit and emolument from the trust as its law-agent or factor, and was only entitled to all his proper disbursements, which the objectors were willing to allow, and as the same should be ascertained by the Auditor of Court.

(4.) It was also objected that, in the accounts of charge and discharge between Mr Sands and the trustees, he was liable for interest on all sums in his hands at the legal rate. On the other hand, Mr Sands claimed and reserved the right, if the accounts were to be held open, to increase his charges, and, in particular, to charge a higher rate of commission than he had done. He explained that he never retained money in his hands, except until he had realised sufficient to enable him seriatim to discharge the liabilities of the trustees, and that for a short time he was actually in advance for the trust.

(5.) They also objected to a charge of L.5, 5s. as a notary fee, which was admitted to be an error, and was withdrawn. The trustees pleaded;—(1.) That Mr Sands having acted as factor, cashier, and agent for all the trustees, was, in the circumstances, entitled to his charges for commission and agency bona fide and properly incurred. (2.) More especially, there being no part of Mr Sands' charges which could be held to be applicable solely to what he was bound to do himself exclusively qua trustee, or otherwise, there was no ground for any deduction from such charges. (3.) In the circumstances, all the other objections taken against the accounts in question were ill-founded, and ought to be disallowed. More particularly, credit had been properly taken, and ought to be allowed, for the expense of farm-buildings at Colinton Mains, in respect that such expense was a fair and reasonable disbursement by the trustees in the charge and management of the estate, and in respect also of the settlement with Mrs Rattray having taken place on the footing that such disbursement was not to be disturbed.

The objectors pleaded,—1. That testamentary trustees were not entitled to charge salary, commission, or profit for the management of the trust, nor to appoint one of their own number to an office entitling him to receive salary, commission, or profit out of the trust-funds; and all such items should be disallowed. 2. The trustee, Mr Sands, was liable for interest at the rate of five per cent on all sums of money in his hands, such monies having been mixed up with his own funds in bank accounts in his own name, or otherwise used by him in his business. 3. The application of the trust-funds for any purposes other than those warranted by the trust-deed, was illegal; and the accounts should be rectified to the effect of disallowing all such items. 4. The claimants, Mr and Mrs Rattray, having obtained a judgment of the Court upon a closed record on a claim which excluded payment to them of rents falling due while the estates subsequently entailed stood vested in the trustees, were barred from insisting in a claim to these rents, and the payments of a certain portion of these rents to them was unwarrantable. 5. The expenditure upon the steading at Colinton Mains not being in conformity with the directions of the trust-deed, nor a legitimate subject for the disbursement of trust-funds, the charge fell to be disallowed. It could not be justified on the ground of an alleged agreement as to the rents, even if the agreement were otherwise binding, seeing that it formed no part of the agreement.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that both parties have expressed their adherence to the arrangement made on 25th February 1852, by which the additional claim of Mrs Rattray was disposed of; and having considered the objections taken to the accounts of the trustees, repels the objection taken to the charge in the trustees' accounts for L.145, expended in December 1850 in building a cattle-shed on the farm of Colinton Mains: Finds that Mr Warren H. Sands, himself a trustee, acted as factor, cashier, and law-agent for the trust, and that his accounts, after due examination, have been found to be sufficiently vouched, and to be reasonable in amount: Finds that Mr Sands is not entitled to charge any commission or factor's fee against the trust-estate for his management as factor and cashier: Finds that in so far as Mr Sands' accounts as law-agent have been incurred in the conduct of suits in which the trustees were parties, and he acted as agent for the trust in the suit, he is entitled to make a charge against the trust-estate for his professional remuneration; but that, in so far as his said accounts have been incurred in the administration of the affairs of the trust, apart from judicial proceedings, Mr Sands is not entitled to claim against the trust-estate any professional remuneration, but only to be reimbursed his outlay: Repels the objection by the claimants to the charge for L.25, paid to Mr Gardner, the agent of the heiress of entail, for his business account in the execution of the entail, which, by the terms of the trust-deed, the trustees were bound to execute, and to that extent sustains the charge against the trust-estate: Finds that the charge of L.5, 5s., referred to in statement 20th for the objectors, is admitted to be an error, and to that extent sustains, of consent, the objection to the trustees' accounts: Finds that, under all the circumstances, the interest chargeable against Mr Sands during his management has been fairly stated in the accounts, and that no higher interest is exigible: With these findings, appoints the cause to be put to the roll with a view to the ascertainment of the fact as to residence from Martinmas 1849 to Whitsunday 1850, and with a view to procedure in the multiplepounding and exoneration." *

* "NOTE.—The point of difficulty in the case relates to the business accounts of Mr Sands, W.S., who being himself a trustee, was factor, cashier, and law-agent to the trust. He had been previously agent for the family, and was well acquainted with the affairs. He was one of several trustees, and when he was appointed factor, a quorum was left to control him, and his management has been satisfactory to all the trustees, and favourably reported on by Mr Donald Lindsay and Mr Thomas Ranken. LORD PRESIDENT.—The points which the Lord Ordinary has decided are numerous, and had better be dealt with by us in the order in which they are presented to us in his Lordship's interlocutor. According to that order, the first point relates to a sum of L.145 expended by the trustees in building a cattle-shed on the farm of Colinton Mains in December 1850. Mr Hill objects to the trustees being allowed to take credit for that sum. The Lord Ordinary has allowed them to do so, and the question is, whether we are to confirm or alter the judgment of the Lord Ordinary on that point.

It appears that the heiress of entail attained majority in April 1849. She had been married in August 1848, but she had been married without the consent of the trustees, and, according to the terms of her grandfather's settlement, their consent was required. Under these circumstances, a question was raised as to her right of succession, and eventually the Court allowed the trustees to state whether they would give their consent to the marriage or not. They did consent to it; and the Court then held that Miss Boswell was entitled to succeed. The expenditure here in question was made at the desire of the tenant of the farm of Colinton Mains. There was no obligation expressed in the lease under which the trustees or landlord could be required to expend money in erecting a cattle-shed. The lease also was for nineteen years from Martinmas 1840, and the disbursement was made in 1850,—therefore about the middle of the lease. The rent was stated to be upwards of L.400, and the expenditure in question L.145.

It appears from certain minutes, not printed, but which have been read to us, that the tenant had applied for this expenditure in November 1848, but that the trustees had then refused to grant it. It also appears that the tenant had renewed the application in 1849, and that then the trustees considered it reasonable and expedient to allow it. They directed the cattle-shed to be erected, and arranged with the tenant that he should defray the expense of erecting it, and should retain the expense out of the rent; and he did retain it at the end of the year 1850, out of the rent for as to bring the case within the operation of the principle recognised under special circumstance in Ommaney v. Smith, 3d March 1854 (16 Dun., p. 721.) It was contended by the trustees that Mr Sands being one of several trustees, and there being a quorum without him, he is not within the general rule, and the case of Craddock v. Pyper, 18th January 1850, was strongly founded on in support of this argument. But after careful consideration of the decision in Craddock v. Pyper by Lord Cottenham (Hall v. Twells, Cham. Rep., v. 1, p. 617), as well as the previous case of New v. Jones, 8th August 1833 (reported in a note to the report of Craddock v. Pyper, as above, p. 63), decided by Lord Lyndhurst when Chief Baron, and the more recent case of Lincoln v. Windsor, 9th July 1851 (Law Journ., v. 20, Chan. Rep., p. 531) decided by Vice-Chancellor Turner, the Lord Ordinary has felt himself unable to recognise any ground of exception from the general rule, in the mere fact that the trustee acting as agent is not a sole trustee, but one of several. In the case last mentioned, the point is expressly referred to by the Vice-Chancellor, and no ground for this distinction is recognised, and in the case of the Bon Accord Assurance Company v. Soutter's Trustees, 13th June 1850 (12 Dun., 1010) the claim for professional remuneration was rejected, though there were several trustees. A distinction in regard to agency in a suit, where the trustees were parties, where a law-agent must have been employed, and where the costs of the estate have not been augmented, seems to have been recognised in England, and also in the case of Findlay's Trustees v. M'Omie, 6th March 1852 (14 Dun., p. 621), and to this exception effect has been given in the present case.

“It cannot be otherwise than reluctantly that the Lord Ordinary has felt himself compelled to disallow charges by an agent of the highest respectability, for business necessary and proper, and conducted on terms not denied to be reasonable. But where a general rule of a salutary, though severe character, has been adopted and judicially announced, it must be firmly and inflexibly administered: at least, the Lord Ordinary cannot venture to introduce any further modification of the rule than what has been already recognised in regard to the costs of judicial proceedings.”

the year 1849. These are the facts. Then it appears that in the question whether Miss Wellwood was to succeed to the estate, or was precluded by her marriage,— judgment having been pronounced in her favour,—the farther question arose as to the date from which she was to be entitled to the rents of the estate? and, also, what amount of them should go towards the accumulation directed to be made by the trust-deed? And by minute of agreement it appears that she was to get the rents for the last half of 1850, and not any of the previous rents.

Wellwood's
Trustees v.
Boswell or
Hill.

The parties interested in the succession now contend that there was no obligation on the landlord, and, consequently, none on the trustees, to erect this shed: that it was a gratuitous act on their part for the permanent benefit of the estate, and not for the interest of the parties entitled to the accumulated rents up to the period of the majority or marriage of the heiress of entail, and, consequently, that the disbursement cannot be charged as trust-expenditure in the management of the estate to be defrayed from the rents coming into the hands of the trustees for the purposes of such management.

It appears to us, upon the whole, that the Lord Ordinary has arrived at a right conclusion in this matter. The arrangement as between the landlord and tenant appears to be unquestionably a judicious and proper arrangement; and not only so, but it appears to have been more or less necessary to maintain the tenant in the enjoyment of the lease then current. At the time the arrangement was made, the rents out of which the tenant was allowed to retain the expenditure were the rents of 1849. According to the course of succession—if there had been no disturbance of it—these rents would have belonged to the heiress of entail, and, in that case, the burden would have fallen upon her. But, by an arrangement subsequently made, she surrendered as a matter of compromise two years' rents of the estate, and agreed to take the rents from the last half of 1850. Now, it had already been arranged that a sum of L.145 was to be retained by the tenant out of the rents of 1849. It had been retained out of these rents, and, therefore, when the heiress of entail surrendered the rents of these years, she surrendered them as they stood, subject to the arrangements which had already been concluded between the trustees and the tenant as to this expenditure.

The next point relates to the accounts of Mr Sands. The recent judgments of the whole Court settle that point. The broad principle laid down is, that a trustee, in a position which gives him an interest which may possibly be adverse to the estate, is not entitled, in reference to the estate, and in the management of it, to put himself in a position which may give him a bias, and prevent him from discharging faithfully disinterested duties. The judgment of the Court on that point is conclusive. Therefore that part of the interlocutor falls to be altered.

Then, as to Mr Gardner's account, the amount is certainly not large. But it does not appear to us that there was any ground here for calling on Mr Gardner to act at the expense of the estate. The entail was made with such advice as the trustees chose to take, and under a remit from the Court. In these circumstances, it does not appear to us that there was any occasion to employ Mr Gardner at the expense of the estate for Mrs Rattray's behoof.

There then comes the question of interest. That is of considerable importance as a question of principle. Mr Sands was acting as factor and agent for the trust. He was also one of the trustees. I presume that this trust required the command of certain funds, and also that a balance from time to time arose; and Mr Sands, in his accounts, has given the trustees credit for the same interest they would have got if such balance had been deposited in a bank account. It does not appear that there were any accumulations as in bank-accounts, but the rate of interest he allowed them was the same. On the other hand it is contended that a party being trustee is not entitled to keep in his hands funds of the trust, he being trustee and factor, and that, if he does so, he must be liable for interest, not at the rate of bank-interest, but at the highest legal rate, whatever that may be, and also that he would require to have the interest periodically adjusted. In some cases, such a rule may be very essential, because the trust-funds may be in great peril if in the hands of a trustee. If of considerable amount, great loss may accrue to the estate, and it could not be clear, without mixing up an investigation into the parties' own funds, how the matter stood in regard to these funds. The perils are considerable, even in regard to persons whose affairs appear to be in a flourishing condition. That observation does not apply merely to an agent who is trustee, but to merchants and others who may be factors on an estate. Again, a trustee, who may also be acting as factor and agent for the trust, may be a person of unquestionable wealth and of undoubted solvency, but it does not appear to the Court that they can make any distinction between such a case and that of a person of less reputed wealth and more doubtful solvency, for it appears to them that it is the only safe course to require that the trust-funds should be disposed of in a way which shall separate them from the proper funds of the person so managing them, and it is easy to do so by having a separate bank-account, in which the trust-funds will be deposited, and be accessible at all times. No doubt, if the party is in advance beyond the amount in the bank-account, he will receive proper remuneration for these advances. But in regard to the interest paid by him,—if he does not take the course of separating the trust-funds from his own, it appears to us that there is no ground for distinguishing between the case of a respectable and responsible person, and a person who may be of questionable responsibility, and, therefore, we think that, in this case, Mr Sands must pay interest at the highest legal rate upon all the trust-funds at any time in his possession.

On the other hand, where there has been an advance by him, he is entitled to the bank-interest which he charges.

LORDS IVORY and CURRIEHILL concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—(After a finding approving of the rate of board allowed by the trustees to Mrs Boswell, afterwards Mrs Clark, for Marion Ann Boswell or Rattray, the grandchild of the truster, and the heiress of entail)—“Sustain the charge for the said allowance, without any deduction: Recall the finding in the said interlocutor in reference to the accounts of Mr Warren H. Sands, or Messrs Sands, as law-agent or law-agents for the trustees and trust-estate in the conduct of suits in which the trustees were parties: Find, that Mr Warren H. Sands himself being a trustee, the business charges in the accounts of himself as law-agent, and those of Messrs Sands as law-agents, of which firm Mr W. H. Sands is a partner, cannot be sustained, except to the extent of costs out of pocket, and, except to that extent, that Mr Wellwood's trustees are not entitled to credit for the business accounts of Mr W. H. Sands, or Messrs Sands, and sustain to that extent the objection of Mr and Mrs Hill: Recall the said interlocutor, in so far as it repels the objection by Mr and Mrs Hill to the charge of L.25, paid to Mr Gardner, the agent of the heiress of entail, and sustain their objection to that charge: Recall the said interlocutor, in so far as it has reference to the interest chargeable against Mr W. H. Sands during his management: Find that, in the circumstances of the case, Mr Sands falls to be charged with interest at the rate of four cent. per annum on all trust-moneys in his hands from time to time, and that his trust-accounts fall to be balanced annually, so that the yearly balance, on whichever side of the account it may be, may bear interest. Quoad ultra, refuse the prayers of both of the notes, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and decern: Farther, they remit to the Lord Ordinary to give effect to the present interlocutor, and to proceed in the cause as shall be just, and reserve all question of expenses.

Jury trial—Process—Examination of witness by commission.—A case being put out for trial, motion by the pursuer to examine a witness by commission, on the ground of the dangerous illness of his wife, refused, the defender objecting, and offering to consent to postponement of the trial.

See ante, vol. xviii., p. 862.

In this case, the following issue was adjusted on 23d May 1856:—"It being admitted that, on 27th July 1855, and at or near Cove station, on the defenders' line of railway, one of the ordinary passenger trains on the said line came into collision with an excursion train, then standing at or near the said station, in consequence of which, the pursuer (a passenger by the said excursion train) sustained a fracture of both bones of the left leg, immediately below the knee, and a severe contusion upon the knee and other parts of the left leg—

"Whether the said collision occurred through the fault of the defenders, to the loss and damage of the pursuer?"

The case was put out for trial at the sittings on 22d December current, and was now enrolled, on the motion of the pursuer, for a commission to examine the medical man, resident at Aberdeen, who attended the pursuer after the accident. The reason assigned was, that the witness would be unfit to attend the trial in consequence of the dangerous illness of his wife. No medical certificate was produced. The motion was made on the receipt of the country agent's letter, stating the circumstances.

Millar, for the pursuer, admitted that there was no precedent for the application. It was not expressly provided for by the Act of Sederunt of 16th February 1841; but he appealed to the nobile officium of the Court to grant it.

Gordon, for the defenders, objected—That the case did not fall within the Act of Sederunt. Besides, it was important for the defenders to have this witness at the trial; and, rather than dispense with his attendance, they would not object to the trial being postponed. In these circumstances it would be a dangerous precedent to grant the motion, besides unjust to the defenders, even if the Court had the power to grant it, which, however, was doubtful.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Even as presented to us—independently of the element of the defenders' consenting to delay the trial—this case is not brought up to the point at which we could grant this motion, but more especially when the defenders do not oppose the remedy which the pursuer has by delaying the trial.

LORD IVORY.—I concur. As to how far the Court may go where an extreme case is brought out, I will not say. There may be cases where no compulsitor of any Court could bring a man from the deathbed of a near and dear relation.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur.

LORD DEAS.—I also concur. But I do not wish to go upon the position of the witness being insufficient to excuse his attendance, but upon the inexpediency of taking proof by commission, where there is, as in this case, a consent to postpone the trial.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie

Issues had been adjusted in this case, and the case put out for trial at the Christmas recess. The pursuer now moved to have the trial postponed. An affidavit was produced by Mr Sprott, W.S., setting forth that, a few days ago, the solicitor who up to that date had acted as the defender's agent had given up his agency :¹ that the pursuer was in jail, one of his incarcerating creditors being his landlord : that he, Mr Sprott, had since been applied to by the pursuer and some of his principal creditors to conduct the case, but that the materials for the trial prepared by the former agent were not complete ; that there was a very insufficient precognition ; and that although furnished with the names of intended witnesses, he was not aware where he might find them ; and that the short interval till the trial would not suffice for the purpose of the necessary enquiries : that the papers were numerous and complicated, and the case was such that in the circumstances it was impossible for him to undertake to bring the case forward for trial at the ensuing Christmas recess.

Cook, for the defenders, opposed the motion. This new agent had been acting in the case for one of the pursuer's creditors for a long time, and unless the mere change of agency were to be held a sufficient ground for postponing the trial, there seemed nothing else to call for the interference of the Court. Much procrastination had already occurred in the case.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—" Having considered the notice of motion for Gavin Scott, No. 221 of process, with the affidavit by Mr Sprot, his present agent,—Discharge the order for trial at the next sittings, and appoint the trial of the cause for the Spring sittings."

Burt v. Burt.

Process—Summons—Objection that all parties not called.—In an action of count and reckoning against the representatives of a party alleged to have been sole executrix, the plea was taken that there were co-executors whose representatives ought also to have been called, but were not, and could not, in respect all claim against them was extinguished by the negative prescription,—Repelled, so far as insisted in as preliminary (affirming judgment of Lord Handyside).

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Handyside
L.

DAVID BURT of Arngask brought this action against his sisters, Margaret Burt or Henderson and Beatrix Burt or Baxter, and their husbands for their interests, as executors nominate and universal disponees of the deceased Isabella Low or Burt, their mother. The action concluded for exhibition of Mrs Burt's intromissions from 1807 till 1816—when the pursuer attained majority—with the estate of her husband, as sole accepting executrix, in order that the amount of the residue of his moveable means and effects, and the share thereof bequeathed and due to the pursuer, might be ascertained.

The defenders stated that they had no personal knowledge of the amount or nature of the moveable estate left by their father at his death, which took place nearly fifty years ago ; that they never heard that the pursuer alleged any claim against his father's executry until they were served with the present summons. The executors were all dead before the action was raised ; but from the inquiries which the defenders had made, they had ascertained various circumstances, which they narrated at length, and, inter alia, that their father in his settlement nominated two other persons to be executors besides his wife, and that they all accepted. They therefore pleaded;—"That the action being brought against the representatives of the deceased Mrs Burt, as sole executrix of her husband, and there being two other executors who accepted and acted, the action fell to be dismissed. The pursuer cannot now insist on his claims against the representatives of one of the executors, in respect he has allowed his claim against the representatives of the other two executors to be extinguished by the negative prescription. All parties are not called, and the action cannot be proceeded with, as the other parties who should be made defenders cannot now be called, the long negative prescription being in any view run so far as they are concerned."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators upon the preliminary defences, repels the same so far as insisted in as preliminary; and the defenders intimating that they do not mean to acquiesce, Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

The defenders reclaimed, and prayed the Court to sustain these pleas so far as preliminary, and dismiss the action.¹

Counsel for the respondent were not called on.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—The action is laid on the sole liability of the defenders, and therefore it is out of the question that any one else should be called.

LORD DEAS.—That view may be more favourable to the defenders than if we were to sustain their plea.

THE COURT adhered, with additional expenses.

No. 51.

Implied Discharge.—Circumstances in which held that a party, who tendered delivery of goods as on the order of a copartnery, had agreed to make the furnishings as one to a new firm that succeeded the other in its business, and to take the new firm as indebted to them, and had discharged their claim for the price against the original copartnery.

Obligation—Delegation.—Question, whether the circumstances here amounted to delegation?

PEARSTON raised this action against the firm of Wilson and M'Lean, and Robert Wilson and John M'Lean, individual partners, concluding for payment of L.59, 17s., the price of certain glazed press paper "sold and delivered by the pursuer to the said firm of Wilson and M'Lean, and to the said individual partners of that firm, defenders, on or about the 19th day of September 1853."

In October of that year the firm was dissolved, M'Lean retired, and a new company was formed under the name of Wilson, M'Mutrie, and Paterson. In March 1854 this new firm was also dissolved, and Wilson became bankrupt, and his estates were sequestrated. In the present action judgment was allowed to go against him; but defences were given in by Maclean, who admitted, 1st, that the goods were ordered, the following being the terms of the order which was addressed to Pearston, and dated 14th April 1853:—"Please order eight gross pasteboard glazed as sample, size 37 + 25½, at 3d. per lb., to be ready in July.—WILSON and M'LEAN." And 2d, that they were sent on 19th September to the premises of Wilson and Maclean, and invoiced to them; but he said he (the defender), for his said firm, declined to receive them in implement of the order, although at the pursuer's request, and for the pursuer's convenience, he allowed them to be temporarily deposited at the pursuer's risk, and at the same time he returned to the pursuer the invoice of the goods, with a notice written thereon of his refusal to receive them as under said order, and that they would lie at the pursuer's risk; that the pursuer having failed to remove the goods from said premises, the other defender (Wilson) requested the pursuer to charge them against himself, or his new firm of Wilson, M'Mutrie, and Paterson, and the pursuer agreed to do so, accepted them as his debtors, giving them credit therefor, and applying to them for payment; and farther, that on the dissolution of the partnership of Wilson and M'Lean, Pearston had rendered and accepted payment—partly in November 1853, the balance on 3d March 1854—of his account, in which, although the last entry was there was no charge made for the price of the goods sent on 19th September, and that it was only after the dissolution of the firm of Wilson, M'Mutrie, and Paterson, that the claim was made as against Wilson and Maclean. A proof was led, after advising which, the Sheriff-substitute (Steele) found, inter alia, “that the order was executed and the goods actually delivered into the defenders' place of business, and kept there, on or about 19th September, and while the partnership still subsisted and carried on business: That the defenders were duly debited in the pursuer's books at the time with the price of the said goods, and that an invoice was rendered to them accordingly: No sufficient proof that the pursuer did then or afterwards agree to abandon his claim against the defenders, and to substitute as his debtors the firm of Wilson, M'Mutrie, and Paterson, which ultimately succeeded to the business carried on by the defenders, which firm does not appear to have been formed, or at least to have commenced business, at the time the goods were delivered;” and therefore decerned in terms of the libel.

The Sheriff-depute (Alison) pronounced an interlocutor taking a different view of the facts, in which, inter alia, he “Finds that the defenders declined to take the goods as they were not delivered in time, and as in the interim it had been agreed to substitute a new firm in place of the defenders who first ordered the goods: Finds it proved that the invoice was the same day returned with a pencil marking on the back of it, to the effect that the defenders would not take in the goods: Finds, that upon this the pursuer called on the defenders, when Mr M'Lean continued his refusal to take the goods, and the pursuer agreed with Mr Wilson on the part of the proposed new firm to take the goods: Finds it admitted that the new firm used the goods: Finds, in these circumstances, in point of law, that the defenders were justified in refusing to take delivery of the goods ordered, on the ground of mora, and that the pursuer accepted the new firm as the real purchasers of the goods;” and therefore he sustained the defences.

A note of advocacy was presented by Pearston, and taken directly to the Second Division, who arrived at the same conclusion with the Sheriff-depute, but, differing from him as to the import of the proof, pronounced an interlocutor containing the following findings in fact:—“Find, in point of fact, that the goods in question were ordered from the pursuer by Robert Wilson, the partner of the defenders' firm, by the document No. 3-7, during the subsistence of the copartnery: Find that the order was executed, and the goods were sent by the pursuer to the defenders' place of business, along with an invoice, as goods furnished to Wilson and M'Lean: Find that, at the time of delivery, a proposal was made to the pursuer by Wilson, as well as by the defender who received the goods, that as the firm of Wilson and M'Lean was just to be dissolved in a few days, and a new company to be founded by Wilson, as Wilson, M'Mutrie, and Paterson, the pursuer should take that new company as his debtors for the said goods: Find that the pursuer then opened a new account in his ledger in the name of Wilson, M'Mutrie, and Paterson; in the first entry in which he debits that new No. 51.

company with that furnishing and the price thereof as on September 19, Dec. 18, 1856.
1853: Find that such entry stood uncanceled * for a very long period; and Pearston v.

payment of an account due by Wilson and M'Lean, including the last furnishing to them, ending 30th September, in which the goods in question were not entered: Therefore find, in point of fact, that the pursuer did agree to make the furnishing as one to Wilson, M'Mutrie, and Paterson, and to take them as indebted to him for the price of the same."

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have to decide this case upon the evidence, and not upon the findings of the Sheriff; and I arrive at the same result as he has done, although I think he has fallen into some mistakes in his findings. There is no doubt that the goods were ordered by Wilson and M'Lean, and that they were sent to them with a regular invoice, and, in point of fact, were retained on their premises. But M'Lean states, in defence, that the goods were in reality charged against another firm, namely, Wilson, M'Mutrie, and Paterson, and were used by them. That is a defence which must be very clearly made out; and M'Lean says, it is established by the pursuer's own books, and neither party availed themselves of an opportunity we gave of supplementing the proof led in the Sheriff-court. Upon that proof the Sheriff-depute has found that, between the date of the order and the delivery, there was an agreement that the new firm should be taken in place of Wilson and M'Lean;—but of this I find no evidence whatever.

M'Lean perhaps did not expect the goods to arrive, as they did, before the dissolution of his partnership, and demurred to receiving them, and sent back the invoice, and said that Pearston, who called at the time, had arranged that the new firm should take the goods. Now, if supported by the evidence, that is a perfectly good defence.

The defender appeals to the pursuer's ledger, in which Wilson, M'Mutrie, and Paterson are charged with these goods, as of date 19th September. On the other

* The following is an extract from the pursuer's own deposition as a witness:—

"I exhibit my ledger, which contains the following entry:—

"Wilson, M'Mutrie, and Paterson.

1853.

Sept. 19. To goods,	{ These two entries }	.	.	L.59 17 0
" 30. „ do.	{ were scored. }	.	.	0 4 6

Oct. 3. „ do.	0 4 6
---------------	---	---	---	---	-------

The account continues after that. The above two entries are delete in the books, as in the excerpt. I produce an excerpt of another account in that ledger, under the title, 'Wilson and M'Lean.' I keep the books. The item at the top of said account, dated '19th September,' was made there a considerable time after said date.† The entry dated '30th September,'‡ at the bottom of the account, was made on 3d March 1854, when the account was squared. In my day-book, which I now exhibit, the goods now sued for are charged to the debit of the defenders. I think the reason why the entries that are now delete were put into Wilson, M'Mutrie, and Paterson's debit, was because the old page in the ledger of the defender's account was written fully up, and as the new concern succeeded the old, and we were commencing a new account, these goods were just put in there by mistake, and not intentionally. The posting of these items took place after I had commenced to deal with the new firm. I never rendered the new firm any account for these goods, and I have no original entry therefor against them. I made the entries in the day-book when the invoice was sent off. The entry that is deleted was not made in consequence, or in compliance with the request in Wilson's note. There is no doubt that it relates to the goods sued for. In the day-book, the entry of goods furnished on 3d October is debited to the defender, but in the ledger it is posted to the debit of the new firm, and paid by them."

‡ This was the 4s. 6d. above noticed.

No. 51. hand, in the day-book, they are charged to the debit of Wilson and M'Lean. Now, I cannot take the pursuer's explanation of the entry in the ledger, that it was made in a hurry, because Wilson and M'Lean's account was full. That could be no reason for passing over 40 pages to open a new account in name of Wilson, M'Murtie, and Paterson. If this was done by Pearston himself, it is binding on him; if by a clerk, how could he dream of making out a new account, if he had got no instructions from Pearston?

Dec. 18, 1856.
Hay v.
Simpson.

Then, these goods are not entered in the account rendered to Wilson and M'Lean; although, in that account, as settled on 3d March, there is an entry of 4s. 6d. which is taken from the account, in name of Wilson, M'Murtie, and Paterson, when the L.59, 17s. was also standing.

I do not say that parole evidence might not have taken away the effect of these entries, but Pearston's evidence certainly cannot do so.

It is clear to my mind, that Wilson having left the new firm, and it never having acknowledged the debt, Pearston became anxious, and deleting the entry in their name, makes a new one in name of Wilson and M'Lean.

LORD MURRAY.—We must deal with the case on the evidence before us. Nothing can be fairer for the pursuer than to take his own books, and they are against him.

LORD WOOD was absent.

LORD COWAN.—This case must be decided on the evidence. The original debtor must prove that the new debtor was taken as a substitute. Now the Sheriff-principal found that there was here an effectual delegation, and the question is, was he right or wrong in so doing? I am not going over the facts. My first impression was in favour of the judgment, but the counsel for the advocator carried me round, and it was only a minute criticism of the books that brought me back again to my first impressions. Wilson's statements all go to support the defence, and to shew there was an understanding that the new firm was to take the goods. Besides, I cannot help thinking that there is a great deal in this, that the goods were actually taken and used by the new firm. On the mere parole evidence there would have been great difficulty, but then there are the books, and M'Lean is not charged with these goods till 3d March. Now that is a strong fact. We find also in the ledger an account opened with the new firm, and the goods charged there. It is said these entries are deleted, but he gives us no explanation either of the time or mode of such deletion.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not regard this as a case of proper delegation. I hold the conference which took place at the delivery to have been part of an original transaction, and it was there settled who was to be the debtor.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—(After the findings in fact given above) "Therefore find, in point of law, that he discharged the claim previously competent to him against M'Lean as partner of Wilson, by whom the goods had been originally ordered as for the firm of Wilson and M'Lean: Therefore advocate the cause: Alter the Sheriff's interlocutor: Assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action: Find him entitled to expenses in this and in the inferior Court, and remit," &c.

Poor—Statute 8 & 9 Vict. cap. 83, sect. 71—Repayment of aliment.—In an action for repayment of aliment to a pauper at the instance of the disbursing parish against the parish of the pauper's settlement;—Held (altering judgment of Lord Neaves), that the inspector of the parish of settlement having in reply to inquiries respecting the pauper written a letter to the pursuers, wherein, after giving the reason why the pauper had been struck off his roll, he said,—“ You should either send her to the House of Refuge, or offer to take her into your workhouse, of course at our expense,"—this amounted to a contract or agreement, which being acted on by the pursuers, attached liability to the parish of settlement, apart from the statute, and which superseded the necessity of statutory notice; and also held, that the claim was not affected by delay in making it, and that it was as much the duty of the parish of settlement to inquire whether the authority had been acted on, as of the other parish to intimate that it had been acted on. Hay v.

THE Parochial Board of the City Parish of Edinburgh brought this action against the Parochial Board of the Parish of South Leith for payment of 1ST DIVISION.
Lord Neaves.
C.

L.55, 13s., expended by them for the maintenance and support of a pauper, Christian M'Donald or Paterson, from 24th March 1846 to 1853, with the exception of the period from 10th November 1852 to 28th November 1853.

The following letter was addressed by the assistant inspector of Edinburgh to the inspector of Leith—it bore the post-mark of 25th March 1846:—

"Office of Parochial Board, Edinburgh, 1846.—John Lyon, Esq., Inspector of Poor, South Leith.—Christian M'Donald or Paterson.—Dear Sir,—The above individual, who appears to be about twenty-two years of age, and who is evidently an imbecile, applied here to-day for parochial relief, and informed me that she had aid from your parish for many years, which was discontinued about a year ago. She resides in Toddrick's Wynd. Let me know what you know of her, and if her statement is correct.—Yours truly." (Signed) "JOHN MACKAY."

The following reply was sent by Mr Lyon to Mr Mackay:—"Leith, 25th March 1846.—Dear Sir,—If Christian M'Donald is the female, I know (for she has a great many aliases, and was known to us chiefly by the name of Christian Paterson), she is much older than you suppose; and is, I suspect, more rogue than fool. The reason she was struck off from our roll was, that I ascertained that she kept a house for bad women, and it was resolved that she should be sent to the House of Refuge. She refused to go thither, and her allowance was stopped. You should either send her to the House of Refuge, or offer to take her into your workhouse, of course at our expense. The probability is, she will refuse to go to either. Treat her as you would do one whose history is as above."

On 2d December 1853, a statutory notice was given by the pursuer to the defender that the pauper was in receipt of relief, and the defender thereupon acknowledged that the parish of South Leith was liable for her support, and requested that she should be sent to South Leith parish, which was done. The question now was, whether the parish of South Leith was liable for the aliment prior to 1853.

The defender pleaded non-liability, in respect there had been no statutory notice prior to 1853 that the pauper had become chargeable. He also founded on a settlement of mutual accounts in 1852, of "cases admitted or determined to belong to your parish," and on the mora of the pursuer in making the claim, while the parish of South Leith were allowed to make their assessments in ignorance of such a claim being competent. As to the settlement, the defender stated, that in January 1850 the pursuer made a claim against the parish of South Leith on account of relief afforded to several paupers, for whose support it was alleged South Leith was liable, extending over a period of about eight years prior to 1850. It was understood that this claim included all demands competent to the parish of Edinburgh against South Leith parish. After some litigation, in 1852 a settlement of accounts took place between the pursuer and defender as representing their respective paupers, which it was understood embraced all their mutual claims as at the date of the above action. In this action and settlement no reference was made to any claim as competent to the pursuer against the defender on account of Christian Paterson.

The pursuer founded on the above correspondence as amounting to a special mandate and admission of liability to reimburse the city parish, and in virtue of which authority the pursuer had expended the sums now sued for. The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—“ Finds, that the claim of relief here insisted in, cannot, in the circumstances of the case, be sustained, except from and after the 2d day of December 1853, the date when notice of the pauper having become chargeable was given to the defender in terms of the statute: Quoad ultra, Finds and declares in terms of the libel, subject to the limitation above mentioned, and decerns against the defender for payment of the sum of 8s. 2d. sterling, with interest from the 19th day of December 1853, till paid: Finds the defender entitled to expenses,” &c. *

The pursuer reclaimed, and pleaded;—That he had satisfied the statute by giving notice that the pauper had become chargeable, the terms of the letter of March 1846 being sufficient for that purpose; but farther, no notice was necessary, or, if necessary, the parish of South Leith were barred from taking the objection, in respect they had undertaken to guarantee the expenses necessary for alimentering this pauper. The statute did not prescribe the form of notice. It might be made in any terms, provided only it conveyed the information that the pauper had become chargeable. But if

* “NOTE.—The Poor Law Statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 83, sec. 71, enacts, that any parish alimentering a pauper may recover from the parish to which he may ultimately be found to belong,—‘ Provided always that in all cases in which relief shall be afforded by one parish or combination to a poor person having a settlement in any other parish or combination, written notice of such poor person having become chargeable, shall be given to the Inspector of the poor of the parish or combination to which such poor person belongs; and the parish or combination affording relief shall not be entitled to recover for any charges or expenses incurred in respect of such poor person, except from and after the date of such notice.’

“ This is an action for relief or reimbursement under this clause; but the express condition of the enactment has not been complied with. The claim goes back to 9th April 1846, but no notice that the pauper had become chargeable was given to the defender’s parish, till 2d December 1852.

“ In answer to this objection, the pursuer maintains,—1st, That the condition of the statute was virtually complied with; 2d, That he alimentered the pauper at the defender’s desire, which made any notice unnecessary.

“ 1. A compliance with the statutory condition by means of equivalents, seems unsafe and inadmissible. It is intended that explicit written notice of the pauper having become chargeable should be given; such notice can always be easily given and there seems no good reason, but the reverse, for ever dispensing with it. But besides, it does not here appear that any equivalents existed. The letter of 25th March 1846, is not notice of chargeability. It asked a question, and no other letter was ever written, intimating the result. The first relief given to the pauper bears to be dated 9th April 1846, but no notice was then given.

“ 2. The plea that the defender asked the pursuer to alimenter the pauper, seems not supported by the facts; and in order to have any relevancy, as between parish and parish, would need to be laid on much more special grounds than are here alleged.

“ Altogether, the Lord Ordinary has held that the enactment of the statute requiring notice, ought to be strictly adhered to; and he thinks that there cannot be a better illustration of the necessity of doing so than the fact, that in repeated settlements of mutual accounts, this claim was never brought forward, and that the present ratepayers of South Leith are now sought to be subjected in arrears, which ought to have been claimed and paid as they arose, and as to which no statutory notice of liability was to be found in their records. The conduct of the pursuer or his predecessors or constituents, has, in more ways than one, been lax and informal, and it seems right that they should bear the natural penalty.

“ If the Lord Ordinary’s views are correct, the action should not have been brought, and therefore expenses have been allowed to the defender.”

there was any doubt as to the meaning of the pursuer's letter, that doubt was removed by the manner in which it had been received by the other party. Again, it could not be said that the absence of notice implied an absolute forfeiture of the claim; and therefore anything in the shape of an agreement or arrangement between the two parishes, as to the way in which the pauper was to be dealt with, equally superseded the necessity of such notice; for such an agreement proceeded on the assumption of the pauper's chargeability, and the liability of the parish for it.

The defender pleaded;—That no proper notice had been given; that if the pursuer intended to act on anything contained in the correspondence, he ought to have intimated this to the defenders; that not having done so, the subsequent settlement of claims, and the delay in making this claim, now barred the pursuer from insisting in it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This claim of relief is resisted on the ground that there had been no intimation in terms of the statute, and also because of the delay in making it, and of an intermediate settlement of accounts between the pursuer and defender.

It is quite true, that by section 76 of the Poor Law Act there is a provision applicable to the recovery of aliment given by one parish to a pauper having a settlement in another, and which limits such demands by providing that the parish affording relief shall not be entitled to recover it, except from and after the date of notice. That was intended as a protection against old demands being reared up in cases where aliment having been furnished for a length of time, a demand is suddenly made on the parish of the pauper's settlement after the rate-payers had been changed; and many such cases at one time did arise, demands being made for reimbursement after a long interval of time. The defenders here claim the protection of that clause of the statute. They say that no statutory notice of their liability was given them prior to December 1852. The pursuer says there was sufficient statutory notice given by the letter of 1846, which bears the post-mark of 25th March, and which is admitted to have been written on that date; and he pleads, that whatever may be the terms of that letter, whether containing all that the statute requires or not, the defender, by his answer, recognised it as sufficient; and farther, that whether it be sufficient as a statutory notice or not, at least that the defender's letter recognised this person as a pauper for whom the parish of Leith was responsible, and gave both authority and instructions to the Inspector of Edinburgh to send her to the House of Refuge, or workhouse, at the expense of the parish of Leith;—that she was sent accordingly, and there remained. The Lord Ordinary has found that this position is not tenable as a defence, and he has also refused effect to the other grounds of action.

Looking first to the second ground of action, which is apart altogether from the statute, I must say that I have great difficulty in holding that there was not here sufficient recognition of this pauper as properly chargeable on the parish of Leith. I think that the defender's letter amounts to such a recognition of liability, and gives authority to the pursuer to aliment the pauper at the defender's expense. "If Christian McDonald is the female I know (for she has a great many aliases, and was known to us chiefly by the name of Christian Paterson), she is much older than you suppose, and is, I suppose, more rogue than fool." The letter then states the reason why she was struck off the roll, thereby acknowledging that she was a recognised pauper. Then it proceeds: "It was resolved that she should be sent to the House of Refuge." That still recognises her as a pauper. "She refused to go thither, and her allowance was stopped." "You should either send her to the House of Refuge, or offer to take her into your workhouse,—of course at our expense. The possibility is she will refuse to go to either. Treat her as you would do one whose history is as above," that is, as a pauper of Leith, and to whom you ought not to give aliment out of doors, but should send to the workhouse at our expense. And the pursuers did send her to the workhouse, and they now say they did so at the expense of the parish of Leith, and they demand repayment of their disbursements, under the authority which they say was given them by the defenders. That letter was a complete recognition by the defenders of this pauper as one for whom they were liable, and an authority to the pursuers to deal with her at the expense of the

No. 52. parish of Leith. I do not see any escape from their consequent liability under this action, except it be found in the transactions which took place subsequent to the date of that letter. Within two weeks after that date she was sent to the House of Refuge, and then to the Charity House, where she remained till 1852. There is no question as to the aliment of 1853. During all that time, there was no demand by the parish of Edinburgh upon the parish of Leith, for payment of this aliment furnished under the authority of that letter of 1846, and, in the interval, there was a certain settlement of accounts between the parties.

It cannot, I think, be maintained that the claim was lost by the mere delay in making the demand; and, in regard to the settlement, I do not think it was made clear that it was intended to comprehend all cases to the exclusion of all others not embraced in it. The demand therefore made by the parish of Edinburgh upon the parish of Leith is maintainable upon these grounds, which appear to me sufficient. That being my view, it would follow that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and that the parish of Edinburgh would be entitled to decree against the parish of Leith.

It is said that the parish of Edinburgh ought to have intimated to the parish of Leith that they had acted on the authority contained in the letter of 1846. It would have been better had they done so, but their not doing so does not exclude the demand. It was a hardship on the parish of Leith that the demand was so long delayed, but they having given that authority, were themselves somewhat to blame in not having inquired whether it was acted on or not. They cannot complain on that account. It may be a question how far the failure of the parish of Edinburgh to make the demand for so long a time may not have put the parish of Leith into the reasonable belief that it did not exist, and so far it may affect the question of interest. But the delay cannot affect the demand itself.

As to the other ground of defence, that this letter cannot be regarded as a proper statutory notice, I cannot come to the conclusion that it is a proper statutory notice, and I am not disposed to admit of loose and equivocal statements in letters of this kind as an equivalent. The letter was intended merely to make some inquiry about this pauper, whether she was chargeable upon the parish of Leith or not. Upon that ground, I would have concurred with the Lord Ordinary but upon the other ground I think his interlocutor must be recalled. There is a clause in the statute which says that aliment shall not be recovered prior to the date of the statutory notice—that is, the mere fact of having alimented the pauper is not of itself sufficient to establish a claim. But the statute does not say that if an agreement be entered into between two parishes, such aliment may not be recoverable, and that is the case here. There was an agreement apart from the statute, and therefore, feeling it unnecessary to decide anything about statutory notice, I give no opinion upon it. Statutory notice should always be simple, and cannot be too much so.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion, and I am for resting the judgment on the ground of the contract. It is impossible to read the defenders' letter of 1846 without seeing that they intend the parish of Edinburgh to undertake the maintenance of this pauper. If the question had arisen at a nearer date to the contract itself, is it possible to say that from the day the pauper was put into the workhouse there was not an attaching obligation on the parish of Leith to defray her aliment? This contract was begun to be put into effect, and liability commenced as from 1846. But if liability then commenced, and could not have been resisted, as at that date, is there anything to discharge it by mere lapse of time? The parish of Leith having given the necessary warrant for the commencement of such liability, were themselves bound to make enquiry, and see whether it was acted on or not. If they did not so inquire, sibi imputet; they are more to blame than the other parish. There is nothing here from which to presume or infer a discharge of that liability, and as to the lapse of time, if there had been statutory notice, mora would not have been of sufficient consequence to affect the claim; and if there is a contract which supersedes such notice, it has equally little effect. The case does not rest on statutory notice, but on arrangement, and I agree that the more simple a statutory notice is, and the more precisely in terms of the statute, the better for all parties.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—With regard to the statutory notice, I concur in thinking that if we must decide that question, it must be according to the interlocutor the Lord Ordinary, for we are here dealing with statutory proceedings, and the direction of the statute is express and specific that a claim of relief is not to be given effect to, except on condition that written notice shall be given that the pauper has become chargeable. But I also think it unnecessary to go into that question, for without receiving notice, the parish of Leith gives an express written mandate to the parish of Edinburgh to advance the funds for the relief of the pauper, and if relief is given, how can they refuse to repay it?

Dec. 19, 1856.

Hay v.
Simpson.

Then the question is, have they been relieved of this by delay in the demand for repayment, or by settlement? I do not think that on either of these grounds the parish of Edinburgh are precluded from insisting in their claim.

LORD DEAS.—I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived, and I do not know that there is any real difference in the grounds on which I do so. The statute requires written notice to be given, but prescribes no formula for the notice. Here a letter was written in March 1846, in terms which certainly are not explicit, and which, if no answer had been given to it, the defender might fairly enough have said he had neither understood, nor was bound to understand as the statutory notice. But I think the answer shews that he did truly understand the letter as importing not merely that the pauper had become “chargeable,” which is the phrase used in the statute, but that she had become chargeable on South Leith. For the answer not only states that she had been upon the roll of that parish, and struck off for a reason which implied, in place of repudiating, the fact that South Leith was the parish of her settlement, but the writer of the letter gives positive directions as to how she was so to be disposed of, which he could have had no right to do if she had not been a pauper chargeable upon South Leith; and then he says that what was to be done is to be, “of course, at our expense.” He adds, “Treat her as you would do one whose history is as above,”—that is to say, as one who is entitled to relief from the parish of South Leith, subject to the observations about her character and habits, which rendered it proper to send her either to the House of Refuge or to the Workhouse. I am, therefore, disposed to think that, as in a question with this defender, he must be regarded as having held and recognised the letter sent to him as a sufficient statutory notice.

But, in the next place, I have no doubt that the defender might dispense entirely with the statutory notice, and that this could not be more effectually done than by a direct undertaking, as here, to be liable for the pauper’s maintenance. It is true, as the Lord Ordinary observes, that the liability of each parish ought to appear on the face of its records. But this is not a statutory requisite, and the parish of Edinburgh had no power over the records of the parish of South Leith. The Inspector of South Leith might fail to enter in its records either a direct statutory notice or a direct undertaking of liability, but that could not affect the rights of the parish of Edinburgh, either in the one case or the other.

I hold, therefore, that we have a sufficient foundation for this claim, if it has not been cut off by mora, or discharged by the settlement which took place in November 1852. Now, to take this last point first, I confess the objection founded on the settlement of accounts seemed to me, at first, to be formidable; seeing that the settlement bears to be applicable, in general terms, to “cases admitted or determined to belong to your parish.” But it has been explained (and the explanation has not been gainsaid) that all the cases settled were cases in which not only liability, but the amount due had been admitted, which was not the situation of the claim, the amount of which might have been disputed as extravagant, or repudiated in toto, on the ground that the instructions given as to the mode of treating the pauper had not been observed. I do not, therefore, think that the claim, if it existed, has been discharged by the settlement.

There remains only the question whether, by mere delay, the claim, which would otherwise have been good, has been lost. Now, I am not prepared to say that the delay, although I do not see any good excuse for it, can have this effect. The other party was also to blame in not inquiring what had been done, or whether anything had been done, upon his own mandate. He had authorised the treatment of her as a pauper who had a settlement in the parish of South Leith, and at the expense of that parish, and he was, at least, as blameable as the Inspector of the parish of Edinburgh in inquiring no farther. In this state of matters, and no pre-

No. 52. scription or statutory limitation being alleged, I do not see that the claim is cut off by mere delay.

ROBERT PURDON raised an action (which, after his death, was insisted in by his eldest son, James Purdon), along with a party who had acquired an interest from him, in which they sought to reduce a deed of ratification, conveyance, and commission, granted by Purdon with consent of his trustee for behoof of his creditors in favour of John Allan Rowat, Joseph Rowat, Gavin Rowat, and Thomas Rowat, the object being to set aside the conveyance of certain oxengates of land which it was alleged Purdon had been under no obligation to convey. It was farther alleged that the deed had been granted in error as to its effect, and had been obtained by fraud.

The whole circumstances of the case are thus narrated in the opinion delivered by Lord Cowan as the joint opinion of Lord Wood and himself :—

“ The narrative of the deed under reduction, in reciting the consideration in respect of which it was granted, brings forward with sufficient prominence the more material facts which it is important to have in view in disposing of the bill of exceptions, and the motion to set aside the verdict.

“ It first sets forth that John Allan of Elsrickle, who was proprietor of the lands and others described in the deed, had executed, a short time previous to his death, on 29th August 1829, a general disposition of his whole property in favour of John Rowat, represented by the defenders, and which deed was brought under reduction, in actions at the instance of Robert Purdon and of Mrs Alison, heirs of provision and of line to the said John Allan.

“ The narrative goes on to state, that after considerable procedure, and a remit to the jury to try certain issues, ‘ an arrangement took place on the 22d of January 1834, by which it was agreed a verdict should be returned for the defenders in said actions, and that the defenders should pay the pursuers the sum of L.4000 at the terms therein specified—the pursuers granting the defenders a full discharge against the said John Allan's estate—which sum was paid, and discharge granted accordingly.'

"And it is then farther narrated, that Robert Purdon had claimed from the defenders, notwithstanding the above discharge, the further sum of L.500, as one-half of the sum of L.1000 provided by bond of annuity and provision, dated in July 1773, and executed by Joseph Allan the younger, to be paid to himself and Robert Allan, his brother, their heirs and assignees, at the first term after the said John Allan's death without issue, the said Robert Purdon being the heir to the extent of one-half of said sum of L.1000, both of Joseph Allan the younger and Robert Allan. And, with regard to this claim, it is set forth that the defenders, to avoid litigation and purchase peace, had 'agreed and arranged, on receiving the discharge executed of equal date herewith of the one-half of the said sum of L.1000, interest and consequents, and a full ratification and confirmation of the unentailed property, heritable and moveable, which belonged to said John Allan, or his brother, Joseph Allan the younger, at their respective deaths, and of the titles thereof, to pay to me, the said Robert Purdon, and my heirs, the sum of L.225 sterling, in full of my claim under said bond, and of all claims I in any way had, or could pretend to have, to any of the property, heritable or moveable, which belonged to said John Allan, or Joseph Allan the younger, at their respective deaths.'

"On this narrative, and in consideration of the payment made by the Rowats, 'in terms of said arrangement,' Purdon and his trustees 'ratify, approve of, and confirm to and in favour of the said Joseph Rowat, Gavin Rowat, John Rowat, and Thomas Rowat, according to their respective rights, and their heirs and successors, the whole unentailed heritable property, situated in Scotland, which belonged to the said John Allan at his death foresaid, or which he was then in possession of as proprietor.' And further, Purdon, with consent of his trustees, disposes and makes over to and in favour of the said parties, according to their respective rights, 'all and every right and claim I or my heirs have, or may have, or can pretend to have, to all and every part of the heritable or moveable property which belonged to the said John Allan, or Joseph Allan the younger, at their respective deaths, or which they were respectively in possession of as proprietors, with power to my said disponees, if they consider necessary, to make up titles to the same in my name, as heir to the said John Allan, or Joseph Allan, and to vest me therein,'—Purdon being taken bound thereafter to convey the same to the said disponees at their expense. And there follow special conveyances of particular heritable subjects to and in favour of these parties, with a clause of absolute warrandice on the part of Purdon, and of warrandice from fact and deed by his trustees.

"The substance and effect of this deed was to substitute the Rowats in Robert Purdon's place, as regarded every right and claim competent to him, not merely against John Allan's estate, but every claim and right which might be competent to him as the heir, or as in right of Joseph Allan, junior, brother of John. The entailed lands of Elsrickle belonged to Joseph Allan the elder, upon whose death his second son, Joseph Allan the younger, succeeded to these lands, which he possessed till his death, in 1797, when his brother, John Allan, succeeded. Besides the entailed property, however, Joseph Allan, the younger, was infeft in certain unentailed lands, and to these also John Allan succeeded, but did not complete, as is alleged, any proper feudal title, at least as to some of them—his possession being simply in his apparency. Any property in this situation could not be carried by John Allan's general disposition to the defenders. It formed no part of John Allan's estate, which he could alienate to the prejudice of Robert Purdon, entitled to take it up by service, as heir to Joseph the younger, without any reduction of the general disposition of John Allan, on the ground of death-bed, or any other. But, by the deed of ratification and conveyance, every such claim stands excluded and abandoned by Robert Purdon. It ratifies the right and title of the Rowats to the whole property which belonged to John Allan at his death, and which he was then in possession of as proprietor, and gives over to them every right and claim competent to Purdon, to all and every part of the heritable and moveable property which belonged to the said John Allan, or Joseph Allan the younger, at their respective deaths, or which they were respectively in possession of as proprietors. The substantial error alleged on the part of Purdon, under which he laboured when he executed the deed, was, that it had the effect now mentioned upon his rights and claims to and regarding the estate of Joseph Allan the younger. The deed, as to that part of it, he contends, was granted without value, and is in error as to its substance and effect. And this contention the jury have affirmed by their verdict on the second issue.

"At the trial a great deal of documentary evidence was laid before the jury, both by the pursuer and by the defenders; and there was also parol evidence adduced by the pursuer. So much of the evidence as had regard to the matters set forth in the narrative of the deed, and to the circumstances in which it was granted by Purdon, may be generally noticed.

"There was, in the first place, laid before the jury the minute of agreement, embodying the arrangement at the trial on 22d January 1834. The terms of that agreement, after setting forth the payment of L.4000, to be made to the pursuers of the actions, Robert Purdon and Mrs Alison, are as follows:—'The pursuers granting a full discharge of all claims against John Allan's estate (that is, John Allan's estate), and guaranteeing the defender against any action, at the instance of any party, for reducing the deed of the late John Allan;' and the discharge granted, in pursuance of this obligation, upon payment of the L.4000, was also laid before the jury. The terms in which that deed should be expressed became the subject of much correspondence, and they were ultimately adjusted, only after judicial procedure by suspension. That correspondence, with the judicial proceedings, and the interlocutor of Lord Cockburn, sanctioning the view taken by the advisers of Robert Purdon and Mrs Alison, as to the terms of the deed, form part of the evidence set forth in the bill. The correspondence establishes, in the clearest manner the position taken by Purdon and his advisers, and to which they adhered, viz., that Purdon and Mrs Alison were to discharge nothing beyond what was contained in the two actions of reduction—this being in their view the true import of the compromise; and they, therefore, resisted all attempts on the part of the defenders and their agent, Mr Gebbie, to introduce into the discharge any words which might have a more enlarged effect, or which might prevent the minute of compromise from being construed and given effect to upon its own terms. Now, this is just what was done by the discharge. By that deed, thus carefully adjusted, Robert Purdon and Mrs Alison, upon the narrative of the settlement effected by the agreement of January 1834, and of the sums paid in terms thereof, exonerated and discharged the Rowats the said sum; 'and also we hereby grant a full discharge' to the said Rowats 'of all claims against the estate of the said John Allan, all in terms of said minute of agreement produced in the said two actions; declaring it to be the meaning of the parties hereto, that this discharge is granted in conformity with said minute of agreement, and that, should any question arise hereafter betwixt the parties, with regard to the intent and meaning of these present the same shall be determined by the terms of the said minute.' By the execution of this discharge, the arrangement of January 1834 was carried fully out, and, accordingly, the deed of ratification and conveyance, in reference to this very matter, sets out, 'which sum was paid, and discharge granted accordingly.' No obligation therefore, ex concessis of the parties themselves, remained incumbent on Robert Purdon to grant any other deed to the Rowats, than that which he thus granted, discharging all claim against the estate of John Allan.

Rowat's

"Another portion of the evidence before the jury, had regard to the transactions of the parties relative to the claim of Robert Purdon, under the bond of provision for L.1000. The memorandum of agreement, setting forth the terms on which the compromise of that claim was effected between Robert Purdon and John Rowat, who acted in the matter for himself and the other defenders, is set forth in the bill. It is dated 11th April 1836. It narrates the bond—the death of John Allan in 1829, when the amount became payable—the general disposition of John Allan, in favour of the Rowats, and the arrangement effected in January 1834—the claim advanced by Robert Purdon, as 'the descendant and lineal heir of Margaret Allan, who was the sister of Joseph Allan the elder, and, as such, the heir to the extent of one-half of the said sum of L.1000, both of the said Joseph Allan the younger, and Robert Allan,'—and the resistance of that claim by the Rowats, on the ground of its being embraced under the arrangement in January 1834. The deed then states, that to avoid litigation and purchase peace, and without, in any shape, recognising the claim as legal and obligatory, John Rowat, as acting for himself and the other defenders, had arranged with Robert Purdon 'as follows, viz., the said second party (Rowat) agrees, on receiving the discharge underwritten, to pay to the said first party (Purdon) and his heirs, the sum of L.225, in full of his half of said bond for L.1000, above narrated, and interest of said sum since John Allan's death, and in full of all claims competent to said first party, or his heirs, under or in virtue of said bond of annuity and provision above mentioned.' And, on the other hand, the said first party engages and obliges himself, on receiving payment of said sum, to grant, execute, and deliver in favour of the Rowats 'a valid, formal, and regular discharge and renunciation of the one-half of said sum of L.1000 sterling,' contained in said bond of annuity and provision, with the interest thereof, 'and also of all claims due and competent to the said first party or his heirs, in any manner or way, under or in virtue of said bond of annuity and provision above narrated, and shall make up all titles that may be necessary for this purpose at his expense.' This is the agreement in implement of which the deed of discharge and renunciation afterwards obtained from Robert Purdon, of equal date with the deed of ratification and conveyance, was granted.

"The terms of that discharge and renunciation will be found in the bill of exceptions. It narrates the different matters which have been noticed, referring to the memorandum of agreement as to the bond of provision in these terms:—'They (the Rowats) arranged and agreed, on receiving the discharge underwritten (and a ratification and conveyance executed of equal date herewith), to pay to me' the sum of L.225, and so forth. And the deed then proceeds to discharge, in usual terms, the Rowats, of all claim whatever competent to Purdon, in reference to the bond of provision. The execution of this deed exhausted Purdon's obligation under the memorandum of agreement. That memorandum, however, contains no words to the effect of those within the parenthesis in the above quotation from the deed of discharge, viz., 'and a ratification and conveyance of equal date hereof.' These words, as appears from the parole evidence, were introduced after the draft had been revised by the agent for the trustees of Purdon's creditors, and returned by him to be extended by Mr Gebbie, who acted for the Rowats.

"From these statements it will be seen, that the narrative of the deed of ratification and conveyance was not justified by the actual agreement of parties, when it set forth that, besides the discharge of the bond of provision, Purdon had agreed and arranged, 'upon receiving payment of the L.225, to execute a full ratification and confirmation of the unentailed property, heritable and moveable, which belonged to the said John Allan, or his brother Joseph Allan, the younger, at their respective deaths, and of the titles thereof.' No such agreement or arrangement did in fact exist between the parties.

"With regard to the circumstance attending the execution of the deed by Purdon, it was proved that the agent, Mr Montgomerie of Glasgow, who had throughout acted for Purdon, was not consulted at all as to this matter; that Mr Pollock, Ayr, who acted as agent for the trustees, while he had the draft of the discharge sent to him by Mr Gebbie for revisal, had no draft submitted to him of the deed of ratification and conveyance; that the draft of the discharge which Mr Pollock revised, did not contain any reference to such a deed, although, when extended and sent for execution, there was inserted in the narrative a statement, that not merely the discharge, but also a ratification and conveyance, were to be granted by Purdon in consideration of the payment of the L.225; that it was only on the 13th December 1836, that the extended deeds, the discharge, and the ratification and conveyance, were sent to Mr Pollock for the purpose of being executed by Purdon and the trustees; that this was the first time that any ratification of the Rowats' titles had been mentioned to Pollock; that in the belief and understanding of Pollock, the object of the ratification was merely to carry out the settlement in January 1834, but which agreement he had never seen, and the effect and purport of which he did not understand; and that the deed of ratification was submitted by Pollock to Purdon for signature, and was executed by him along with the deed of discharge, on 14th December 1836, in the belief impressed on him by Pollock, that it was merely to carry out what had been previously settled.

"Farther, it was proved that Purdon was a person incapable of fully understanding the effect of such a deed as that which he executed; and that Montgomerie, who had been Purdon's adviser all along, had he been consulted, as he was not, would never have allowed him to execute such a deed; while Pollock, on whose information as to its effect Purdon must have relied, stated, in his deposition: 'If I had been aware that effect of ratification was to bar, or probably bar, a claim which was not included in the agreement of 1834, I would not have allowed Purdon to grant it; nor if I had known that there was any dispute as to the meaning of the agreement.' 'I understood, from Purdon, he had no other claim but L.1000 and that was his last claim against the Rowats. I proceeded entirely on assumption that all claims closed, and so I thought the deeds proper deed for Purdon to grant.' 'I understood the separate deed was to carry out what was previously settled.' 'I did not understand, and could not understand the bearing, or probable bearing, of the ratification and conveyance on certain questions which might arise under the minute of agreement of 1834; I had never seen it.'

"But, while this was the belief and understanding of Pollock, and through him of Purdon also, the documentary evidence, as already noticed, demonstrates that there had been a great deal of discussion as to the meaning and effect of the minute of agreement, 1834—that the attempt on the part of the Rowats, to hold it a general discharge of all claims whatever of the part of Purdon, had been repeatedly and even judicially repudiated by Purdon's legal advisers—that the idea of claims competent to Purdon, heir of Joseph Allan, junior, being discharged, and a ratification and conveyance being granted, which would have the effect of barring any such claims, had never been broached or thought of—that all this, although unknown to Pollock, was known to Gebbie, the agent of the Rowats—that Gebbie had become aware, so long before as 1835, from negotiation which he had with Messrs Mitchell and Company of Glasgow, with reference to a proposed loan over the subjects, of the propriety of a ratification of the title by the heirs-at-law, and that in the opinion of his correspondents, 'the only safe mode will be to connect them (the Rowats) with the last valid infestment in favour of Joseph Allan;' and finally, that this notwithstanding, without previous notice or communication, Gebbie prepared and sent for execution this deed of ratification and conveyance, in alleged implement (as set forth in the narrative) of the agreement under which the payment of L.225 was made, and the receipt of which was acknowledged by the discharge executed unico contextu."

Trustees.

In order to determine the questions of fraud in procuring, and error in granting this ratification, the following issues were adjusted, and tried before a jury in January 1856:—"I. Whether the defenders, Joseph Rowat, Gavin Rowat, Thomas Rowat, and the deceased John Rowat, otherwise John Allan Rowat, or any of them, by themselves or himself, or by another or others, did, by fraud, induce the deceased Robert Purdon to grant the deed of ratification and conveyance dated the 14th December 1836, No. 6 of process?"

II. Whether the said deed of ratification and conveyance was granted by the deceased Robert Purdon without value, and under error as to the substance and effect of the said deed?"

The jury returned a verdict, in which, "in respect of the matters before them, they find for the defenders on the first issue; but further find the deed of ratification and conveyance mentioned in the issue was obtained by unfair practices on the part of Mr Gebbie, their agent, unduly taking advantage of the situation of Robert Purdon in the absence of his legal adviser;—and find for the pursuers on the second issue."

The case now came before the Court on a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence, and on a bill of exceptions.

The following were the exceptions:—

1. "The Lord Justice-Clerk told the jury, in regard to the matters which they had to consider, 1st, That they would inquire and decide, whether Purdon knew that he was discharging any claims which he had not previously discharged beyond the right under the bond; and 2d, That if they thought he believed that he was thereby discharging all his claims, it was still competent for the jury to take into view, in deciding whether he was in error as to the substance and effect of the deed, the questions which it appears might arise as to the rights competent to him, but not known to him at the time.

"The counsel for the defenders excepted to this direction,

2. "And asked that the following direction should be given to the jury:—'That the jury, in considering the issues sent to trial, were bound to take into consideration the construction and meaning of the said agreement of 22d January 1834; and that if they were satisfied on the evidence, that in the contemplation of the parties at that time, the estate of Mr Allan, as referred to in the said agreement, comprehended all of which he was in the possession at the time of his death, whether as heir of Joseph Allan or otherwise, they must in that case hold the deed of ratification, in point of law, to have been granted in due implement of the said agreement, and the jury should therefore find for the defenders.'

"The Lord Justice-Clerk declined to give this direction to the jury, to which refusal he directed, the counsel for the defenders excepted.

3. "The counsel for the defenders further asked the Lord Justice-Clerk to direct the jury as follows:—'That if the jury were satisfied upon the evidence, that Robert Purdon, in subscribing the deed under challenge, intended to discharge all claims competent to him against the defenders in respect of the property which had been possessed by John Allan at the time of his death, there was, in point of law, no error on his part in regard to the substance and effect of the deed.'

"The Lord Justice-Clerk declined to give the direction craved; to which refusal to direct, the counsel for the defenders excepted.

4. "The Lord Justice-Clerk directed the jury, that 'they were bound to find for the defenders on the first issue, there being no evidence before them of personal fraud on the part of the Messrs Rowats individually, who are named in that issue; but he left it to them, if they were satisfied on the evidence, that the deed under challenge was procured by unfair practices on the part of Mr Gebbie, as the agent of the defenders, and by his taking undue advantage of the position of Purdon, to add a finding to that effect if they thought proper to do so.' *

"To this direction, in so far as the Lord Justice-Clerk left it to the jury, if they were satisfied on the evidence that the deed under challenge was procured by unfair practices on the part of Mr Gebbie, as the agent of the defenders, and by his taking undue advantage of the position of Purdon, to add a finding to that effect if they thought proper to do so, the counsel for the defenders excepted, on the ground that no such finding was competent.

5. "The counsel for the defenders further excepted to the charge, in so far as his Lordship declined to give any direction whatever as to the legal validity of the titles to the two oxengates of Elsrickle produced in evidence.

6. "The counsel for the defenders asked the Lord Justice-Clerk to give a direction to the jury as to the legal validity of the titles to the two oxengates of Elsrickle produced in evidence, and farther asked the Lord Justice-Clerk to direct the jury that a valid personal title to these oxengates was vested in John Allan, and transmitted by his general disposition of 1829 to the disponent under that deed, and the jury were bound to hold this in point of law, and to decide the case on this footing.

"The Lord Justice-Clerk declined to give any direction as to the legal validity of these titles.

"The counsel for the defenders excepted, in so far as the Lord Justice-Clerk declined to direct the jury as to the legal validity of these titles, and in so far as he declined to direct the jury that a valid personal right to the oxengates was vested in John Allan and transmitted to his general disponent."

Although all of these exceptions were discussed at the hearing, the argument was at last confined to the first three.

The defenders maintained;—There was no idea in 1834 that there was any defect in the titles to Allan's estate, the whole of which was then supposed to be embraced in the reductions then in dependence, and the meaning of parties in entering into the agreement of 1854 was that every claim of every sort should be surrendered. On the other hand, the pursuers' view seemed to be that if any flaw whatever in Allan's titles could be discovered it might be taken advantage of, and that nothing was included in the agreement to which Allan had not an unexceptionable feudal title—a view which might have rendered the agreement entirely worthless. The deed of ratification under reduction was undoubtedly founded on the former of these views, and was granted in implement of the agreement, bearing to be "in full of all claims;" true, Purdon did not know of the various claims which had since emerged, founded on defects in Allan's titles, but neither (it was contended) did the defenders, and their emergence could not affect the generality of the agreement, which implied the discharge of all claims whatever, whether Purdon knew of them or not—so that Purdon's knowledge or ignorance of the effect of the ratification would not affect the case, if their view of the original agreement was the sound one. This being so, the direction first excepted to was imperfect, and that asked from the presiding Judge was essential to the guidance of the jury, for at the date of the ratification, Purdon was indubitably bound by the terms of the agreement of 1834. That, therefore, and its import, ought to be considered by the jury along with the whole surrounding circumstances. If, indeed, the deed was to be considered alone, then it would be for the Judge to construe it, but that was not the case here. The whole circumstances of the litigation arising out of Allan's settlement, and their compromise, had to be looked to as throwing light upon the intention of parties in entering into the agreement. The Court were dealing only with the verdict on the second issue, and that with fraud now out of the case, as the verdict on the first issue was for the defenders, so that nothing but error remained. The same view of the law applicable to the case which supported the exceptions, showed that the verdict was contrary to the evidence.¹

* "NOTE.—The counsel for the pursuers excepted to the Lord Justice-Clerk's direction in point of law, that the jury were bound to find for the defenders on the first issue, because the pursuers had made out no case of personal fraud on the part of the Messrs Rowats individually, who are named in the first issue; and, on the contrary, asked his Lordship to direct the jury, that if they were satisfied on the evidence that William Gebbie, as agent for the said defenders, did by fraud obtain from Robert Purdon the deed under reduction, such fraud would warrant a verdict for the pursuers affirmative of the first issue."

For the pursuers it was replied;—The agreement embraced nothing but what there was a feudal possibility of Allan conveying, and the claims they were dealing with here were not properly emerging claims, for they existed at the date of the agreement. The direction, to the giving of which exception had been taken, was unquestionably sound—1st, To consider whether Purdon knew that he was enlarging the agreement; 2d, Assuming that he had no objection to discharge all his claims, whether he did not, in point of fact, discharge rights of which he was ignorant. It had been denied that the defenders or their agents suspected these rights, but that was entirely beside the question, for if it could be shown that Purdon knew not that he was discharging them, then there would be legal error.

As to the second exception, that the jury, in considering the issues (i. e., both of fraud and error), were bound to look to the construction of the agreement of 1834, the answer was that Purdon might have been under it bound to grant the ratification, but still, if obtained by fraud or under essential error, the deed was good; but, at any rate, a counter issue would have been requisite to give effect to such pleading, and the agreement of 1834 was not properly before the jury, and would at any rate be for construction by the Court, not by the jury, just like all written instruments. The agreement was as to the compromise of two actions. What could be more unsuitable for a jury? Writings there might be which would come before a jury; thus, in the case of a foreign document, if there were different views of the translation, it would be for a jury to settle the translation, but for the Judge to interpret that translation. So in patents, intelligibility was for the jury, construction for the Court. Libel fell under a different category altogether. The agreement of 1834 was not a deed where there were surrounding circumstances to be considered. Moreover, no evidence of that sort had been tendered, or would have been competent;

Trustees.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am desirous to state, pretty fully, the views I took of this case, which have given rise to the exceptions now before us, both in regard to the law which I did state to the jury, and the directions which I refused to give.

The case became a very embarrassing one at the trial. The special terms of the issue as to fraud, different in its terms from other issues in similar cases, appeared to me to require proof of some acts of fraud, and of unfair practices, on the part of the individuals named in the issue. A very slight change in the collocation of the words, would have made the issue apply to fraud practised by others acting for them, and for which they would necessarily be responsible. But, looking to some decided cases, and contrasting the peculiar way in which the terms in this issue are placed, in reference to the parties, I felt bound to tell the jury that personal acts of fraud, or knowledge of the same, on the part of the individuals named in the issue or some of them, must be established. This, of course, rendered the simple issue of fraud unavailing for a verdict, and the disposal of the second issue a more difficult and more important matter. But, on the other hand, if the deed was obtained by the unfair practices of their agent, and by undue advantage taken by him of the ignorance of Purdon, it did not follow that the defenders could avail themselves of the deed so obtained, or that in this action, it might not be found to be void and null. I had several cases in view, as well as the general clause in the statute, in telling the jury, therefore, that if they thought the deed was so obtained, by the unfair practices of the agent acting for the defenders, they might add that finding to the verdict, which I thought they were bound to give for the defenders. As for the objection, that Mr Gebbie had not been put on his trial, I look upon that as a mere idle declamation, and accordingly, that ground was not taken up by the senior counsel. The whole record, and all the productions, pointed to Mr Gebbie as the active person, whose fraudulent acts were complained of, and necessarily the subject of inquiry; and although, under the precise terms of the issue, the defenders could not be made responsible, yet, for him and his acts, they were in law responsible, when they stand by, and found on, the deed he so obtained.

It was natural for the defenders to protest, in the way and at the time they did as to the course I took. But, Mr Penney candidly admitted, that the finding of the jury would properly be objected to, not on a bill of exceptions, but afterwards when the verdict is to be applied, and any motion shall be made, founded on this finding.

I need say no more at present as to this point.

But, the result of the construction of the first issue did by no means throw fraud out of the case. The verdict is not that there was no fraud at all practised on Purdon. Quite the reverse. It was, therefore, a great mistake to say that the facts more directly applicable to the first issue were to be thrown entirely out of view in considering the second issue as to error. On the contrary, they form an essential part of the res gestæ and of the history of the case. The way in which error in any case, has been induced—the representations, on the faith of which a deed has been obtained, and as to its execution being held out as a mere matter of form arising out of antecedent obligations or transactions—concealment as to the real object of the deed, and artifices resorted to, to throw a person off his guard, as well as the degree of intelligence of the individual himself—are all most important, in judging whether there was error as to the substance, and, still more, the effect of the deed, and what was the state of mind and knowledge of the individual by whom the deed was granted. This holds still more strongly, if the deed has not been previously arranged and adjusted; but is, on a sudden, brought about by the agent of the party obtaining the deed, who himself arranges the whole thing for his employer, and, without previous notice, sends it at once for execution, as a perfectly unobjectionable form,—in the full knowledge himself, that any such deed has been most strenuously and peremptorily rejected by the advisers of the party, when put posed at a prior time to them. It is in this light that the question of error is to be viewed in such a case as the present, and hence, a general belief that a deed might discharge all claims, is not by any means a sufficient or satisfactory test, whether the party was in error as to the substance and effect of the particular deed in question; for, first, there must be the inquiry, of what claims had the party any conception, and in what character did he suppose any claims to be competent to him; and, further, what had the other party or his agent in view in putting before him a new deed, and what object did they propose to effect thereby—putting that in contrast to any notion the party granting the deed could possibly entertain. The object of the one party may be complete proof, in many cases, of the error of the other. Hence, in this case—whatever it may be in others—a general belief that all claims were to be discharged, could not be taken as the only or conclusive test of error. But, on that view one portion of the exceptions is substantially dependant. And in this will be found the substantial objection to the law excepted to, and to one of the directions asked.

No. 53.

Dec. 19, 1856.
Purdon v.
Rowat's
Trustees,

The discussion on the bill is now greatly narrowed; for, it was admitted by the senior counsel for the defenders, that he could not maintain that at this trial a discussion, either as to the titles of John Allan to one portion of the oxgates of land, or as to his personal right to the other portion, could be required. These would have been two separate issues in point of law, wholly collateral to the issues to be tried, or rather quite extraneous, and on which no opinion that might be formed, could be of any avail to prevent the future discussion, in separate proceedings, as to the right of John Allan to convey, by his general disposition, the right to the lands in question.

But this concession is of importance, as it shews that the question at issue, in this trial, in no degree depended on the rights in point of law, competent to either party, but on the validity of the ratification of the defenders' titles, as sufficient to exclude any challenge, even though these titles, or the right under John Allan's general disposition, might be defective and unsound. But, on the same ground, it will be found, that the effect in point of law, of the right construction of the agreement of 1834, was equally foreign to the question as to the validity of the deed of ratification, which is founded on, to exclude any question as to the effect of that agreement, or the rights competent to Purdon, notwithstanding its terms—should be construed favourably for him,—the ratification being, it is said, in its terms, a renunciation of everything which, notwithstanding that agreement, he might nevertheless have claimed, but has renounced. If the ratification stands, and is effectual, then no question can arise as to the construction of the agreement of 1834; for then the ratification would exclude all claims by Purdon, which he could otherwise have shewn were, notwithstanding that agreement, competent to him. If the ratification is set aside, then will arise the question as to the import and construction of the agreement of 1834, and that question must be tried in separate proceedings.

I think, the first matter to be considered, is the direction which was asked, for that proceeds on a view of the case totally different from the view of the questions embraced in the issue, on which the law stated to the jury was founded. The consideration of this matter in the first instance, will help to bring out very clearly what the true question to be tried under the issues really was, and thus to lead directly to the law applicable to the issues under trial.

The view of the case to be tried, on which the direction asked for is founded, is that of antecedent obligation, and due implement of a prior agreement. To the terms of the direction (a matter less important, though it may be as conclusive a ground of objection), I must afterwards advert. But the general view on which the direction asked for is founded, mixes up with the propriety and fitness of the law stated to the jury, even though the direction asked for, as framed, might be objectionable. Hence, I wish to consider that general view by itself, in the first instance.

The direction asked for was applicable to both issues, though, perhaps, intended more especially to apply to the second issue. Now, when a deed is challenged, on the ground that a party was induced by fraud to execute it, the question is one of actual fact, and the claims of the one party to demand, in point of law, such a deed from the other, cannot affect the question in the most remote degree. So also, when the issue is put whether the deceased granted a deed, under error as to

No. 53.

Purdon v.

the substance and effect of that deed, the question is also one of proper fact. Did the party understand the effect of the deed in regard to the objects and purposes for which the other who obtained it has proposed to use it? In each case the question does not relate to any antecedent obligation. It is not whether there was an acknowledgment of any obligation, and of the duty of the party to implement and fulfil such. On the contrary, the obligation is averred to be unknown, and the question to be tried is—Whether the party ignorant of the claims against him on the one part, and of the rights and claims competent to him on the other, did execute a renunciation of rights and interests, which he knew nothing of? That question depends upon the actual facts, and in many cases, as in this, on the way the transaction was carried through, and the aid he had, or the absence of any advice, at the time. An overkeen party may be well founded in his claims; but, fearing want of success, if the matter is brought to trial, or knowing that the regular and ordinary advisers of the person he wishes to deal with, are resolutely determined not to yield the point, he may take advantage of a good opportunity, and by unfair practises, to obtain the deed he wishes, and in a way and form in which he knows his real object will not be discovered by the party himself.

So also the granter may have been bound to execute some similar deed, if the question had been made the subject of legal discussion. But, still, he may have been in complete and absolute error as to the substance and effect of the deed he has been induced to sign. And, if that was the case, then the Court is to say whether a deed so granted is to be binding and effectual against him. After that is decided, the question may still be tried, whether he is not bound and may be ordained to grant such a deed, or to have the rights he had renounced, adjudged from him by the Court, after full consideration of what each party has to say. He may have been entirely deceived and circumvented in being induced by fraud to sign a deed; and yet the other party may be well founded in a legal demand for such deed. He may have been in actual and positive error as to the substance and effect of that deed, and yet the Court may afterwards find that the rights he surrendered, are not in law competent to him.

Hence, I think it quite clear that the question as to implement of an antecedent obligation, no matter how constituted, cannot, in some circumstances, in any degree enter into the inquiry under either issue—except as a matter of fact to be proved—viz., that the party well knew what he was bound to grant, and so was neither deceived nor in error. But, the question whether, however great was the deception or error, was he not after all legally bound to grant such a deed under an antecedent obligation, can afford no reply if deception or error, or both, are proved as matter of fact, however available afterwards to exclude his claims when brought forward. Thus, then, the question to which the direction asked for is directed—Whether the ratification was granted in due implement in point of law of an antecedent obligation, can never affect the case under either issue, if, in point of fact, it was granted through deception or in positive error. What the party may have been bound in point of law to grant, was not in the inquiry, and hence the consideration of any such obligation was foreign to the issues of fact—whatever may be the ultimate consequences of such obligation, when once constituted.

This view narrows greatly the law applicable to the issues.

There are many other grave objections to the direction asked for. In the first place, the jury, if favourable to the defenders, as to the alleged antecedent obligation, and if entitled to find for them on that view, might, no doubt, in that light conclude, indirectly, the question as to the party's obligation, although no one could know whether the jury proceeded on that view or on the general matters of fact in the cause. But, if the jury should adopt a view of the agreement favourable to the pursuers, the verdict would have had no effect whatever against the defenders, in excluding their right to try the question, whether the deceased was not bound, and his representative now bound, by the agreement of 1834, to ratify and convey to the effect of the deed granted in 1836. Hence the defenders asked for a direction, which could not be conclusive on the question involved in it, and which they might still have been entitled, as they are still entitled, to try in another action,—viz., whether, consistently with the agreement of 1834, the deceased, or those in his right, can claim any part of the proper estate of Joseph Allan. It is clear, on this simple ground, that the matter involved in the direction would have raised a collateral issue, which the issues sent to trial could not warrant.

In the next place, it seems to me to be quite clear, according both to the principle and the practice of our pleadings, that if any view of an antecedent obligation was intended to be raised in answer to either of the issues, the defender ought to have obtained, if he could have got it, a counter issue, of which he would have been the pursuer; and that without an issue, the matter involved in the direction could not have been introduced at the trial, or that the plea should have been raised before trial as a question of law.

But, further, whether the defenders can introduce the matter as to any antecedent obligation in this action—on which they have no plea—there is no doubt that they could not have obtained a counter issue, on that view of the rights of parties, in order to exclude either the issue on fraud or on error. The defenders stood by the actual deed of ratification, as excluding the pursuer's claims, whether well-founded or not. If that deed was obtained by fraud, or granted in error as to its effect, and error induced by the defenders, then the first step is to get rid of that deed, and then the defenders are entitled to fall back on the supposed antecedent obligation to renounce the claims competent to the pursuer, as to the estate of Joseph Allan, or other claims. But, while they stand by the ratification as a valid deed, the two issues must be first tried as to its validity, and any such answer could not have been received as a ground for a counter issue, to exclude a verdict on the pursuer's issues. If the ratification was not truly the deed of the pursuer in the legal sense of the term, then that is to be set aside, leaving the rights of parties, under the agreement of 1834, to be determined as they stood before the ratification was granted—unaffected by the after transaction, which was tainted with such conclusive vices.

If either issue for the pursuer was established in point of fact, either that the deed was obtained by fraud, or that it was granted in error such as the pursuer must prove, it never could entitle the defenders, to exclude a verdict on these issues, to say, True, there was fraud; True, there was error; but you were, in point of law, bound, to grant such a deed, and therefore neither the proved fraud, nor the proved error, are to be found by the jury. Hence no counter issue, upon any such ground, could have been granted. In truth, such a defence required to be constituted in a regular way. And under this record, no plea had been stated, which could have warranted the introduction of such matter.

But, independently of all these general objections, the direction asked for was radically unsound. The Judge was not asked to construe or explain the meaning of the agreement of 1834. The defenders were at pains to explain that they purposely abstained from stating the construction of the agreement to the Judge, and asking any direction from him on that subject, as they considered that to be wholly a matter for the jury.

I hold that part of the proposition to be untenable. An agreement, as to the compromise of a particular action, depending, it might be, very much on the claims in that action, or on the conclusions in it, or on its media concludendi, and many other similar matters, was a matter, independently of any general rule of evidence, eminently unfit to be handed over to a jury, as the proper and sole judges of the construction of such written agreement was wholly for the Court, although they might or might not have asked the opinion of the jury on some matters of fact, if any such arose.

Further, the next part of the direction asked,—that if the jury “were satisfied on the evidence, that in the contemplation of the parties at that time, the estate of Mr Allan, as referred to in the said agreement, comprehended all of which he was in the possession at the time of his death, whether as heir of Joseph Allan, or otherwise, they must, in that case, hold the deed of ratification, in point of law, to have been granted in due implement of the said agreement, and the jury should therefore find for the defenders,” was most objectionable. The defenders assumed, without showing ground for it, that the construction of a written agreement of compromise, could competently be affected by general evidence, to be judged of and applied to the construction of the agreement, by the view the jury might take of the objects intended by the parties. This was the strangest proposal I ever heard, and the jury were thus to be allowed to take their view of what was contemplated, in order that they, the jury, might themselves construe the agreement. But, still further, see what it was they were so to consider. "That in the contemplation of parties," &c. First, what parties were here meant? Was it the two sets of parties—pursuers and defenders? Both would appear to be included. Yet, I suppose, the original pursuers alone were intended. But, then, Were Purdon, and Mrs Alison, on one side, and Mr Rowat, on the other, personally, those referred to by the expression "the parties?" That was not explained, and I own I do not yet know who were referred to as the parties, nor was that explained to us. If Purdon and Mrs Alison were here referred to, there was not one word of evidence as to Purdon or Mrs Alison before, or at the time of the agreement. Not a syllable. It was not attempted to be shown that they were present at the trial—knew or approved of the compromise, or were consulted as to the terms and expressions employed in the minute signed by counsel. If they had, the result would have been an attempt to substitute, for the terms adopted by counsel in order to adjust what was intended, loose conjectures as to what might be in contemplation of the parties themselves. If not Purdon and Mrs Alison are referred to, who were the parties? Not the counsel, I suppose—both dead, and of whose understanding there was no evidence tendered. Was it of the agents? Then that was a dispute between two agents, after the agreement—for of their views in entering into the agreement at the time of the trial, no evidence was tendered. Further, any evidence of the alleged intention of either or both parties, to affect the construction of his written agreement, was wholly incompetent. The agreement of compromise cannot be controlled by any evidence to be judged of by the jury, and, therefore, on this separate ground, the direction was most objectionable.

Then, see what it is that is to be collected as in contemplation. The agreement says—a discharge of all claims against Mr Allan's estate. That may be the subject of serious construction for the Court; but instead of these words which the Court may have to construe by aid of the legal proceedings, the defenders actually propose to say, whether it was contemplated by the parties that "the estate of Mr Allan, as referred to in the said agreement, comprehended all of which he was in the possession at the time of his death, whether as heir of Joseph Allan or otherwise." But, the conclusion from all this, is still more extraordinary,—viz., that the Court were to tell the jury, that if they adopted a particular notion as to the contemplation of parties, they were to hold the ratification, in point of law, to be due implement of the agreement. Due implement is a strange phrase, and, I suppose, it means to be only implement, or nothing but implement of the agreement. But, passing over that matter, the question, Whether a deed is granted in virtue, and as implement of antecedent obligation, is a question of law for the Court, even if any facts are to be looked to beyond the terms of the agreement itself, and the legal proceedings out of which it originated. But, it is proposed to be left in this strange way to the jury to say, that the deed was implement, upon their construction of the agreement.

But, further, taking the two parts of the proposed direction together, this strange result was to be left open and competent to the jury,—viz., that they might construe the agreement by itself not to have the meaning contended for by the defenders; but yet, that if they took up a certain notion as to what parties contemplated, different from the meaning of the agreement itself, they were still to hold the deed, as granted in due implement of that very agreement. And then, on this strange direction, the jury were to be told that they should find for the defenders. Certainly, the conclusion should have been, that the jury should proceed to find specially all the matters embraced in this direction,—viz., First, that they should fix the construction of the agreement; Second, to find whether, on the evidence, they thought the parties contemplated so and so; and, lastly, that on the latter ground, or on both grounds, the deed was in due implement of the agreement. For, otherwise, the Court could never have known on what view the jury proceeded. But, any findings to the above effect, would have been a very strange verdict;—and so the defenders asked that it should be a general finding.

As it is manifest that any consideration of the matter of an alleged antecedent obligation, was wholly inadmissible under the issues which were taken to try the matters of fact therein stated, little remains to be said as to the other parts of the bill. A passage in the charge was excepted to, and a direction asked instead thereof. To the first part of the passage from the charge, it was admitted that no exception truly lay. The exception to the second part of the passage, and the direction asked, turned upon this point—a very important and perhaps novel question in the law as to error respecting a deed granted without value, and not as the result of any arrangement deliberately made at the time,—Is it enough to protect the deed, and so exclude challenge, that a party ignorant of the existence of legal claims arising out of a state of things of which he knew nothing, has been generally willing to grant a discharge of all claims? And is that general intention a sufficient answer, when it turns out that the deed amounts to a discharge of rights, which could not be in the most general or loose manner, within his notions of his claims? That view I think most unsound, and most unsafe in the consideration of a case of error, and peculiarly inapplicable and insufficient in such a case as the present.

Purdon v.
Trustees.

There was no clear evidence as to what Purdon knew or really intended. But this is clear, that the agent acting for the other party had obtained very important information as to portions of his client's estate, to which John Allan had, or might have, no right, in respect of the absence of any feudal title in Joseph Allan; and, having obtained knowledge of such objections, it is presumable that he thought some such objection might apply to the oxgates of land, as well as the other portions. He makes the discharge and ratification apply generally to all lands to which such objections might be stated. Purdon had not even the agreement of 1834 to refer to. Nay, there is no evidence that the agreement of 1834, signed by counsel, had ever been seen at all by Purdon, who was wholly in the hands of the agents who acted for him. Pollock had never seen it, and knew nothing of the previous disputes as to the meaning of that agreement, and did not, in the least degree, understand the possible or actual effect of the discharge sent to him, on that agreement. Of such rights, arising out of the objections I have referred to, neither Purdon nor Pollock had, or could have, any knowledge. Gebbie misled them both. He represented this deed as a mere matter of form—sent it at once extended as a matter of course, with the very view to entrap Purdon into signing it, as he knew he was a common labourer, and expected that Pollock, anxious to obtain the money for the creditors, would pay no attention (as did happen) to the discharge. He states falsely the agreement in April 1836, and represents this ratification as arranged in that agreement, which had not been sent back to Pollock, and so set forth the ratification as implement of the agreement 1836. Gebbie lays a regular plan to induce error, and to mislead both Purdon and Pollock as to the object, and as to the substance and effect, of the discharge and ratification. I cannot separate the way the deed was thus obtained from the actual error so induced, and, therefore, though Purdon might intend generally to discharge all claims, that intention cannot be stated by the defenders, as excluding error in point of law, if, beyond and over and above the matters to which Purdon's intention could alone extend, there was in the knowledge of the other party, other rights of which Purdon was wholly ignorant, and to which it was specially intended by the other party, that the discharge and ratification should extend; to get quit of which, indeed, was the sole object of the agent of the other party. Error, then, in point of fact, as well as in point of law, is shewn to exist, and to have been induced by the facts as to the way the deed was obtained, if the jury thought that such was the result of the evidence, and if advantage of that error, well-known to Gebbie necessarily to exist, was taken in order to obtain the deed. To exclude challenge on the ground of error, because of any general intention to discharge all claims in any case, but particularly in such a case as the present, might lead to great injustice—in the present case, would be most unjust, and therefore could not be a sound rule in point of law. Such general intention—when there is no discussion or explanation of the party's claims—must, in most cases, extend to, and cover only such claims as he may previously have heard of, or may be presumed to have some notion of. No doubt many cases may occur in which there shall be an intelligent and competent advice, full discussion of all possible claims, and in which the facts may show that the party deliberately intend to discharge all claims which might arise from whatever source through unknown. And this may often be the true result, when a party is given for a general discharge, and after full advice is accepted, without the pretext for saying that there was deception by the other party. The truth is, that error must always be judged of according to the whole facts and circumstances of the case. Error in fact may often amount to error in law, especially induced by the other party. In other cases, it may not amount to error in point of law. The defenders wish to have a sort of general rule introduced, that if a party, however ignorant and unadvised, intended to discharge all claims, no matter in what state of facts, there cannot be error in point of law as to the effect of the deed. There is no such general rule, and no authority could be produced in support of such a proposition.

One material consideration in such a case is, was that intention merely the loose notion of an ignorant man signing a deed without value, as a mere matter of form, or was it the result of a regular and fair transaction? Value here there was none. The statement in the deed, that the ratification was a part of the compromise of the claim under the bond for L.1000, as I have stated, was false, but well calculated to mislead Pollock. . The notion that the sum paid under the agreement of 1834 was to be taken as the value for this discharge, is a mere pretext, and inconsistent with the statement in the discharge. All the facts must therefore be looked to, and the question left to the jury, they being, as directed, entitled, in the whole circumstances, in judging of error, to look to claims of a nature of which Purdon was wholly ignorant, known by the other party to be competent to him, but concealed from him, and of which the other party knew that he was ignorant.

I doubt whether any general rule can be safely stated respecting error as to the substance and effect of a deed. To apply to the case of a simple, ignorant, weak, common labourer, unaided by any one acquainted with his claims, signing a deed as a mere matter of course, the views which apply to a person conversant with business, and fully aided and advised, and in that condition entering into a transaction for the purpose of renouncing for value, claims which may be competent to him, would be a grievous miscarriage in the administration of the law. Then, how far error in fact will be error in law, must depend on the character and extent of the error in fact—must depend upon many considerations, which may vary in each case,—and also on the way the party is dealt with, and the opportunities he has of knowing to what extent the deed is to go. Some of the older authorities do state some general views as to error in law; but their application to particular cases must always be matter of doubt. Error in the first place must be founded on error in matter of fact, else there is, generally speaking, no error in law. But then the character and nature of the error in fact varies in every case; and on the extent of that error may depend the question, whether there was error in law to ground a challenge. The error may be the result of carelessness and the neglect of the party himself, which can give him no right in law to challenge the deed. In other cases, the party obtaining the deed may be answerable for the error in fact, and therefore cannot exclude the error in law.

On the motion for a new trial, some of your Lordships, I believe, will state your views on the facts. All I need say is, that I am satisfied with the verdict on the second issue; but I think it right to add, in this case, that I think it a righteous verdict.

LORD MURRAY.—The first and third exceptions deal with the same matter, and may be considered after the second exception, which involves an important point of law.

This exception, taken by the defenders, to the charge given to the jury by the Lord Justice-Clerk, was, that a direction should be given to the jury to this effect:—“That the jury, in considering the issue sent to trial, were bound to take into consideration the construction and meaning of the said agreement of 22d January 1834; and that, if they were satisfied on the evidence, that in the contemplation of the parties at that time, the estate of Mr Allan, as referred to in the said agreement, comprehended all of which he was in the possession at the time of his death, whether as heir of Joseph Allan or otherwise, they must, in that case, hold the deed of ratification, in point of law, to have been granted in due implement of the said agreement, and the jury should therefore find for the defenders.”

The Lord Justice-Clerk refused to give that direction, and he appears to have been perfectly right in doing so, because it was the construction and meaning of the agreement of 22d January 1834, which was entirely a question of law. It has been maintained, that where evidence is taken with regard to any contract or agreement, the construction of that contract resolved into a question for the jury. Some English cases were referred to, but they bear no resemblance to the present, and afford no aid in considering it. I consider it very dangerous for persons, not acquainted with the law and practice of England, which I do not profess to be, to enter upon the discussion of such cases; for, foreign lawyers can seldom do so without committing blunders, which expose their ignorance of English law and practice. The great principles of law promulgated by great English Judges, such as Lord Hardwick, Lord Mansfield, and occasionally Lord Thurlow, may be adopted and understood by lawyers of all nations.

On this important question,—the functions of the Judge, as distinguished from those of the jury, are well stated in a treatise of the law of evidence, as administered in England and Ireland, with illustrations from the American and other foreign laws, by Mr Taylor. After observing that the general principle that the Judge must determine the law, and the jury the fact, is not and cannot be disputed, Mr Taylor observes, that in the application of this principle at nisi prius, embarrassing questions arise from the difficulty of defining, with clearness, the obscure and shifting boundaries of law and fact.

In his statement, Mr Taylor quotes the declaration of Lord Mansfield, that the fundamental definition of trial by jury depended on the universal maxim, "ad questionem juris non respondent juratores; ad questionem facti non respondent iudices." Mr Taylor also refers to a not less decisive exposition of the same doctrine, by Mr Justice Story, an eminent judge and great jurist, referring to an argument that seems to have been used in the American Courts, that in capital cases the jury are judges of the law as well as of the fact. He states, that it had been his decided opinion, during his whole professional life, that the jury are no more judges of the law in a capital or other criminal case, upon the plea of not guilty, than they are in every civil case tried upon the general issue.

In the course of trials, various questions occur, some turning entirely on matter of fact, according to evidence to be adduced at the trial before the jury. In others, the facts are not disputed, or are admitted, but there is a question of law, which can alone be determined by the Court.

In this case, there was no dispute in matter of fact, and no evidence adduced, in regard to the agreement of the 22d of January 1834. There was an agreement signed by the counsel, that there should be a verdict returned in certain terms, which was reduced to a minute. And there was an interlocutor of Court, of 13th February 1834, interponing the authority of the Court to the minute. There could not be any dispute of any sort between the parties in reference to how that minute was signed and agreed to. It had become matter of record. The import and effect of the minute could never be determined by a jury, but only by the Court.

There was a strong objection, and though of a different sort, to the Court taking into consideration the import and effect of that record, I will rather call it, than agreement, at the trial. The defenders might, by an action of declarator, or by other legal procedure, have brought forward the construction of that order of Court, for which they contend. But they had not done so in this trial. The Lord Justice-Clerk did not, therefore, enter into the consideration of that matter. There was no issue applicable to it; and, if there had been one asked, it might have been matter of discussion whether there was room for granting an issue on what was purely matter of record, and where there was no dispute as to the facts.

The first exception is to the direction given by the Lord Justice-Clerk, and the third exception is to his refusal to give the direction asked by defenders' counsel. These exceptions involve the same matter, and substantially are an objection to the charge the Lord Justice-Clerk gave to the jury.

He desired the jury to consider, first, whether Purdon knew he was discharging any claims which he had not previously discharged, beyond the right under the bond; and, secondly, whether, if he believed he was discharging all his claims, they might take into view, in considering the question whether he was in error or not; the rights which might be competent to him, but which were not known to him at the time. A person may be induced to discharge rights which he was not aware he had; and, if this is done, while he thinks he is doing something else,—for instance, that he was discharging a bond, which he was bound to discharge, for a consideration he received,—he would be in error if he was led to discharge an other right, whether he was cognisant that he possessed such right or not. The direction which the Lord Justice-Clerk gave, appears perfectly correct in every respect, and is very distinct. While the direction the defenders asked for, and which forms the subject of the third exception, might have tended to mislead the jury.

Besides these exceptions, the bill brings before the Court other points, which were made the subject of discussion by the counsel.

The Lord Justice-Clerk appears to have directed the jury, that they were to find for the defender, on the first issue, because, there was no evidence of any intention of fraud on the part of Messrs Rowats, individually; but if they thought there were unfair actings on the part of Mr Gebbie, the agent for the defenders, they might pronounce a finding to that effect, if they thought proper to do so.

I confess, I should not have thought it a wrong direction, that the jury should have been directed, that though the defenders had not, personally, committed any fraud, it was left to them to consider whether, though originally personally innocent, they, through the agency of William Gebbie, did, by fraud, obtain from Purdon the deed of ratification and conveyance in question, which they have founded upon in the proceedings. The first issue is, Whether the defenders did, by themselves or himself, or by other or others. But I consider, in the actual trial and result of the case, there is no substantial difference between the one finding and the other; and, I am perfectly satisfied, that there is no sound objection to the course which was adopted by the learned Judge, of allowing the jury, if they were satisfied that the deed was obtained by Mr Gebbie, by unfair practices, to find so in their verdict.

That was truly a fact fit for the trial of the jury; and it is the main point in the evidence, whether there was such a fraud. It is said that Mr Gebbie is not directly a party. He is not tried for this fraud, though, if he thinks he has been ill used, the case may be freed from all doubt by being recommended to the consideration of the Lord Advocate. There is nothing more important to the public and to conveyancers themselves, than that deeds of conveyance should be honest and correctly prepared, and not fraudulently interpolated. But, the whole case of the defenders rests on the attempt to show, that there was no such fraud on his part.

The evidence is so conclusive, that I do not think it necessary to go into it in detail. The original agreement was clear and distinct, confined to the bond alone, and Mr Gebbie availed himself of the ignorance of a new agent, to interpolate the deed, and to introduce the discharge of a claim which was not discussed or considered, and which certainly formed no part of the transaction.

LORD WOOD.—I have arrived at the same result as your Lordships. I think that the exceptions taken by the defenders ought to be disallowed, and the motion for a new trial insisted in by them refused. But I do not intend to deliver any separate detailed opinion. Lord Cowan and I have consulted together since the discussion in Court, and finding that our views coincided upon the matters to be disposed of, we agreed that his Lordship should prepare a full opinion as a joint one. This his Lordship has done, and his Lordship will now deliver as such the opinion prepared by him.

LORD COWAN.—(After the narrative of the facts quoted above, his Lordship proceeded)—This being the state of the facts in evidence before the jury, the questions raised by the bill of exceptions are for consideration.

The direction of the presiding Judge, which is the subject of the first exception, had regard to both issues, but it is in its bearing on the second alone that requires to be considered; and it may be taken, as it was in the argument, along with the third exception, which set forth the direction that the counsel for the defenders maintained ought to have been given the jury.

There can be no doubt, that in the inquiry, whether the deed was executed in error as to its substance and effect, it was all-important for the jury to consider, on the evidence, the state of the granter's knowledge as to the claims he was discharging by the deed. If they should hold that he was discharging no more than he had previously discharged beyond the right under the bond, then he must have been in error as to its substance and effect. But, if they thought that he believed he was discharging all his claims, it seems no less apparent, that it was still for the consideration of the jury, whether he was not equally in error as to its substance and effect, when the deed is found so expressed as to affect rights competent to him, but not known to him at the time. The direction must be considered with due regard to the facts and circumstances in evidence. The granter might be under the belief that he had no claims but those which he was discharging, when, in point of fact, he had. His mind being under this belief, his consent is obtained to a discharge expressed in general terms. But, however general in expression, the consent truly applies only to the claims which at the time he holds himself to possess. And if there were claims of a different kind, or exigible by him in a different character, and on another title, than those of which he believed himself possessed, the generality of the discharge goes beyond his true meaning and intent. There has truly been substantial error, on his part, in what he did, though he knew it not at the moment; and "those who err in the substantial of what is done contract not," 1 Stair 10-13.

This case, however, does not rest on that ground alone. The party obtaining the discharge from Purdon, knew he had or might have such other claims, but concealed the fact. He well knew generally, that there might emerge claims competent to Purdon as heir of Joseph Allan, junior, which he was under no express obligation to discharge. The state of the title made him aware of this. Moreover, any belief in Purdon's mind, that he was called on and bound to discharge all claims, of whatever kind, was induced by the false narrative of the deed itself, that it had been, when it was not, a condition of the agreement under which he received the L.225, that he was to grant such a deed as that submitted to him for subscription. His legal right to maintain that he was in substantial error as to the effect of the deed, cannot, therefore, be affected by his belief, at the time, that he was discharging all claims he had, when that belief was induced by the party obtaining the deed, in the knowledge that there actually were or might be competent to the granter, claims more or less valuable, which the generality of the discharge might debar,—the consent truly given to it never having been intended to have that effect.

It is a mistake to think that, whatever might be the opinion of the jury on the first issue as to fraud, the whole circumstances in which the deed was obtained were not for their consideration in disposing of the issue on the ground of substantial error. In all questions of the kind, the facts are to be carefully examined to ascertain whether the error has been induced through the deceit of the party obtaining the deed. The evidence which established Gebbie's knowledge and concealment of that of which Purdon knew nothing, was legitimately before the jury, and proper for their consideration in the question of error.

On the one hand, therefore, the presiding Judge was correct when he stated it to be competent for the jury to take into view the questions which it appeared might arise as to the rights competent to Purdon, although not known to him at the time, and, on the other hand, the general direction asked by the defenders' counsel, that if Purdon had intended to discharge all claims competent to him in respect of the property possessed by John Allan at his death, there was in point of law, no error, was erroneous. He might intend to do so in the state of his belief at the time, falsely impressed on him, or from his ignorance of that which the party with whom he was transacting well knew, and yet be in error as to the substance and effect of the deed, as operating the discharge of other and different claims which he had then no ground to believe that he did in fact possess.

And here it may be observed, that assuming the view we have taken of the first and third exceptions, so far to be correct, we cannot hold that it can in the slightest degree be weakened or affected by any argument founded on the alleged meaning and import of the agreement of 1834. Supposing it were now clear that the defender's construction of it is the right one, and that it could therefore be shown that by the deed under reduction, Purdon went no farther than he could have been compelled to go by the agreement of 1834, that would by no means prove that he was not in error as to the substance and effect of the former. It obviously does not follow that because Purdon only did what ex hypothesi he was bound to do according to the meaning of an obligation granted by him (but the meaning and extent of which had always been matter of contention between the parties, Purdon and his advisers studiously resisting the attempts which were made to lead him to sanction the defenders' construction, and insisting that everything should be left entire upon the terms of the agreement itself), he could not be in error as to the substance and effect of the deed by which it was done. On the contrary, that Purdon did no more than he would be compelled to do may be true, but it may be not the less true that he did it in error—that although he believed he was discharging all his claims, he was in error in so far as the deed had the effect of discharging claims in respect of rights then competent to him, but not known to him at the time; the error as to the substance and effect of the deed not depending on whether he was thereby doing what he might be bound to do, but on the state of his mind when the deed was executed,—the effect which he believed was to be produced by the general discharge thereby taken from him as contrasted with the effect attributed to it by those who procured the deed, and the circumstances under which it was obtained. If Purdon, when believing that he was discharging all his claims, intended only to discharge claims which were known to him, his belief applying therefore to these claims only, if he intended to do no more than confirm the discharge he had previously granted in reference to the compromise of the actions (and the general words of the discharge are said to go farther and to exclude all those claims, be they good or bad, which that discharge would not have excluded, and to bind Purdon to their abandonment), it is manifest that on his part there may have been so far the most complete error as to the substance and effect of the deed, although it could be shown that truly the claims were not open to him, all of them having fallen within the compromise of 1834, and that therefore he had only discharged claims he was bound to discharge. It may be so, but that cannot prove that in granting a deed surrendering these claims, he did not do so in error, inasmuch as, whether good or bad, it formed no part of his intention to give them up.

We shall have occasion again to advert to this matter of the meaning and import of the agreement 1834, in reference to the second exception, which we now proceed to consider.

The construction and meaning of the agreement of January 1834, the evidence shows, had been the subject of repeated discussion. It was so when the terms of the discharge were adjusted, upon the payment made to Purdon of the L.2000. It was again under discussion, when the claim under the bond of provision was advanced by Purdon, and the sum accepted in compromise was paid, and discharge granted. The parties were at variance as to the legal effect and meaning of the instrument. Now, the proposal of the defenders, in asking for this direction, was, that it should be left to the jury, upon the evidence, to construe the agreement, and to say whether, in the contemplation of the parties at its date, the estate of John Allan comprehended all of which he was in possession at the time of his death, whether as heir of Joseph Allan or otherwise; and then, if satisfied of this, they were to be directed, in point of law, that they must hold the deed of ratification to have been granted in due implement of said agreement. Had the presiding Judge given that direction, he would have delegated to the jury matter that was within his own province and duty. It was not for the jury, but for the Court, to construe the agreement. Evidence there might have been tendered of the circumstances in which the agreement was entered into, as by production of the records in the actions of reduction. This was not attempted. Whether, if it had, such evidence would have been admissible, it is not necessary to inquire. But supposing there had been evidence of that description, still it must have been for the Court to construe the written instrument, with the aid of whatever evidence of the kind might have been held competent or admissible.

The agreement in itself is in expression sufficiently simple:—"The pursuers, granting a full discharge of all claims against Mr Allan's estate, and guaranteeing the defenders against any action at the instance of any party for reducing the deed of the late John Allan." Purdon's view of this agreement was, that it applied to no estate that was not so vested in the person of John Allan by sufficient title, as to be disposable by his deed; that it was only as to such estate that John Allan's deed required to be set aside, seeing that the deed could only prejudice the heir-at-law, as a conveyance of the estate, which, by feudal possibility, John Allan could convey; that all that was involved in the compromise of the actions, was the setting up of the deathbed deed, and securing to the defenders all the rights which that deed could give them, and no more; that that was the extent of the compromise; and that it was that deed, and the rights it gave against the challenge of which, by any party, the defenders were alone to be guaranteed; but that the compromise and agreement had no reference to any estate or any claim to it, which John Allan could not convey by any deed of his, and that to such estate or claim the guarantee did not apply. Nevertheless, the contention of the defenders was, that the discharge of all claims against Mr Allan's estate had a more extensive meaning, and applied to estate which could not be carried by the deed, but of which he was in possession merely as heir-apparent of his brother Joseph. The correctness of this construction of the instrument it was that the defenders wished to leave altogether in the hands of the jury, on the general evidence in the cause. This was palpably erroneous. It was the province of the Court alone to determine that matter, and the direction sought was therefore rightly refused.

Purdon v.
Trustees.

But, farther, we think the direction was also rightly refused, on the ground which we have already noticed,—that the meaning and construction of the agreement of 1834, was not relevant matter in reference to the second issue, inasmuch as, even adopting the construction for which the defenders contended as the true one, it could not legitimately bear upon or affect the question, of whether in discharging all his claims, Purdon was in error as to the substance and effect of the deed under reduction. The construction and meaning of the agreement, therefore, were matters beside the issue on which the jury were to return their verdict. The just answer to it in no respect depended upon its meaning and construction, and the Judge would have been in error to have given any direction to the jury in regard to it, as a subject for their consideration, and in reference to which it was his duty, by direction, to assist them in forming their opinion.

Indeed, even assuming it to have been itself matter relevant to the issues to be tried, it may be doubted whether the defenders had placed themselves in a position to entitle them to avail themselves of it. We rather think that could only have been done by putting the meaning and construction of the agreement in issue, by a counter issue on their part; and, supposing them to have done so, we think it would not have been thereby made part of the case, so as to form matter for consideration in regard to the question embraced by the second issue, or which could legitimately affect the verdict to be returned on it. It would have afforded no ground for negating what the pursuer there put in issue. On the contrary, it would have been an issue proceeding on the assumption of the truth of the pursuers' plea, and could only have been founded on as affording—if the verdict upon it had been a verdict for the defenders—an answer to the conclusion of the action in this way. Esto that there were essential error, as maintained by the pursuer, and found by the verdict for him on the second issue, that is of no consequence, inasmuch as the deed challenged was only one which the pursuer was bound to grant, and of which he, therefore, has no interest to obtain decree of reduction.

But independent of this, and assuming that, as the case was actually shaped, the construction and meaning of the agreement was properly part of the defenders' case, we hold that, both in relevancy and form, the direction sought was, nevertheless, rightly refused, for the reason we have previously given—viz. that, as stated from the bar, the Judge was not asked to construe the agreement, or direct the jury as to its construction, with reference to the view that might be taken by them of the evidence in regard to it (had there been any such evidence), it having been the distinct purpose of the counsel for the defenders not to ask any such direction, and, on the contrary, to ask that the Judge should, by his direction, leave the construction and meaning of the agreement wholly to the jury.

On these grounds we are of opinion that the first, second, and third exceptions must be disallowed.

The matter of the fourth exception is not within the present discussion, as parties admitted at the bar; and the fifth was passed from at the discussion.

There remains to be disposed of, the motion to set aside the verdict: but after the full statement of our views as to the import of the evidence in its more material parts, which has been already given, it is unnecessary to enter into any detail of the grounds on which, as it appears to us, the motion ought to be refused.

That the verdict was granted without value, cannot be seriously disputed. The

No. 53. narrative is not only silent as to value having been specifically given to any extent whatever—it sets forth the cause of granting to be the agreement between the parties under which Purdon's claim, in respect of the bond of provision, was compromised for L.225. The agreement thus referred to, demonstrates that there was no such undertaking on the part of Purdon, but simply a discharge of his claim under the bond. Neither can the agreement of January 1834 be urged to afford proof that the deed of ratification was granted for value. All that it stipulates for is a discharge by Purdon and Mrs Alison, and, on payment of the L.4000, that was granted at the sight of the Court. Therefore, clear it is on the proof, that the ratification and conveyance was granted without value.

Dec. 20, 1856.
Mackenzie.

Then with regard to its having been granted by Purdon, under error as to the substance and effect of the deed, this is obvious, on the face of the evidence, documentary and parole. The more material parts of that evidence have been noticed. It is not necessary to go more minutely into the proof. There was indisputably ample enough ground to justify the finding of the jury. We would only observe, that, in our apprehension, the false narrative contained in the deed itself, setting forth an obligation to grant it, which had no foundation in fact, was an element, in the circumstances in which the deed was obtained from and executed by Purdon, of the greatest weight in the question which the jury had to try. Taken along with the rest of the evidence, we think it conclusive against the motion for setting aside the verdict as contrary to evidence.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties, disallow the bill of exceptions, and refuse the motion for a new trial: Find the pursuers entitled to the expenses of the discussion, and remit to the Auditor to tax and report, on the principle of only one account of expenses for the bill and motion."

Records—Inhibition—Error—Statute 6 Geo. IV. cap. 120, sect. 51.—The Court having held that an inhibition was not duly recorded, and was therefore ineffectual, the inhibiting creditor brought an action against the Keeper of the Register of Inhibitions for damages to the extent of the debt contained in the inhibition. The defence was, that the inhibition, by reason of prior defects, was inoperative and null when presented to be recorded. The relevancy of that defence was called in question, but the Court proceeded first to dispose of the objections to the validity of the inhibition. These were all repelled, and judgment on the relevancy was therefore not pronounced; but opinions of Lords President, Ivory, and Curriehill (contra Lord Deas), that the defence was irrelevant.

The objections so repelled (dis. Lord Deas, and altering his judgment), were—(1), The bill on which the letters of inhibition proceeded, commenced,—“M. Lords, &c., Shews,” and ended, “Herefore, letters of inhibition.” Objected, that there was no intelligible address, or prayer.

(2), The inhibition was executed edictally. In the bill the debtor was not designed as furth of the kingdom, and the prayer contained no application for authority to cite him as furth of the kingdom. Objected, that a warrant to cite edictally, which was introduced into the letters, was without authority, and that the messenger had therefore no valid authority to cite the debtor edictally.

(3), The execution of the messenger bore that he lawfully inhibited the debtor and that he left a full double of the will, with copy inhibition, for the debtor at the record office, in terms of the statute. Objected, that the execution did not set forth anywhere that the debtor was abroad, and that there was nothing to show why the messenger adopted the mode of edictal citation instead of the ordinary mode of citing him personally, or at his dwelling-place.

(4), The execution bore that the messenger inhibited the lieges only at the market-cross of Edinburgh, Pier, and Shore of Leith. Objected, that that mode of publication had been abolished by the 6 Geo. IV. cap. 120, sect. 51, so that there had been truly ex facie of the execution no available publication to, or inhibition of the lieges at all. No. 54.

Davidson v.
Mackenzie.

Defences repelled, so far as founded on these alleged irregularities of the inhibition and execution.

This action was raised in 1847 by Walter Malcom, writer in Edinburgh, against William Mackenzie, W.S. It concluded for payment of L.1271, 19s. 7d., being the amount of a debt incurred in 1829 by Major Anstruther of Carplie and Thirdpart to the late James Thomson, W.S. In 1830, Mr Thomson raised an action, and obtained decree against Major Anstruther for that amount. On the dependence he raised letters of inhibition, which were duly published, and given in to be recorded. The decree, debt, and letters of inhibition were afterwards assigned to Mr Walter Malcom. In a ranking and sale of Major Anstruther's estate, the Northern Reversionary Company, who were subsequent creditors, challenged the validity of Mr Thomson's inhibition—and which was then held by Mr Malcom—on the ground, inter alia, that a blunder had been committed in the recording, by changing the sum mentioned in the letters from L.1271 to L.1221. The Court, on 8th July 1846, held that the inhibition was not duly recorded, and that it was therefore ineffectual.¹

Pending that competition, Mr Malcom had intimated to Mr Mackenzie, the keeper of the Register of Inhibitions, the objections which had been stated to the validity of the inhibition. He had also intimated, that if the objection founded on the error in recording should be sustained, he would hold Mr Mackenzie liable for all accruing loss and damage. Mr Mackenzie did not interfere in the competition, but when the judgment of the Court was pronounced sustaining the objection, he entered into a minute of agreement with Mr Malcom for the purpose of taking that judgment by appeal to the House of Lords. By that minute it was agreed that the appeal should be conducted in name of Mr Malcom, although in reality by Mr Mackenzie, he having the power of prosecuting or abandoning it. It also provided, that the expense should be defrayed by the losing party, and nothing in the minute was to be construed as admitting Mr Mackenzie's liability—the arrangement being entered into without prejudice to the rights and pleas of both parties.

An appeal was accordingly entered against the judgment of 8th July 1846; but the House of Lords, on the 26th March 1849, dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the judgment of the Court of Session, with costs.

In these circumstances, the present action of relief was raised in February 1847, by Mr Malcom against Mr Mackenzie, as Keeper of the General Register of Inhibitions, concluding for payment of the principal sum of L.1271, with interest—in all L.1886, as the amount of the loss and damage sustained in consequence of the defective recording of the inhibition. It also concluded for payment of the expenses incurred by the pursuer in the discussion with the Northern Reversionary Company, and the pursuer's whole expenses in rendering his claim effectual, he being ready to convey to the defender his whole grounds of debt and diligence at the defender's expense.

The action was laid on the Act 1693, cap. 114, which provides, "that the Keepers of the Register of Sasines, Inhibitions, &c., shall keep minute-books of all writs presented to them, and to register in their several registers, specifying the day and hour when, and the names and designations of the persons by whom the said writs shall be presented, and that the said

The Act further declares "the said Keepers not observing the premises liable to the damages of the parties prejudged by the not due observing of the present Act." By the statute 1696, cap. 18, actions of damages are declared to transmit against the heirs and representatives of the clerks, though not commenced in the clerk's lifetime.

Davidson v.
Mackenzie.

Mr Thomson, to whom the debt had originally been incurred, died in 1831. He was succeeded by his only child, Lucy Thomson, now Mrs Davidson, who was the general disponee and executrix of her father, and who, as such, had assigned the debt and inhibition to Mr Malcom. On 24th November 1853, she and her husband were sisted as parties pursuers in this action, having acquired right from Mr Malcom by translation and retrocession to the whole claims embraced under this action.

Mr Mackenzie's defence was, that the inhibition was defective in various respects, and null when presented to be recorded.

The circumstances under which the inhibition was raised and executed, were as follows:—In 1830, Major Anstruther was an officer in the British army, and his regiment was stationed at Malta. He came to Scotland on leave of absence early in January 1830, and remained there for a few months, removing from place to place chiefly on visits to friends. The pursuer averred that he never had any residence or domicile in Fife—within which county the entailed estate of Thirdpart was situated—or in any other county of Scotland: That the summons at Mr Thomson's instance was dated and signeted the 24th March 1830, and was executed against Major Anstruther personally by an Edinburgh messenger on the 7th April 1830: That on the same day, Major Anstruther wrote to his agent, Mr Thomson Paul, that he intended immediately to leave Scotland to join his regiment at Malta, and that in about two days thereafter, he left Scotland for that purpose.

On the 12th of the ensuing month of May 1830, a bill for letters of inhibition was presented to the Bill-Chamber, and passed at Mr Thomson's instance against Major Anstruther, bearing to proceed on the dependence of the action. The letters were executed edictally, by leaving a copy at the Record Office. After his departure, Major Anstruther remained abroad for several years, his regiment being on a foreign station. The letters were published at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and pier and shore of Leith, and also at the Record Office. They were then, with the executions, presented to Mr Mackenzie, to be recorded, and the letters were afterwards returned to Mr Thomson's agent, with an attestation, in these terms:—"At Edinburgh, the 13th day of May 1830.—Presented by John Elliott, writer in Edinburgh, and registered in the General Register of Inhibitions, conform to Act of Parliament." (Signed) "WILL. MACKENZIE."

The pursuer set forth the error in the recording, and the result of it, as narrated above, and he pleaded;—That in virtue of the statutes and regulations under which the defender exercised the office of Keeper of the Register of Inhibitions, he was liable in the whole damages and expenses in consequence of the error in transcribing the inhibition in the register, whereby the diligence was found to be ineffectual.

The defender, in his answers to the pursuer's statement, did not admit that Major Anstruther was furth of Scotland when the inhibition was executed against him; but he did not explicitly deny it, or aver that he was within Scotland at that date. Both parties renounced probation as to the fact.

Mr Mackenzie pleaded;—A mere error in transcribing the inhibition did not impose upon him a liability, such as the pursuer contended for, even supposing that, if correctly transcribed, the inhibition would have been effectual; but he pleaded farther, that there were such errors in the inhibition as rendered it ineffectual before it was presented to be recorded. Davidson v.

Mackenzie.

“(1.) That it was not duly and regularly expedited. (2.) That it was not duly and regularly executed against the debtor; and, (3.) That it was not duly and regularly executed against, and published to the lieges.

“More particularly, the inhibition was irregular, null, and inept, in respect—(1.) That the bill on which the letters are alleged to have proceeded, contained no address and no prayer, or at least no correct and intelligible address, and no correct and intelligible prayer for letters of inhibition at the instance of the creditor. (2.) That the bill contained no prayer for warrant to execute the letters as against a debtor forth of Scotland. (3.) That the letters bore to authorise execution against the debtor as furth of Scotland, and are alleged to have been so executed, although no warrant had been craved or granted to that effect in the bill and deliverance thereon, and the letters and executions were in this and in other respects unauthorised, and ex facie disconform to their warrants. (4.) The debtor was not designed in the bill, letters, or executions, by his profession, nor by his residence, nor stated to be forth of Scotland, nor to have no residence or domicile therein, nor was it set forth in the executions that the messenger could not find him personally. (5.) The letters were not executed or published at the market-cross of the head burgh of the debtor's domicile, nor at the market-cross of the head burgh of the shire in which the debtor's lands lay. Nor were the letters in any view duly published to, or executed against the lieges.”

The bill on which the letters proceeded was as follows:—“My Lords, &c. —Shews your servitor James Thomson, writer to the signet, that I have raised and intended summons and action before your Lordships against Captain Robert Anstruther of Thirdpart, concluding that the said Captain Robert Anstruther ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decret of your Lordships, to make payment to me of the sum of L.1271, 19s. 7d. sterling, being the balance due to me by the said Captain Robert Anstruther on accounts-current between us, composed of business charges performed by me, and payments made by me to the said Captain Robert Anstruther, on the one side, and sums received by me on account of the said Captain Robert Anstruther on the other, conform to account-current between us, commencing on the 1st day of August 1827. . . . And the said Captain Robert Anstruther knowing perfectly that I will obtain decree against him in the said action for payment of the above sums of money, and am to sist all manner of execution against him for payment thereof, he, in manifest defraud, hurt, and prejudice of me, intends, as I am informed, to sell his lands,” heritages, &c., “and to contract and take on debts, and to grant bonds and other securities therefor, unless remeid be provided thereagainst, as is alleged. Herefore, letters of inhibition. A. Monypenny's bill. Edinburgh, 12th May 1830.—Fiat ut pr.—Because the Lords have seen the dependance. (Signed) JA. MERCER.”

The letters of inhibition run as follows:—“Whereas it is humbly meant and shewn to us by our lovite James Thomson, writer to our signet, that he has raised and intended action before the Lords of our Council and Session at his instance against Captain Robert Anstruther of Thirdpart, concluding that the said Captain Robert Anstruther ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decret of our said Lords, to make payment to the complainer of the sum of L.1271, 19s. 7d. sterling.”

The writ then proceeded according to the usual form, and concluded—“Our will is herefore, and we charge you that on sight hereof ye pass, and in our name and authority inhibit and discharge the said Captain Robert

No. 54. Anstruther, personally, or at his dwelling-place, if within Scotland, and if furth thereof, by delivery of a copy hereof at the Record Office of the Keeper of the Records of the Court of Session, in terms of the statute thereanent, that he in no way sell, alienate," nor dispoone any of his lands and others, in usual terms, to the hurt and prejudice of the complainer; "and that ye also inhibit and discharge all and sundry our lieges, and others, whom it effeirs, by open proclamation at the market-cross of and other places needful, and if necessary, by open proclamation at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and pier and shore of Leith, and by delivery of a copy hereof at the Record Office aforesaid, in terms of the said statute."

And the writ concluded, " which to do we commit to you, &c. Ex deliberatione dominorum concilii. (Signed) ALEX. MONYPENNY. Written by John Elliot, my apprentice."

The messenger's execution of this inhibition was as follows:—"Upon the 12th day of May 1830 years, by virtue of the before written letters of inhibition raised at the instance of the before designed James Thomson, complainer, against the also before designed Captain Robert Anstruther, and against All and Sundry his Majesty's lieges and others whom it effeirs, I, Erskine Conolly, messenger-at-arms, passed, and in his Majesty's name and authority, lawfully inhibited and discharged the said Robert Anstruther, that he in no ways sell;" and so forth, in usual terms; "and also, by virtue and in name and authority foresaid, I passed to the market-cross of Edinburgh, and pier and shore of Leith, respectively and successively after other, and at each of these places, after crying three several oyeses, open proclamation, and public reading of said letters, I lawfully inhibited and discharged All and Sundry his Majesty's lieges, and others whom it effeirs, that they nor none of them presume, under any colour or pretext, to," take from Captain Anstruther any dispositions, or lend him any money, or do any deed, directly or indirectly, to the fraud of the complainer, &c., conform to the tenor of the letters of inhibition; "a full double whereof to the will, with a just copy of inhibition to the effect foresaid, thereto subjoined, for the said Captain Robert Anstruther, and the like just copy of inhibition also thereto subjoined, for All and Sundry his Majesty's lieges and others whom it effeirs, I left for the said Captain Robert Anstruther, and said lieges and others whom it effeirs, at the Record Office of the Keeper of the Records of the Court of Session, in terms of the statute thereanent, within the General Register House, Edinburgh; and the like just copy of inhibition in virtue and to the effect foresaid, I affixed and left for All and Sundry his Majesty's said lieges and others whom it effeirs, at and upon each of the said market-cross of Edinburgh, and pier and shore of Leith, after using the solemnities," &c.

On 2d March 1853, the Lord Ordinary (Robertson) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Before answer, remits to Mr James Hope, Deputy-keeper of the Signet, or his assistants, to examine the bills for letters of inhibition kept at the Signet Office, during the forty years preceding 12th May 1830, and up to this date, and to report how far the bill No. 15 of process is conformable to the ordinary style and practice in regard to such bills, and specially, 1st, whether the introductory address of the said bill No. 15, and the prayer thereof, or either of them, is agreeable to the form in use, or if not, in what respect it differs therefrom; and 2d, whether, when the letters of inhibition are to be executed against a party as furth of the kingdom, it is usual, in such bill, to design the party in the body thereof, as being so furth of the kingdom, and to pray for a warrant to cite him accordingly,—and also to report on any other matter of practice which may appear from the said bills kept at the Signet Office, as important for the decision of the present case. Further, remits to Mr William Robertson, one of the Keepers of the Records, or his assistants, to examine the Register of Inhi-bitious so far as in his custody, for the forty years preceding 12th May 1830, and up to this date, and to report whether the executions of letters of inhibition are so recorded, as to enable him to state what is the common form thereof, and whether the execution No. 12 of process is conformable to such usage, and specially whether, where the execution is directed against a party as furth of the kingdom, he is so designed in the letters of inhibition, and whether the execution bears in express terms that a copy of the letters of inhibition was left at the market-cross, pier and shore of Leith, or left at the office of Edictal Citations, for the said party, as being furth of the kingdom." No. 54.

Dec. 20, 1850.
Davidson v.
Mackenzie.

But the examination was afterwards limited to at least one week in each year, from 12th May 1790 to the 2d March then current.

In November 1853, the Lord Ordinary (Deas) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Before further answer, remits of new, to Mr Hope or his assistants, to report specifically with reference to the period embraced in his former search, and report whether it be according to usual practice, for the prayer of a bill for letters of inhibition to be expressed in the words of the prayer of the present bill, or in words of similar import, and if not usual for the prayer to be so expressed, whether any, and if so, what instances occur within the foresaid period of the prayer being so expressed."

The Deputy-keeper's report, in obedience to Lord Robertson's remit, bore,—(1), That the bill, No. 15 of process, was not in accordance with the prevailing or more general practice with reference to bills for letters containing warrant to execute as furth of the kingdom.

(2), That, although in many cases the introduction was in full, the prevailing practice in regard to bills for inhibition, and all other letters passing the Signet requiring bills, was an abridged form of introduction somewhat similar to No. 15 of process, and on this point, the agents for the parties were so satisfied, that they considered it unnecessary that the reporter should make any detailed report on the subject.

Under the second head of the remit, that on examining nearly 200 bills for inhibitions, he found that in by far the greatest number of any one class of the bills examined, one or more of the parties were not only designed as furth of the kingdom, but the writs contained a prayer for a warrant for edictal execution; and he stated, as his own understanding of the practice, that in order to authorise warrant for edictal execution to be inserted in letters of inhibition, one or other of the parties should be designed in the bill as furth of the kingdom, or that the bill should contain a specific prayer for edictal execution.

Lastly, according to the reporter's understanding of the practice, as appearing from the bills kept at the Signet Office, and examined as before mentioned, in order to authorise warrant for edictal execution to be inserted in letters of inhibition, one or other of the parties should be designed in the bill as furth of the kingdom, or, that the bill should contain a specific prayer for edictal execution. A simple prayer for inhibition in common form ought not, according to the reporter's view of the practice, to authorise warrant for more than ordinary personal execution; but if the party is distinctly designed in the body of the bill, as furth of the kingdom, reporter was of opinion that, agreeably to practice, a prayer for inhibition in common form, would carry a warrant for edictal execution.

"Your reporter begs further to observe, that while the foregoing report has reference to bills for inhibition merely, he has no doubt that a similar practice prevails with regard to all other letters requiring bills passing the Signet, expedite against parties furth of the kingdom. This conviction your reporter has arrived at, from an inspection of several bills for hornings and adjudications, &c., which was made during the course of the foregoing investigation."

Davidson v.
Mackenzie.

Mr Drysdale (in place of Mr Robertson) returned an elaborate report, in which he stated, as the result of his examination, that the execution in question was not conformable to the common usage of such executions.

The additional report by the Deputy-keeper of the Signet, in obedience to the remit by Lord Deas, was as follows:—"Your reporter begs to report as follows:—1. That his former search embraced a period of fully sixty-three years, commencing in January 1790. That in each year, there were examined several bills for letters of inhibition, which he had reason to suppose had actually been executed edictally. 2. That only one instance has occurred in the bills formerly examined, of the prayer of a bill being expressed in precisely similar words to the one in question. 3. Twenty-eight instances occur within the foresaid period of prayers being expressed in words of a similar import, such as, 'Herefore, inhibition and arrestment,' 'Herefore, &c.,' 'Letters of inhibition, &c.,' 'Herefore, &c., inhibition and arrestment, &c.'

"Note.—In the course of the examination of the above mentioned twenty-eight bills, it appeared that in about two-thirds of them, the parties inhibited were designed as furth of the kingdom."

On 31st January 1854 the Lord Ordinary (Deas) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the closed record and productions, with the reports lodged under the remits of 2d and 19th November 1853, and whole process,—Sustains the defences to the extent and effect of holding the inhibition libelled on to be inept and ineffectual, from irregularities occurring prior to the erroneous entry thereof in the record, and consequently that the defender is not liable in loss, damage, and expenses as libelled: Assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds him entitled to expenses." *

* "NOTE.—In May 1830 the late James Thomson, W.S., raised and executed letters of inhibition on the dependence of an action at his instance against Robert Anstruther of Thirdpart for a debt of L.1271, 19s. 7d. In the record of inhibitions the debt was erroneously entered as L.1221, 19s. 7d, and in respect of this error the inhibition was held by the Court (8th July 1846), and by the House of Lords (26th March 1849), not to be duly recorded, and consequently to be ineffectual. The object of the present action is to have the keeper of the record found liable for the debt, in consequence of this error.

Besides a plea, for which the Lord Ordinary sees no ground, to the effect that the keeper is not responsible for such an error in the record, the substance of the defence comes to be, that, in respect of one or more of several irregularities in the bill, letters of inhibition, and execution, the inhibition would have been at any rate ineffectual, and consequently that no loss has been sustained by the error in the record.

"The Lord Ordinary entertains no doubt of the relevancy of this defence. As Mr Bell observes (1 Com., 461), 'The responsibility can extend only to the amount of the injury specifically caused by the act of carelessness or unskilfulness for which reparation is due.' 'So if a writer has committed an error which annuls the diligence, but it turns out that this diligence would on another ground have been ineffectual, he will be freed from responsibility.' Accordingly no doubt was entertained as to the relevancy of this kind of defence in the late case of Cooke v. Falconer, 26th November 1850.

"The question here, therefore, comes to be, whether there are such errors in the diligence as would have rendered it ineffectual, although it had been duly recorded.

"The Lord Ordinary thinks that there are, and these errors having preceded the error in the registration, he conceives them to be sufficient to relieve the defender from liability.

I. The inhibition was executed against the debtor edictally. Now it is not pretended that a messenger can resort to edictal citation without a special warrant to that effect in the will of the letters; and such warrant is accordingly inserted in the form given by Lord Stair, (iv, 1, 4), and is contained in the will of the letters in the present case, which bear to authorise the messenger to inhibit the debtor personally, 'or at his dwelling-place, if within Scotland, and if furth thereof, by delivery of a copy thereof at the record office of the Keeper of the Records of the Court of Session, in terms of the statute thereanent.'

"But to authorise this will, there ought to have been a corresponding fiat upon the plack bill, which forms the petition upon which the diligence proceeds. The letters in this case accordingly bear as usual to be granted 'ex deliberatione dominerum concilii;' 'because the Lords have seen the dependence above-mentioned.' And this form shews, as Lord Stair observes (iv, 50, 5), 'that inhibitions were not granted by the Lords of course.' Nor are they so even now, for every necessary document must be exhibited and specially enumerated in the deliverance on the back of the bill (Ivory's Forms of Pro., v. i, p. 89); and although the clerk's signature has by statute 53 Geo. III cap. 64 sect. 17, been made sufficient in the ordinary case, the Lord Ordinary must still be resorted to in cases of doubt or difficulty. The will of the letters is always measured by the prayer and deliverance of the bill, which is just the draft of the letters' (Beveridge, p. 168, also p. 170); 'and whenever any variety in the diligence occurs, whether as to its own nature, or to the situation of the debtor or defender, as residing furth of Scotland, or otherwise, it is necessary to take care that the prayer be framed in a sufficiently broad manner to warrant a suitable will in the letters or summons.'

Directions are accordingly given, both in Bell on deeds and in the juridical styles, wherever warrant for edictal citation is required, to add to the prayer of the bill a praying to that effect. In the necessity for asking and obtaining this special warrant, all our other formalists concur.—1 Ross' Lectures, 202 and 293-4; Darling's Office of a Messenger, p. 31; 1 Shand's Practice, 127-8 and 243.

"In like manner, in criminal cases, where there is to be edictal citation, Mr Hume says (v. ii. p. 259), 'special authority for this purpose must be asked in the bill for the criminal letters.' A similar course was in use to be taken in the case of lawless parties within the kingdom having no fixed residence, or secured in fastnesses, where they could not be safely approached. The necessity for a special application, and special authority in both classes of cases, seems to rest on the same principle, viz., the extraordinary nature of the remedy sought, which was not introduced either directly or indirectly by any statute, but solely by custom; and of which custom the special application and special warrant have always formed part and parcel.

"It appears from the report of the Deputy-keeper of the Signet, made under a remit in this cause, that the general practice has been in conformity with this rule.

"The object in view is attained in practice in one of two ways. Either, first, by distinctly designing the debtor, in the body of the bill, as furth of the kingdom, in which case the prayer for letters of inhibition in common form is understood to include a prayer for authority to cite the debtor in the manner usual when parties are furth of the kingdom; or, second, by inserting in the bill, a special prayer for authority to execute the letters edictally.

"In the present case, neither of these modes was adopted. The debtor is not named or described in the bill as furth of the kingdom, and the prayer, if it can be called a prayer at all, (of which afterwards,) contains no application for authority to cite the debtor as furth of the kingdom. At the best, the prayer can only be regarded as a prayer for letters of inhibition in common form; but this prayer attached to a bill which does not describe the debtor as furth of Scotland, is not in practice regarded as a prayer for warrant to cite edictally.

"This being so, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the will of the letters, in far as it bears to authorise edictal citation, must be held to be a will without any corresponding warrant, and consequently ineffectual. If so, the messenger had of course no valid authority to cite the debtor edictally, and the diligence is null, apart altogether from any objection to the mode in which it was recorded.

"The case of Elliot v. Johnston, 26th June 1829, and the more recent cases of Forbes v. Gallie, 4th March 1847, 9 D. 806; Burleigh, &c., v. Horwood, 20th as agent, the bill and letters of inhibition had been prepared, and also the representatives of the messenger by whom the letters had been executed,

July 1848, 10 D. 1512 ; and Wilkie or Smith v. Flowerdew, 5th March 1850, 12 D. 818, shew that the Court are not disposed to relax the strict rules applicable to a diligence of this nature, either as regards irregularities in the letters, or in the plack bills on which the letters proceed.

“ In Burleigh’s case the unanimous opinion of the consulted Judges distinctly recognised the necessity of a special warrant in the will of letters of inhibition, to authorise the citation of a debtor furth of the kingdom at the market-cross of Edinburgh and pier and shore of Leith, and bore that ‘ without such warrant, an edictal citation at these places would have been null.’ The opinion further bore, — ‘ The title Execution in the Dictionary shews in innumerable cases, what critical objections are sufficient to cut down diligence, and in none more remarkable than in regard to inhibitions.’

“ But if the edictal citation would be null without the warrant in the will, the will itself must be null if not preceded by the necessary warrant in the deliverance on the bill.

“ Edictal citation is an extraordinary remedy, and admittedly rests solely upon custom. To support the citation, therefore, in the present case, the pursuer would require to shew, that the custom has been to introduce the warrant into the will of letters of inhibition, without applying for and obtaining authority to do so in any other manner than was done here. But this he cannot do. For although a few exceptions may have occurred in bills for inhibitions, the validity of which cannot be assumed, the general custom has been opposed to the view contended for by the pursuer, and as he has admittedly nothing but custom to rest upon, it does not appear to the Lord Ordinary how his plea can prevail.

“ Various cases—some of them not unimportant—were quoted and commented upon on both sides, which the Lord Ordinary does not think it necessary here to refer to, farther than to say, that he carefully considered the whole of them, but that such consideration only tended to confirm the view he has now stated.

“ As to the pursuer’s argument founded on section 22d of the Act of Sederunt 11th July 1828, the Lord Ordinary has no idea that by prescribing a form for the will of signet letters against parties furth of Scotland, it was intended to supersede the necessity for a warrant for such will, where a warrant was previously required.

“ II. The observations which have now been made, proceed upon the assumption that the bill is to be held as containing a prayer for letters of inhibition in common form. But the Lord Ordinary greatly doubts whether this can be so held.

“ The whole prayer consists of the words—‘ Herefore, letters of inhibition. Assuming the address to be to the Lords of Council and Session, it may be conjectured—or it may even be very probable—that the applicant meant to beseech their Lordships for letters of inhibition at his instance in the premises in common form. But, in point of fact, he has neither prayed in appropriate terms for letters of inhibition, nor has he prayed that they should be in common form. He begins a sentence, but he does not conclude it. Or, if he meant it for a concluded sentence, it is not an intelligible one. He might have added, if he had chosen, ‘ ought not to be granted,’ and craved some other remedy. Or, after adding the word ‘ ought to be granted,’ he might, in place of craving that the letters should be in common form, have gone on to say, as indeed he ought to have done if he wanted a warrant for edictal citation, that they ought to be in some special form. In short it seems in vain to conjecture how the applicant meant to conclude, or might have concluded, the sentence, assuming it to be unfinished ; and in a matter of diligence such as inhibition—than which nothing has been more critically dealt with by the Court—the Lord Ordinary does not see how one conclusion of the sentence can be held to have been meant, rather than another.

“ If, again, it be assumed, that the words used were intended to form a completed sentence, and consequently a completed prayer, the observation occurs that they are in themselves altogether unintelligible, and that the Court cannot be called upon in so grave a matter to guess at the meaning of a party who has not expressed it.

and the cautioners of the messenger, should be made parties to the process. On 13th July 1854, their Lordships therefore pronounced an interlocutor

Davidson v.
Mackenzie.

"In the case of Brownlee v. Donald, decided by Lord Corehouse, 24th January 1829, as well as in the case of M'Laren v. Symers, decided by the Second Division, 19th November 1836, 15 S. and D. 51, it was clear enough that what the applicant wanted, was suspension in common form; but the bill was in each case refused notwithstanding, because the prayer was not in the usual and appropriate style. The Lord Ordinary cannot see, that because a plack was at one time the clerk's fee for bills of this kind, whereby they have got the name of plack bills, this ought to make any such difference as to render the decisions now alluded to inapplicable. On the contrary, the argument arises, a fortiori, that if, in bills of suspensions, which are mere modes of staying procedure or seeking review, so strict a rule was enforced, much more ought it to be enforced as to the prayer of a bill, which is truly a petition for diligence.

"From the additional report of the Deputy Keeper of the Signet, it appears that in the search made by him over a period of sixty-three years, he found only one instance of a bill for letters of inhibition containing a prayer in precisely similar words with the present. He found a few others with the prayer loosely worded—generally with the addition of '&c.,' which shewed that something more was meant than was expressed, and admitting therefore, more easily than here, of the usual modes of style being supplied. But there has obviously, in no view, been any course of practice as can be held to sanction the unintelligible form of prayer here used, and the Lord Ordinary sees no reason why so slovenly a procedure should ever be judicially recognised and sanctioned for the first time.

"III. The execution of the messenger bears, that he lawfully inhibited and dis-armed the debtor, that he should in no ways sell or alienate his lands, &c., and that he left a full double to the will, with copy inhibition to that effect for the debtor, at the record office, in terms of the statute. This is the substance of the execution, so far as it concerns the debtor, and (laying aside in the meantime any objection to the warrant), it might have been a good enough execution of citation of the debtor, if it had appeared, ex facie of the proceedings, that the debtor was then furth of Scotland.

"The solemnities necessary in executing inhibitions against a debtor 'are the same which are prescribed in the execution of summonses and letters of horning, by 1541, cap. 75.'—Ersk., 2, 11, 4; vide also H., 2, 5, 55; Bankt., 1, 7, 136; Nat., 4, 50, 13. But by the statute 1540, cap. 75, execution against parties, by leaving a copy at their dwelling-house, is only allowed 'gif they cannot apprehend them personallie,' and the statute is silent as to the mode of execution against debtors who are abroad, which being, as already observed, an extraordinary remedy, has always, so far as the Lord Ordinary can discover, been held in practice to require a special warrant.

"If, therefore, this extraordinary mode of citation be adopted, it would seem to be requisite (apart altogether from any objection to the will of the letters as unauthorised), that it should appear ex facie of the messenger's execution, or of the diligence to which the execution refers, why he did so; much in the same way, as the messenger, when he cites at the dwelling-house, always adds, that this was done in respect he could not find the debtor personally. It may be sufficient for this purpose to design the debtor as furth of the kingdom in the execution, either expressly by special reference to the letters, if these contain such designation. But in any way or another, it ought to appear on the face of the diligence, that the debtor was abroad, so that he could neither be cited personally nor at his dwelling-house, and this fact is accordingly set forth ex facie of the form of execution applicable to such a case, given in Bell on Deeds, v. 6, p. 381, and by Darling in his Office of a Messenger, p. 141. The report of Mr Drysdale, made under the remit already mentioned, shews that the usual practice is in conformity with the rule here laid down.

"But in the present case, it is not set forth anywhere that the debtor was abroad. There is nothing from beginning to end of the diligence, including in that term the messenger's execution, to shew why the messenger adopted the extra-

A supplementary action against these parties was accordingly raised, and a record having been made up, the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie), on 19th July 1855, in respect of the dependence of the principal and relative cause in the Inner-House, made great avizandum to the Lords of the First Division.

These actions were conjoined, and the relevancy of Mr Mackenzie's defence founded on his technical objections to the validity of the inhibition, as well as these objections themselves, were then discussed at great length in the summer session of 1856, and again in November 1856. The pursuers and Mr Mackenzie alone took part in the discussion.

The pursuers pleaded;—I. As to the validity of the defence: That the relative position of the parties was important. This inhibition was ex facie regular. It was delivered by Mr Mackenzie as properly and regularly registered. Thomson believing it to be so, ranked on the estate. His preference was cut down solely by the neglect of Mr Mackenzie, who himself admitted that it was set aside on the ground of defective registration alone. The present objections taken to its validity had not been proponed in the action of ranking and sale. But it was necessary not only to aver the objections, but to satisfy the Court that they would have been sustained, if stated in the competition. That had not been done.

The judgment in the case of Cooke did not establish the competency of the defence. The point could not arise in that case, for the diligence was objected to in a competition, both on the ground of the invalidity of the diligence itself, and also on the ground that it was not well registered. Both heads of objection were sustained. In that state of matters, the creditor selected the party whom he supposed to be the first wrong-doer, viz., ordinary mode of citation which he did, in place of the ordinary and primary mode of citing the debtor personally, or the alternative mode of leaving a copy at his dwelling-house.

"IV. It remains to notice a further objection taken to the messenger's execution, viz., that it bears that he inhibited the lieges only at the market-cross of Edinburgh, pier and shore of Leith; which mode of publication has been, it is said, abolished by the statute 6 Geo. IV., cap. 120, sect. 51, so that there has been truly, ex facie of the execution, no available publication to, or inhibition of the lieges at all.

"If it can be held, as was assumed in argument on both sides before the Lord Ordinary, that section 51 of the statute applies to the act of inhibiting the lieges or in other words, to the act of publication, and consequently, that in the case of inhibition against a debtor abroad, all that was formerly done at the market-cross pier and shore, must now be done in the office for edictal citations, the Lord Ordinary would be disposed to think this objection entitled to great weight. For the execution certainly does not bear, that the messenger any where inhibited the liege except at the market-cross of Edinburgh, pier and shore of Leith, and, as the words in regard to inhibiting and discharging the lieges, are the usual and established words of style for expressing publication of an inhibition, the want of them, as applicable to the proper locality, would seem to be fatal to the diligence.

"But the enactment refers to publication, citation, &c., as against persons forth of Scotland, and as the publication in question is to the lieges who are within Scotland, although some of them may be abroad, the Lord Ordinary is not altogether satisfied that the enactment is applicable. On the other hand, if the publication although made to the lieges, can be held to be publication 'as against' the debtor who is forth of Scotland, there can be no doubt that the enactment applies. The point may deserve further elucidation, if, upon a reclaiming note, the Court think it necessary to go upon it."

the writer of the diligence, and so that there was no room for the writer pleading the error of the Keeper, who was not called. That case was therefore quite different from the present. The principle of law here applicable was this—Wherever a claim of debt had been lost or imperilled by the wrongful acts of an official, the liability attending it was the payment of the debt itself. The wrong-doer might obtain an assignation to all the rights which the creditor held, but that did not affect the right of the creditor to recover payment, in the first instance, of the whole debt. It was said that this doctrine was only applicable to the case of a messenger who had failed to incarcerate, or Magistrates who had failed to detain debtors; and that the doctrine applied, because it was uncertain whether the incarceration or detention might not have enforced payment. But that was not so.¹

Mackenzie.

The case of Campbell v. Clason shewed that the above rule was held to form a portion of our law. Its applicability to that particular case alone was doubted. If the Keeper were entitled to take such objections as the present to a diligence, he would equally be entitled to take all other objections to it, and propone reasons of reduction, founded e. g. on the bad registration of a sasine. But it was not for him to plead such a defence, for it could not be made out either that these objections would have been proposed, or that they would have been successful.

There was an exception to the general rule, which, however, it strengthened. Magistrates were entitled to plead the illegality of diligence, but there a messenger was not entitled to do so. The principle was, that as the execution of an illegal diligence against the person would in itself be an illegal act, the Magistrate was not bound to perform it.²

There was this distinction between a magistrate and a messenger, that the creditor did not properly employ the magistrate. Magistrates were only named functionaries to do a certain act, in respect of their office. But the messenger being employed to execute the diligence, was not called on to examine its validity, and could not competently refuse to execute it on the ground that it was illegal.

The defence could not be brought within the exception, because the defender could not say that if he had correctly recorded this inhibition, he would have been doing an illegal act, which would have subjected him to damages. That was the principle on which the case of the Magistrates was rested. It was Mr Mackenzie's duty simply to record this diligence; and having failed to do so, his liability followed. Therefore, on the assumption that these objections to the diligence were fatal, the defender was not entitled to plead them. But,

II. As regards the objections themselves,—the two first did not appear ex facie of the diligence, but were said to be found in the plack bill which was the warrant of the diligence. (1.) The prayer was—"Herefore, letters of inhibition." The first objection was that this was not a prayer—that the sentence was either unintelligible or irreverent, and in either case invalid. There was great uncertainty as to the origin of plack bills. It appeared to have been originally a supplication for an extraordinary privilege or remedy, and, accordingly, when a pursuer wished to dispense with the ordinary induciae of calling, it was necessary to present a bill to the Court for authority to do so. That became an abuse, and the Act of Sederunt of 21st June 1672, determined what summonses should be privileged.

Again, where an extraordinary remedy against a debtor was desired, a bill was necessary. So also where the debtor was furth of the kingdom, a creditor intending to sue diligence against him presented a petition for edictal citation. Thus bills came into our practice, and continued to be used when the necessity for them had ceased,—but still, only where extraordinary privilege or remedy was sought for. The bill was thus often framed without much attention to style at all; so that in practice, if it did pray for the particular remedy or warrant which was required, that was held sufficient to entitle the party to obtain it.

It was said that this prayer, “herefore letters of inhibition,” was incomplete and unintelligible, and that if it had gone on it might have been “herefore letters of inhibition ought not to be granted.” But the enquiry here was, did Mr Thomson present this bill as for letters of inhibition? If so, the bill was quite right. The Court understood it to be for letters of inhibition. That was conclusive. This objection could not therefore be sustained.

(2.) Another objection was, that this plack bill was bad, because it did not specially pray for warrant for edictal citation in the letters of inhibition. There, again, there was no statute enjoining that a party intending to use personal citation against a debtor, either in diligence or summons, must pray for express warrant in the bill. The decision in the case of Braco was against the necessity of any such prayer.¹

The authorities, however, were at variance. Each writer quoted his own practice and views. Continuous practice there was none, and such as it was, it was discrepant and variable. This shewed that there was no fixed form of style. But practice ought not to be received as establishing form, unless that form be necessary. But, whatever the propriety of a craving for warrant for edictal citation might have been when edictal citation was not established as part of our law, that necessity had now ceased. The foundation of the supplication formerly was, that the remedy was an extraordinary one; that the Court would examine the grounds of the supplication; and that the Court had the power to grant or refuse it. It passed ex deliberatione. But edictal citation, so long ago as 1747, had become a part of our consuetudinary law, and so part of the law of the kingdom;² and it now made part of our public statutory law, being recognised by the Judicature Act of 1825, sec. 51. Letters of inhibition still remained an extraordinary remedy, and could only be got by plack letters to the Court. But edictal citation having become part of the public law, a petition for warrant in the bill was now unnecessary. This objection was without foundation, because the remedy was not now an extraordinary one. Investigation into the fact whether the party was furth of the kingdom or not was unnecessary. The Court could not refuse the remedy when asked.

(3.) The third objection to the inhibition applied to the execution. There was no proper statutory form of execution. The inference was, that it might be framed in various modes, provided it stated all that was necessary to support the act of execution itself. Although there was no statute on the subject, Lord Stair’s authority was against setting forth in the execution against a party furth of the kingdom, the actual fact of his being out of the kingdom.¹ In the same way, if it plainly appeared on the face of the execution that the messenger was citing the party as furth of the kingdom, it was not requisite that he should state in express words that the debtor was out of the kingdom.²

Mackenzie.

Even in competition where the greatest strictness was observed, it had been held that specification of the dwelling-house where copies had been left was not necessary. Further, the messenger could not, of his own knowledge, set forth that the debtor was furth of the kingdom. Whatever was within his province or duty, he must so state it, but where it was not within his duty, he could not undertake to speak as of his own knowledge. His employer must take his own risk that he had correctly informed the messenger on the subject. It could not therefore be a fatal objection to the diligence that the messenger did not set forth that fact as of his own knowledge.³

(4.) It was said that there had not been proper publication against the lieges. That objection turned on the sound construction of the statute.⁴ It would have been sufficient if a copy had been left at the Register House, but the messenger did more. Publication at the market-cross was plainly abolished by the statute, and all that required to be done might be done, and well done, at the Register House. Therefore, the messenger did right in inhibiting the debtor at the Register House, as well as by publication at the market-cross in the old form.⁵

The defender pleaded:—(1) As to the relevancy—This was an action of damages laid on the Act 1693. The material question therefore was, whether the pursuer had been “prejudged”? The objection to the relevancy meant that the facts and inferences from them on which the defence was rested were not available to the defender. But there was nothing objectionable in his statement and plea. Therefore the question was, whether the Keeper was to be liable, although the diligence, when presented to him, should be absolutely null and worthless.

It would be strong to hold the Keeper liable for not recording a thing which, being null in itself, could not be put right by registration. Therefore, as a question of principle, the plea could not be supported. It could only be supported on authority.

Where there was a plain neglect or violation of duty, no matter by whom, of so gross a kind as to infer liability, by which a debt, or means of recovering a debt, was lost to the creditor, the Court no doubt would never enquire what were the probabilities of recovering that debt as regarded the solvency of the debtor or the sufficiency of the property against which the diligence was used, and for this plain reason, that you could not tell with any certainty what would have been the effect of that diligence, had it been well gone about. But in all that class of cases, the grounds of liability were assumed or proved before coming to the consideration of the question of principle, as regarded the ascertainment of the quantum of damages. The rule established by these cases referred entirely to the extent of the liability, not to the grounds of the liability, and there lay the distinction between the cases referred to by the pursuer and the present. The fault being completely established, the total amount of the debt was taken as the quantum of liability. In all these cases, it was simply a question of the measure of damages, and not of the ground of liability. Here we have nothing to do with the measure of liability, but everything with the ground of liability.¹

Wherever there was uncertainty whether a document which had been bungled would be availing, the Court fixed liability. But when there was a certainty that it would not be available, then no liability attached.² Such was this case.

II. It had not been contended that a plack bill was not an essential proceeding, nor that there was any mode in which diligence could be expedited, except by letters proceeding upon bill. That being so, the bill was an indispensable part of the diligence, and therefore must be correctly framed. It was said that a bill was only necessary in applying for an extraordinary remedy. It was admitted that diligence by inhibition was an extraordinary remedy, but it was contended that edictal citation was not, for it was said that it had been long in our practice.³ It was on immemorial custom that the validity of diligence by inhibition edictal citations depended. But it was nevertheless an extraordinary remedy. Therefore the antiquity or frequency of the practice did not make it the less an extraordinary remedy. (2.) Then as to the mode in which this was gone about. There was no statement in the body of the letters of inhibition that the debtor was not residing at Thirdpart, where his residence was, nor an allegation that he was beyond seas, but, being designed as a Scotsman resident at his own dwelling, the will proceeded to charge the messenger to cite him personally, if within Scotland, "and if furth thereof," then edictally, so that it depended on the fact whether the debtor was out of Scotland or not that the messenger had authority to cite him edictally or not. It was conditional authority that he had, and so also as to the publication. It was only in the event of the debtor being furth of Scotland that the messenger was to proceed to the market-cross of Edinburgh, and pier and shore of Leith. Now, first, the framer of these letters of inhibition had no authority so to frame them. His only warrant was the bill, and the authority of the Court was contained in the fiat which was the granting of what was craved. What was craved?—"herefore letters of inhibition," and that was appended to a bill, which stated that Mr Thomson had raised inhibition against "Captain Anstruther of Thirdpart." It was not said that he was out of the kingdom, nor did the bill crave warrant to cite him as out of the kingdom. That was one flagrant discrepancy between the letters and the bill. Further, it did not address the Lords of Council and Session, and contained no intelligible prayer, yet this was the whole authority to Mr Monypenny for drawing these letters.

Now, in the first step in diligence, the application to the Court must be formal and complete. In principle, there was no reason why a bill should not be as carefully framed as a summons. And the same principle had been applied to bills of suspension, in which a defect in the prayer had been found to be fatal.⁴

So also, a petition not addressed to the Lords of Council and Session would not be entertained, nor one where the prayer was unintelligible. The practice was certainly rather in favour of the abbreviated form of address, which therefore, if it stood alone, might be little open to objection; but, when combined with the total absence of an intelligible prayer—which was not consistent with practice, and which no practice could justify,—that was a totally different question, for the prayer was the material part of the writ. It was its essence, without which the bill was of no avail. If so, what better was a prayer which was in itself unintelligible, by which you might conjecture that the party intended to apply for letters of inhibition in common form, but which did not apply for them? The mere addition of words written in a different line and in a different character from the body of the writ would not make a prayer. There must be something more, and that could only be a good and intelligible demand. There was no practice to justify the contracting of the main body of the application, so as really to express no meaning at all. Farther, confessedly the party wanted not only letters of inhibition, but also warrant for edictal citation, and therefore, even if it should be held that he had expressed himself intelligibly as to the former, it was impossible to say that he had asked for the latter. If capable of being read at all, the prayer was that the party wished to have letters applicable to Captain Austruther of Thirdpart as resident in Scotland, and therefore it could only be read as desiring letters applicable to that state of matters. The agent could not draw letters in broader terms than the bill. The letters must echo the bill, otherwise the diligence is destroyed.¹

It was said that this had not been made the subject of express decision, and that no opinion had been given on it by any institutional writer. That might be true, and yet many things were fixed in law by inveterate usage, which had not been the subject of decision, and which were not noticed by any writers. But writers on practice were unanimous in stating the rule to be that when you want a warrant for edictal citation, you must ask for it. Again, this was not a matter of practice in the execution of an Act of Parliament, for it stood on custom, and therefore the practice and the modes of doing it were of still more importance.

The regulations of 1672 were a warrant to a Writer to the Signet to execute certain kinds of writs without a bill. The Act applied to summonses. But these were to be distinguished from the present case; and in all classes of cases not referred to in these regulations, you must have authority for every word contained in the letters, and which you can only obtain by bill.

(3.) The messenger's execution was liable to two objections. The warrant for citation in the letters was a conditional warrant. The messenger was not entitled under it to cite the debtor as furth of the kingdom, unless he really were so. The messenger did not say that the debtor was furth of the kingdom as substantive matter of fact. Nor did he say that he so cited him as being furth of the kingdom: the real meaning of the execution was that the messenger so cited the debtor as being in the kingdom; for no man was presumed to be furth of the kingdom; and, therefore, to say that you have actually cited a man whose natural and ordinary residence was in Scotland, was to say that you had done an illegal thing. The execution was therefore not applicable to the warrant on which it proceeded.²

(4.) Further, there was no proper execution against the lieges. The messenger did not say that he inhibited the lieges, nor anything equivalent to that. The execution of a summons or diligence, which merely contained the statement that certain forms were gone through, without saying that the person was cited, was a bad execution. The messenger must say that by virtue of his warrant he lawfully summoned the debtor by leaving a copy at his dwelling-house, because he could not find him personally. The mode of doing the thing was subordinate. It must be stated. But the fact that the messenger did lawfully summon the debtor was the material part of the execution. Now, here there was no statement that he inhibited the lieges. According to the existing state of the law, the form of publication adopted here was abolished. Upon all these grounds, this diligence, when it came into the hands of the Keeper, was truly worthless and unavailing, for these defects were of such a character as necessarily to annul it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case has undergone an unusual amount of discussion, partly owing to the natural anxiety of the parties, and partly from the anxiety of the Court. It seems to have been fully discussed before the Lord Ordinary, in whose note all the cases and authorities referred to are reviewed; and we have since had the case argued first generally, and then separately, on the particular points which pressed themselves on the consideration of the Court, and on which they desired to have further light before giving judgment.

The case comes before us in the form of an action of damages against the Keeper of the Register of Inhibitions; and it is laid upon the ground, that he having committed an error in recording an inhibition by reason of which error the diligence was, by a final judgment of Court in a question of competition, cut down, is therefore liable in damages to the party who was in right of the inhibition, and whose claim of debt was intended to be protected by it. That damage is said to have consisted in various things set forth as consequences of the cutting down of the inhibition.

There can be no doubt that the error committed in recording the inhibition was a fatal error. That is not disputed. That the inhibition was set aside and effect denied to it in the competition, in respect expressly of that error, is also beyond question. It does not distinctly appear in the record whether there were or were not, any other objections then stated to the inhibition. None are set forth in the record as having been stated; and it is admitted that the only ground on which effect was denied to the inhibition was the error committed in recording it. The party in right of the inhibition, and who failed in his endeavour to support it in the competition, appears to have entered into a transaction with the Keeper of the Register of Inhibitions, whereby the judgment of this Court denying effect to the inhibition was made the subject of appeal to the House of Lords. It does not appear from the record, whether at that stage any other objections to the inhibition were stated or suggested. Notice to the Keeper of the Register had been given previous to the competition. It does not appear that he then stated any reason why he should not interpose; nor does it appear that when the agreement was made that the case should be appealed, he then, as Keeper, stated any objection at all. The agreement, however, did not admit his liability. On the contrary, as read it, the agreement was, that in the event of his being eventually found liable for the loss, he would bear the expense of the appeal. If not ultimately subjected he was to be relieved of that expense. In the meantime he was to disburse it. The House of Lords affirmed the judgment of this Court denying effect to the inhibition, and now the claim of damages is made against the Keeper of the Register.

If there were no objections stated against the inhibition other than the error in recording it, I see no ground for holding that the Keeper would not be liable. He pleads, indeed, that he is not liable for any consequences that may have resulted from the misrecording, and contends that the error was not of a kind for which he is responsible. That defence has not been supported by any authority or by any argument which we can give effect. But the Keeper defends himself upon other grounds. He says that the demand upon him is for damage said to have been sustained through a wrong act of his; but that truly no damage was sustained by reason of any error committed by him, nor could there be any in reference to the inhibition in question, because that inhibition was invalid when it was brought to him, owing to defects in the preparing and executing of it, committed by the agent who prepared it and the messenger who executed it—that the defender did not spoil the inhibition or render it invalid—that he could not have done so, because it had been destroyed, and w invalid when brought to him to be recorded—that he could not, by the most perfect accuracy of recording, give to it validity, nor by any inaccuracy of recording deprive it of a validity which it did not possess, or frustrate the attainment of results which it was incapable of attaining—and, consequently, that no damage has, or could have, resulted from his actings. He tells us in what respect it was invalid at the time it was brought to him. He says that certain errors had been committed by the agent employed to prepare the inhibition, and that certain errors were committed by the messenger employed to execute it. We have heard a lengthened argument upon these objections to the inhibition. The messenger and agent have been called in a supplementary action.

In regard to the objections to the validity of the inhibition thus stated by the Keeper of the Register, and which have been given effect to by the Lord Ordinary, I have anxiously applied my mind to them after hearing the argument submitted to us, and I have formed an opinion upon them, which I shall now state. Perhaps the best order to take them in is to begin at the beginning of the proceedings. The proceedings begin with the writer or agent employed to prepare and obtain the letters of inhibition. The error which he is said to have committed is this : that he prepared the letters of inhibition containing a warrant to the messenger for executing the inhibition as against a party furth of the kingdom, without having obtained the requisite authority for expeding the letters in that form—that the bill which he had prepared and presented, and upon which the letters of inhibition proceeded, was defective, in as much as it did not state that the party was furth of the kingdom, or expressly pray for letters of inhibition against a party furth of the kingdom, and hence that the authority adhibited to that bill to expedite the letters was not applicable to such a state of matters,—therefore, that although the letters did contain an instruction or warrant to the messenger to execute the inhibition as against a party furth of the kingdom, such instruction was unauthorised and of no use. We have had before us evidence of the practice in regard to this matter, and have heard an argument upon it. The conclusion at which I have arrived in reference to that objection is, that I think it too critical to cast the inhibition in this case. The prayer of the bill is undoubtedly very elliptical—more so than in almost any instance I have seen ; but an elliptical prayer is of frequent practice, and it is a question of degree whether the prayer of this bill was so elliptical as to be altogether unavailing, or whether it was sufficient to cover the case of inhibition applicable to the event of the party being furth of the kingdom.

I notice, that in the narrative of the bill for letters of inhibition, it is not said that the party is furth of the kingdom. He is called “ Captain Robert Anstruther of Thirdpart.” But nothing more is said about him ; and the prayer is, “ Herefore, letters of inhibition.” That abridged prayer is very general and comprehensive. There is practice for not filling up the full prayer, but merely enough to indicate the particular kind of diligence wanted. The prayer of the bill in question is perfectly general, and admits of being read as asking letters of inhibition of the most comprehensive character ; and the bill having been passed, it was not incompetent for the writer to expedite letters of inhibition of the most comprehensive character—that is to say, letters of inhibition with a warrant to the messenger to execute the inhibition against the party as either within or furth of the kingdom, as the case might be, suiting the warrant to the alternative position of matters.

That being the opinion which I entertain in regard to the bill and the preparation of the inhibition, I come now to consider the objections taken to the execution.

The letters of inhibition instructed the messenger to “ inhibit and discharge the said Captain Robert Anstruther, personally, or at his dwelling-place, if within the land, and if furth thereof, by delivery of a copy hereof at the Record Office of the Keeper of the Records of the Court of Session ;” and, of course, the inhibition was also to be executed against the lieges, as it is called, or, more properly, published to the lieges. The messenger receiving that warrant was entitled to execute it against the party, if within Scotland, at his dwelling-place, or, if furth of Scotland, by that species of edictal citation referred to in the letters by delivery of a copy at the Record Office of the Keeper of the Records of the Court of Session, in terms of the statute. The messenger, according to his return, executed the diligence by delivery of a copy at the Office of the Keeper of the Records of the Court of Session, “ in terms of the statute thereanent, within the General Register House, Edinburgh ; and the like just copy of inhibition in virtue and to the effect foresaid, I affixed and left for all and sundry his Majesty's lieges and others whom it effeirs, at and upon each of the said market-cross of Edinburgh and Pier and Shore of Leith, after using the solemnities foresaid." He does not say that Captain Anstruther was furth of the kingdom, and that he executed it against him as furth of the kingdom. But, in effect, his return says "the warrant contained in the letters of inhibition instructed me to execute it against Captain Anstruther personally, or at his dwelling-place, if within the kingdom ; and if furth thereof, by delivery of a copy at the Record Office of the Keeper of the Records of the Court of Session ; and I tell you that acting upon that warrant, I executed it by delivering a copy at the Record Office of the Keeper of the Records of the Court of Session, in terms of the statute." That is the return he makes. There is no positive statement by him that Captain Anstruther was furth of the kingdom. The letters of inhibition themselves implied that he might or might not be so, and the messenger was told that in the one case he was to adopt one course, and in another event he was to adopt another course. He adopted the course of leaving a copy at the Record Office, in terms of the statute. The plain meaning of that is, that he executed the inhibition against Captain Anstruther, not as being within Scotland, but as being furth of Scotland.

Now, it is contended, and with great force, that the alternative of executing the inhibition against the party as furth of Scotland was a sort of dernier resort—that the messenger was bound to state a reason for not going to the dwelling-house of the debtor,—that it was the messenger's duty to state that he had recourse to the other alternative because the party was furth of the kingdom. I do not think it is made out as clear matter of practice that the return made by a messenger, when he executes inhibition against a party as furth of the kingdom, contains any positive statement that the party was actually furth of the kingdom. The words I find in most styles do not necessarily imply that. They admit of being read otherwise—they admit of the construction that the diligence was executed as is done in the case of persons furth of the kingdom. The messenger cannot be called upon to make a positive assertion that the debtor is furth of the kingdom, though he is not entitled to execute the inhibition against the debtor as furth of the kingdom if he can find him within the kingdom, and may incur serious responsibility if he does so. But the objection here is to the form of the execution returned by the messenger. Is it wanting in statement that the debtor was furth of the kingdom, and is such omission fatal to its validity ? I do not think it was necessary that the execution should contain a positive statement that the debtor was furth of the kingdom. The messenger might know that he could not find any trace of him within the kingdom without being in a condition to assert positively that he was furth of the kingdom. There are some things that the messenger must state, and in regard to which, if he states a falsehood, he is liable to the pains of perjury. I do not think that this is one of them. If he has executed the diligence against the debtor personally, he must state that he gave the copy to him personally ; and if the fact be that he did not give it to him personally, then his statement that he did so is a falsehood, and he is liable to the pains of perjury. And so, when the diligence is executed by leaving it at the debtor's dwelling-house, the messenger's statement that he did so leave it must be in strict accordance with the fact. And there are other circumstances, being all within his own knowledge, which he is also bound to state with strict accuracy, but it is not necessary for him to make the assertion under the responsibility of the pains of forgery, that the party against whom he executes the diligence is furth of the kingdom. He must state how he executed the diligence, and it must appear that he did so in the same way as is done in the case of a party furth of the kingdom, and if he has not made due enquiry on the subject, he may be liable to serious consequences. But that is a different thing from casting the execution on the ground of want of formality. It is very usual to introduce into the execution some such words as I have referred to, viz., that the diligence was executed against the debtor "as furth of the kingdom,"—that is to say, as is done in the case of a party furth of the kingdom. The words are not in this execution. But they are only descriptive of the mode in which the diligence has been executed against the debtor, and the messenger has here described the mode in which it was executed against Captain Anstruther.

which we see was as in the case of a party furth of the kingdom. It speaks for itself. Therefore, I think that, so far as regards the execution against Captain Anstruther, it is a return made to the will of the diligence in terms of the warrant, and may be sustained. I am disposed to sustain it as a valid execution against Captain Anstruther, as furth of the kingdom.

There are other objections taken to the execution of this diligence in reference to the manner in which it was published to the lieges. These objections also are too critical to be sustained. There is sufficient statement of publication. The publication was made in two ways, at the Pier of Leith, and at the office of the Keeper of the Records. It appears to me that the objections stated against the publication at these places are not fatal to this inhibition. The mode of publication is a matter as to which there may have been looseness—not a strict adherence to the best forms; but still I am not disposed to regard the objections as fatal to this execution.

That being so, I am of opinion that the Keeper of the Register of Inhibitions has not made out his case against this inhibition as being invalid and ineffectual before it was presented to him to be recorded. The questions raised in regard to it are nice, and afford room for difference of opinion, and it was not without much consideration that I came to the conclusion I have now stated. But that being the conclusion at which I have arrived, it is perhaps not necessary for me to go farther in reference to this part of the case. It is not necessary, in my view of the matter, to decide whether, if these objections to the validity of the inhibition had been established to our satisfaction, that would, in the circumstances of this case, have been a sufficient answer on the part of the Keeper to the claim of damage made against him, and would have relieved him of all liability. It is not necessary for me to consider that question, as the objections are not, in my opinion, of that fatal character. I shall only say in regard to that question, that it involves great nicety, and involves great complication of considerations. The error in respect of which this inhibition was cast is an ascertained fact. That, beyond all doubt, was a fatal error, and was the ground on which effect was denied to the inhibition. Whether effect would have been denied to it upon any of the other grounds now brought forward, or all of them, if they had been stated in the competition, may be a question of some difficulty now to solve. It may, perhaps, be assumed that the opinion the Court now arrives at in law in regard to these objections is that which the Court would have arrived at in the competition, if the same objections had been stated there, and in that view, the question may perhaps be solved. But whether any party would have considered it worth their while to bring them forward, and to run the gauntlet of a litigation in regard to them in the competition, is and must remain a matter of uncertainty; and therefore, it may be contended, that it is and must remain matter of uncertainty that any damage ever would have arisen to this party if the error in the recording of the inhibition had not been committed.

Other difficulties, too, present themselves for consideration. The liabilities of all the parties brought into the field in this litigation do not rest on the same principles. The liability of the Keeper of the Register may not admit of the same grounds of defence as the liability of the agent or of the messenger. The liability of the Keeper rests upon his failure in the due performance of a statutory duty, which the party in right of the inhibition was by force of statute obliged to resort to him to get done, and which he, by his position, was bound to do properly. The claim against the agent arises from employment voluntarily given to him, and the duty thereby imposed on him to apply a certain amount of professional skill, intelligence, and care in the execution of that employment; but it does not follow that every blunder fatal to the object in view will subject the agent in damages. There are various errors which have been held not to indicate such want of care or want of skill as to infer such liability. The same may be said of the messenger. Their liability therefore rests on a different principle from that of the Keeper, and there is difficulty in sustaining the relevancy of the defence here maintained by the Keeper, even on the supposition that the Court should come to the conclusion, upon the whole, that this inhibition was previously defective. Doubts may be entertained as to the relevancy of that defence. I have great difficulty in regard to that question. I entertain great doubt of the relevancy of all these critical objections to the inhibition. The grounds of defence to be urged by the Keeper. I doubt his

No. 54. right to compel the holder of the inhibition to try all these nice points with him whose ascertained error was the ground on which the inhibition was actually cast. —
Dec. 20, 1856. Some objections may be plainly such, that, if stated, they would be sustained, and Davidson v. the Court might not think it necessary to go farther. If it had been said that the Mackenzie. diligence had not been executed at all, or that it had been executed at the market-cross and nowhere else, or that it had not been published to the lieges,—if these objections had existed, and still more, if they had been stated and given effect to along with objection to the recording, that would have been another matter. But I do not think it necessary to go into that. The circumstances of this case are not such.

I have been assuming all along that Captain Anstruther is to be held as having been furth of the kingdom, for this execution could not have been sustained against him on any other footing. Upon that matter there is no admission in the record. There is a statement that he was an officer in the army, and that his regiment was stationed in Malta, and so forth; but the parties are more or less at variance as to whether he was abroad or not at the time of the executing this diligence; and they have both renounced probation in regard to that. I think that, where there is a positive statement on the part of the pursuer of this action, that Captain Anstruther was only temporarily in Scotland, and never had a domicile there;—that he had left Scotland a month before this diligence was executed—when inhibition is raised against him, and executed against him as furth of Scotland,—and when there is no positive statement on the other side that, at that date, he was in Edinburgh, or anywhere else in Scotland—I think that, in these circumstances—the party not undertaking to instruct that he was in Scotland, not even making any positive statement that he was in Scotland, the presumption is that the messenger did right in executing the inhibition against Major Anstruther as furth of Scotland. If the pursuer can prove that Major Anstruther was actually in Scotland at the time, he may be able still to reduce and set aside the execution in a proper action of reduction on that ground.

In these observations I have not alluded to any of the decided cases. It would take more time than I am disposed to occupy now to go over them in detail. I have examined them all, and I cannot say that I have found in any one of them, or in any class of them, anything that absolutely solves this case. There are principles and dicta to be found in several of them, but none that directly solve this case. The diligence of inhibition is to be strictly examined, and especially in cases of competition; and that rule was present to my mind when I said that I hesitated as to the relevancy of this defence; but I do not find any case which gives a clear ground for sustaining such objections as are stated in the present case. Two cases of suspension have been referred to, one which came before the Inner-House, and another before Lord Corehouse in 1829, in which a defective bill was refused. They are not in point, and they were a good deal trenched on by the subsequent case of Russell.

Then, again, in regard to the case of Oooke, I do not think it was decided on a principle applicable here. It was there held, that Falconer had done all that was incumbent on him to do. That was the substance of the defence. As to the case of Maclean and Grant, I cannot say that I have at any time regarded it as clearly establishing the principle that a man might wipe out one fault by committing another. The case is intelligible without that; and I do not see any case that clearly covers the present. Upon the whole, I think that the objections stated to this inhibition are too critical to be sustained in a question of this kind; and I do not think it necessary to rest my judgment on any other ground.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion; and hesitate to deliver any separate opinion, from the apprehension that it will weaken the strong and distinct ground on which your Lordship has rested the judgment. This case has been to me more than once the subject of the greatest and most anxious deliberation. It has perplexed me more than most cases. I have had to consider, and I have not had the assistance from the decided cases that one would expect to find. I cannot say that even now my opinion is a very decided or positive one. I feel, in regard to various points of the case, very considerable difficulty. But I am now quite satisfied that the result at which I have arrived is a sound one. On one point or more we have had different opinions at different times. But the result is, that I have now come to as decided an opinion on the case as I can expect to come to, and I am bound to give parties the benefit of it. No. 54.

It had occurred to me to take the case in the reverse order from what your Lordship has done; and, in the first place, as to the relevancy of the defence—I have found myself involved in many of those puzzles referred to by your Lordship. The claim, in its simple aspect, is for damages in respect of a defect in the registration of the inhibition. The answer is, that there was no damage thence arising, in respect of the earlier defect in the diligence itself, and in its execution. That raises a question of very great importance, and I am not prepared, and do not think it necessary to decide it absolutely now; but it would hardly have been right to deal with this case without giving that question very deliberate consideration. If the blunder in the diligence be patent and palpable on the face of the writing presented to the Keeper of the Register, so much so as to have warranted him in refusing to register the instrument, because on the face of it it was a nullity,—then the law would be clear enough, and the party would be thrown back at once with his instrument unregistered,—there being no neglect of duty on the part of the Keeper, but an exercise of discretion in refusing to register a document which was not a diligence at all. But in such a case it might have been, that the defects he thus acted on might afterwards have been cured. The party might have betaken himself to his remedies aliunde, and perhaps have had his recourse on other parties against whom he might have a ready remedy. But he is put in a different situation, when the Keeper at first acknowledges the validity of the instrument, and after a long interval, when other circumstances have come out which exclude the possibility of cure or recourse against third parties,—he says, now I discover this to be defective diligence, and I am not to be liable for a blunder in its registration: I am to be excused from the effect of a fault in my own proper duty by taking advantage of these errors. That is one shape in which the question might have occurred, and in which it might have been difficult to sustain the defence.

It might next have occurred where the objection was latent, not appearing ex facie of any of the documents presented to the Keeper, but lurking in some of the previous papers, to which he had no ready or natural access, and it might be such as to raise questions of great difficulty—of doubtful decision, and with distant and uncertain results. Now, I have a doubt, in such a case, whether the Keeper is entitled to be placed in all respects as a creditor in a competition;—I do not say that he is;—I do not wish to be understood as having decided in my own mind that he is not. But in dealing with the question, that is an important element to consider. It is an important question, whether a person in charge of a public register is entitled to discharge himself of neglect or culpa in his own duty, by involving a party whose interests he was there to forward, in an extent and variety of litigation to which otherwise he would never have been exposed. The more so, where this is to be extricated in a shape where the result is not useful or binding quoad other parties, and only to be arrived at by incurring an amount of expense in matters totally foreign to the duties and privileges proper of registration. To hold that the Keeper is in such a situation, would be to make him a most dangerous enemy to the party going to him to have an instrument registered. He would be there to hunt out objections, and expose the diligence to dangers of a remote character. It is difficult to see how far back this would go. The diligence might be regular, not only ex facie, but absolutely, and the difficulty—the fatal blot—might rest on the original constitution of the debt. There might lie the source of failure. Is the Keeper then to try a question of that sort? Questions of prescription might arise which had not been previously pleaded;—is the Keeper to take them up? And so also, in questions of personal bar, compensation, and a hundred other cases, the Keeper might be in a situation and assume a position, which would expose the party to a very great disadvantage indeed. Still, and on the other hand, it is not easy to say that, where a claim is made against him of that nature of a claim for indemnity from his fault, there is to be liability, where, on any ground, it can be shown there is no loss thence arising; and yet no measure of redress, where a writer or messenger has failed in diligence against the party, that the measure of damages has not been regulated by the amount of the loss. It is the amount of the debt which is the measure of the claim, and extraneous inquiries are excluded, because it is uncertain what the pressure of diligence, even through the interposition of friends, might have realised. Therefore, I do not see my way very clearly; and I do not think that the principles connected with this branch of the case, with their limitations, have been so fully and satisfactorily brought out as I could have desired. The matter may practically come to a solution in some such way as this. As regards the present case, perhaps it may be dealt with on the footing (1) that, at all events, there must be an absolute nullity to entitle a party in the situation of the Keeper of the Register to have the benefit of it: (2) that mere defects supplyable by evidence ultra, as against a competitor, will not avail him. There are numerous cases where it is possible to supplement defects by extraneous proof. There have been many defences of "no process," in respect the party was not in a situation in which it was competent to execute the summons or the diligence in a particular way, yet where the defence has been obviated by proving that, although not set forth in the summons, the party was in a position which removed the objection; and (3) that where, through bad registration, this position of vantage has been lost, there is here introduced sufficiently the element of uncertainty to bring the matter within the amount of the debt as the measure of damage. But it is not necessary to go deeper into that matter of relevancy. I think it right, however, to guard myself against acknowledging that there may not be very grave considerations indeed in the question of relevancy before we could have decided in favour of the defender.

In considering the special objections raised to this diligence, I would wish to ask, (1) how stood the case as at the time of presentation of the diligence for registration? Was there then a patent and palpable nullity, or were the alleged nullities all extra to the document, and such as could not be known to the Keeper? Registration must be done instantly. Then how stood the matter here? What was presented to the Keeper were letters of inhibition. Now these, on the face of them, are correct. The question remains, whether there is a warrant for such letters? But, so far as the Keeper could see, here were regular letters of inhibition. (2) The execution, so far, on the face of it, is perfectly correct. I say so far, because everything is done and certified which was necessary to be done in the case of a debtor furth of Scotland. It is said they are not done as against a person furth of Scotland. But they are so done, and in such a way as is applicable to no other case than a debtor furth of Scotland, and they are said to be in terms of the statute,—a statute which deals with no other case than a debtor furth of Scotland; and, therefore, as regards all that is necessary to give information to the parties, everything is sufficiently done, and the objection is reduced to a mere criticism on words. The question is a bare and barren technicality, to say that other words should have been added.

Then it is (1) an edictal execution. There is execution against the lieges at the Market-cross and Pier and Shore of Leith. Copies were also left at the Record Office. Then, as to this last, the question was raised, whether the Judicature Act, sect. 51, did not make a difference, and do away with execution at the Market-cross and Pier and Shore of Leith? I think it did not. The clause has clearly nothing to do with that. It is confined to parties furth of Scotland, which the lieges are not; and, therefore, an argument on that point is out of the question. Whether the Act of Victoria made a difference on that matter or not, I do not inquire. It was of later date to this diligence, and could not have here affected this question.

The difficulty in regard to the execution turns upon the absence of the words "as furth of Scotland;" but I cannot hold these words to be de solemnitate, any more than, in an execution at the dwelling-house of a debtor, I could hold the words "within Scotland" to be de solemnitate. If these words had been there, they would not certiorate any fact. The messenger is not bound to certify a search, to satisfy himself that the debtor is furth of Scotland. A case may be in such uncertainty that the execution might be both ways,—double executions, so as to cover both alternatives; and must the messenger certify both of them? If he executes the first as against the debtor in Scotland, and certifies it, and then executes the second against the debtor as furth of Scotland, and certifies it, he would be liable to the pains of perjury. But he certifies neither the one nor the other. He certifies his procedure, and allows these alternatives to remain till it shall be seen which of them shall apply. Just as in old election cases of making up titles by confirmation or resignation, the Court held that one or other of them must be right; and so here there may be double execution with reference to different species facti. All that the messenger is bound to certify is the procedure in regard to each; and, therefore, that is probatio probata that he has here set forth all that is necessary for him to certify.

It is difficult in such a case, therefore, to say that the insertion of these desiderated words is a necessary solemnity. I have examined all the authorities, and I cannot say that they lead to any satisfactory conclusion. They do not hang very well together, and it is not very easy to reconcile them; but that shews that, at various times, various results have been held to satisfy the law; and, if so, there again, if these words had been held to be matter of solemnity, such variance could not have arisen. It is for deliberation in each particular case whether the execution is good, and the Court has so dealt with it. It is enough in the present case that there is no express and absolute authority against the mode of execution that has been adopted.

But, then, it is said that the execution does not bear that the party either inhibited the debtor or the lieges by doing certain things. But, when it is said that the messenger inhibited the debtor and left a copy of the inhibition at the Record Office, it is impossible to say that that is not in substance and common sense equivalent to saying that he inhibited the debtor by leaving a copy at the Record Office. The execution, accordingly, is in substance the same as if it had contained the words "as furth of Scotland." The form of the execution necessarily implies that.

But it is farther objected that the validity of the execution must depend on the fact that the party was truly out of Scotland; and the question is raised, on whom lies the onus of proving that? Some nicety here arises. But both parties have renounced probation; and, on the whole, I am for repelling this ground of objection also. There is here enough to satisfy the ends of justice as regards all and sundry. I am not for straining technical difficulties perhaps to still more substantial injury than could properly arise otherwise. Practice has, accordingly, of late, been becoming more liberal. My opinion upon the other points is in accordance with that of your Lordship.

Lord CURRIEHILL.—This action is brought on the statute 1693, c. 18, whereby it is enacted that the keepers of the Registers of Inhibition, &c., shall keep minute-books, and registrate, as therein mentioned, the writs presented to them, "and that the said minute be immediately signed by the presenter of the writ, and also by the Keeper, and be patent to all the lieges who shall desire inspection, gratis; and that the writs shall be registrate exactly conform to the order of the said minute-book;" and "the said keepers not observing the premises liable to the damages of the parties prejudged by the not due observing of the present Act."

It is admitted that Mr Mackenzie (whom the defenders represent) was employed to register the inhibition—that he, as keeper of the Register, undertook the employment, and returned to Mr Thomson, the creditor, the letters of inhibition and executions thereof, with a certificate indorsed thereon in these terms:—"At Edinburgh, the 13th day of May 1830.—Presented by John Elliott, writer in Edinburgh, and registered in the General Register of Inhibitions, conform to Act of Parliament. (Signed) WILL. MACKENZIE;" that a mistake in the registration, however, was afterwards discovered to have taken place, inasmuch as the amount of the debt was wrong described; and that, in consequence of this error, effect was not given to the diligence in a competition with posterior securities on the debtor's estate. But the defenders maintain that they are not bound to pay damages to the pursuer, because the inhibition was inept and ineffectual, in respect of three errors which had been committed in expediting and executing the diligence before it was presented for registration, viz., 1. That the bill upon which the letters of inhibition proceeded should have prayed explicitly for warrant to expedite letters of inhibition, whereas its prayer was expressed in these words:—"Herefore, letters of inhibition;" 2. That although the letters contained authority for executing the diligence against the debtor and the lieges, on the footing of his being furth of Scotland, the bill did not pray for warrant for such authority; and, 3, That neither the warrant, nor the inhibition, nor even the letters themselves, set forth that the debtor was furth of Scotland, and yet the letters were executed against him only in the form which is competent when the debtor is in that predicament. And the defenders maintain that these alleged errors in expeding the diligence afford him two relevant defences against this claim of damages, viz., first, that these errors rendered the diligence null, and therefor the Keeper of the Register was not under any duty or obligation to record what was a nullity; and, secondly, that in consequence of these alleged nullities, the diligence would have secured no preference to the creditor, even if there had been no error in the registration, and, therefore, he and his representatives have suffered no damage by that error. And neither of these views can avail the defenders, unless the diligence was invalid in respect of one or more of these objections, the first enquiry is, whether or not this was the case?

1. Although in practice it is necessary for a writer to the signet to have the authority of the Court of Session to warrant his signing letters of inhibition, and although that authority is granted by indorsing the words "fiat ut petitur" on writing called a plack bill, there is no formula established, by statute or otherwise in which that bill must be framed. The report of the Deputy-keeper of the Signet shews not only that there is no invariable form for the prayers of such writings but that out of nearly 200 specimens, which he examined for ascertaining the usage, 29, or fully one-seventh of the whole, are expressed in terms substantially similar to the one in question, and therefore it cannot be held that this objection is supported by established, uniform, and inveterate usage. And as, moreover there is no statute, nor any institutional writer, nor any decision of the Court which makes any more ample prayer than what is in this bill indispensable necessary; and I see no authority for sustaining this alleged nullity.

2. For a similar reason I cannot sustain the objection that the bill does not contain a special prayer for a warrant to cite the debtor as being furth of the kingdom. Assuming it contains authority to issue letters of inhibition generally at Mr Thomson's instance against his debtor Anstruther, why should the Writer to the Signet in preparing the letters, not insert therein the appropriate warrants for citing the debtor wherever he might be? I have heard no answer to this question. The warrant to cite a party furth of Scotland does not require any other authority than a warrant to cite a party personally or at his dwelling house within Scotland,—as appears from the most common class of Signet letters, viz., ordinary summonses in which warrants to cite the defenders, whether within, or furth of Scotland are, according to daily practice, inserted without any authority from the Court. The objection, therefore, is not supported on principle. Nor is it supported on practice, for, although in bills for letters of inhibition against parties furth of the kingdom a prayer for warrant to cite them edictally is commonly prayed for, yet this practice is far from being uniform. According to the report of the Deputy-keeper of the Signet, in 85 out of nearly 200 specimens, being more than 42 per cent. of the whole, the bills contained no such prayer; and such a diversified practice cannot establish an invariable rule. And, although it appears from the same report that, in a considerable proportion of these eighty-five specimens, the parties were designed in the letters as being abroad, this only shews that such a prayer was dispensed with in these cases,—not from ignorance of the fact, but intentionally. Hence this alleged nullity is not supported by uniform and inveterate usage. Nor is it supported by any statute, or institutional writer, or decision of the Court. On the contrary, in the only reported case in which the objection appeared to have been raised (viz., the case of Lord Braeo, 22d July 1747, Mor. p. 3690) the objection was repelled.

3. The objection stated against the written execution of the letters is, that although the form of execution which was used in inhibiting both the debtor and the lieges is that applicable to the case of a debtor who is furth of Scotland, it is not expressly set forth in the written execution, or even in the letters, that such was truly the predicament of the debtor. This appears to me to be the most important of the objections, and it requires deliberate consideration.

What the decision of this question appears to me to depend upon is,—whether the law prescribes as a solemnity that, in such a case, the execution should expressly set forth that the debtor is furth of Scotland? because a failure to comply with a solemnity in such a matter is fatal to the diligence. This is an elementary principle of much practical importance. But, on the other hand, it is a principle of no less importance that such solemnities are not to be introduced by courts of law arbitrarily, or without the authority of statute, or immemorial and uniform usage. But no statute has created such a solemnity. It has never been recognised as such by the Court, or by institutional writers. In practice, however, it has been very usual in such cases to set forth in the written execution that the party is cited as being furth of Scotland; and the question comes to be, whether, without any other authority, what has been so practised must now be found to be an indispensable solemnity? Now, what is the meaning of the statement which is said to be of this important character? Not that, de facto, the debtor is furth of Scotland. Generally, the executing officer is quite ignorant as to that matter; and it would be out of the question to require him to make a statement to that effect as a matter of solemnity, more especially as a false statement by him in making up his execution is punishable with the pains of forgery. And, indeed, an edictal execution against the debtor as furth of Scotland may be quite lawful and correct, although, at the time of the execution, he were actually within Scotland,—if, for instance, his domicile and usual residence were in Carlisle or elsewhere in England, and yet he happened accidentally, at the very hour when the edictal execution took place, to be at Annan or somewhere else on this side of the Border attending a market, or on a temporary visit. Or, on the other hand, he might be actually out of Scotland at the time when he is validly cited at his dwelling-house as being in Scotland,—if, for example, he were a domiciled Scotsman, having his only permanent residence in this country, but happened accidentally to be on the English side of the Border attending a market or on a temporary visit, on the day or hour when he was cited at his dwelling-house. The meaning, therefore, of the statement which is usually inserted in edictal citations,—that the party is cited as being furth of Scotland,—is not that, de facto, he is out of the kingdom at that moment, but that the mode of citation is that which is appropriate to the case of a party who is legally in that position. And, when the res gesta set forth in the written execution is that which is truly appropriate to such an execution, a farther statement that the execution is one of that kind is mere surplusage. Whether or not the res gesta embodied in the execution is the established form of citing, when the party is furth of the kingdom, must be judged of on its own merits. If it be not so, the defect will not be cured by the officer's statement affirming that that form of citation was followed by him. And, if it be so, such a statement by him is a useless form. And I do not think that, without any authority from statute, institutional writer, or decision, the Court is warranted to hold such unnecessary words to be an indispensable solemnity, the omission of which must nullify the diligence.

No. 54.

Davidson v.
Mackenzie.

It is said that the will of the letters authorises the edictal mode of citation only conditionally,—viz., if the debtor be furth of Scotland,—and that it is necessary that it appear ex facie of the execution that the condition existed. If so, it would also be necessary that, if the debtor were cited personally or at his dwelling-house, in virtue of letters containing such an alternative warrant as that in these letters of inhibition, it should be stated ex facie of the execution that he was in Scotland; because in such a case the letters expressly authorise the personal or domiciliary mode of citation only conditionally, viz., if the debtor be within Scotland. But this, certainly, is not the case; and it is never done in practice. It is, therefore, not a matter of principle that, as a solemnity, the execution should set forth not only the mode in which the debtor is cited, but likewise, as matter of fact, that he was, at the time of citation, in the predicament to which alone that mode of citation is appropriate.

There is another test of this not being held in law to be a legal solemnity. Were this its character, the written execution, if it contained an explicit statement that the party was furth of the kingdom, would be probative of the matter of fact; and the contrary could only be established, not ope exceptionis, but only in a process of reduction-improbation. This is a trite rule in practice, and it arises from the faith, which the law of Scotland gives to such official instruments, when they are framed and authenticated according to law, and which is strengthened by the sanction that any falsification in the statement of the necessary solemnities infers the crime of forgery. But such a statement in an execution of citation, that the party cited is out of the kingdom, could not be dealt with as forgery, as that would seldom be a matter within the officer's own knowledge; and it might be disproved, like any other ordinary matter of disputed fact, without the form of a reduction-improbation.—See the case of Robertson M'Culloch, 10th June 1836.

No. 54.

Davidson v.
Mackenzie.

In the present case, it is not proved (and both parties have declined to adduce further evidence), that Anstruther, the debtor, was within Scotland, or was in the legal position of not being furth of Scotland, when the inhibition was executed edictally. And when there is a formal execution against a party in one of the modes established by law, there is, as I think, a presumption in favour of the validity and regularity of that execution, and that the party was truly in the predicament to which that mode of execution is appropriate, although this be not expressed. For example, when the officer neither finds the party personally, nor is able to obtain access to his dwelling-house, the appropriate mode of citing him is by the officer making six audible knocks at the door of the dwelling-house, and affixing a copy of the citation thereto. And when he performs these acts, and sets them forth correctly in his written execution, such execution is valid and effectual, although it does not farther state, as matter of fact, that the officer found it impracticable to get access to the dwelling-house. For although such is the only predicament in which a mode of execution in that form is competent, yet when that mode of execution is correctly set forth in the written execution, the law presumes matters to have been in the predicament to which that mode of execution is appropriate. See the cases of Sinclair, 30th July 1696, Mor. p. 3774; Srimgeour, 20th December 1705, Ib. p. 3758; and Gorie, 16th November 1756, Ib. p. 3699. On the same principle it is to be presumed in the present case that matters were in that predicament to which the regular edictal citation before us is appropriate, and we have no evidence to obviate that presumption.

I am therefore of opinion that none of the objections stated by the defenders to the inhibition in question is well founded. And this being the case, I do not find it necessary to determine whether or not these objections, or any of them, if well founded, would be relevant to support both or either of the views which the defenders have founded upon them; and, without stating any opinion on that matter, I shall only indicate generally some points I would require to have cleared up before sustaining this objection, as affording any relevant defence against this action.

In the first place, in reference to the question whether Mr Mackenzie would have escaped from his statutory liability from failing duly to register the inhibition, if the diligence had been null in respect of these objections,—is it clear that, esto this were the case, he would not have incurred such liability? If he had declined at the time to undertake that duty, in respect of these objections, or any of them, it might perhaps have held, on this supposition, that he was entitled to do so. But does it necessarily follow that he would be in the same favourable case, since he actually did undertake that duty, and returned the diligence, with his formal official certificate that he had performed it by duly registering it in terms of the Act of Parliament, and since Mr Thomson relied upon that registration for many years, and until after the debtor's estate was burdened with securities by which its value was exhausted? Moreover, the first two objections to the bill being latent, and not discoverable without a search for them at the Signet Office, is it clear that, as keeper of a register of inhibitions, Mr Mackenzie would have been entitled, when the inhibition was presented to him, to refuse to enter the diligence on the record, until he should institute an inquiry into all the prior steps of the progress of expediting the diligence, in order to ascertain whether or not they had been quite regular? This is the more doubtful, as the statute requires the first part of the registration, viz., the entry in the Minute-Book, to be made immediately on the inhibition being presented; and the entries in the Register-Book itself to be made in the same order as those in that Minute-book.

The other ground on which the relevancy of these objections is maintained is, that even assuming Mr Mackenzie's liability for any damage his failure in his official duty might have created, yet it could create no damage, in respect the inhibition, even if duly registered, would have been ineffectual to secure any preference on account of these objections. But the fact confessedly is, that the objection to the registration was the ground upon which, in the judgments of this Court and of the House of Lords, the inhibition was held to be null; and that the other three objections, although also stated on the record, were not persisted in, and were not to any extent or effect the ground of these judgments. And is it now practicable to ascertain that the creditors would have persisted in trying these questions, if their objection to the registration had failed? How can it be made clear that they would have undertaken the risk, trouble, and delay of trying the new questions of law, and even questions of fact, which some of them might involve? Or how can it be ascertained that the writer to the signet, or the messenger-at-arms, who are said to have committed these alleged errors, would not have paid the loss rather than have tried such questions with the creditors, on obtaining an assignation to the debt and diligence, if the diligence had been duly recorded so as to have enabled them to endeavour to effect their relief in the competition? In this state of matters, are the defenders, in order to endeavour to escape from their statutory obligation to pay the damage directly created by their author's failure in performing his official duty, to insist on the pursuer trying such questions with them? According to the opinions of President Blair, concurred in by the Court in the case of Chatto, 17th January 1811, F. C., and followed in the case of M'Millan, 2d March 1820, F. C., it was held that defences of this character were irrelevant in answer to a demand of damages, for a clear breach of duty by a public officer or law agent, in respect of the impracticability of ascertaining that if such duty had been performed, any other objections to the diligence would have been successful, or would ever have been urged or persisted in. The case might be less difficult where the objection is, that the alleged debt for which the diligence is raised was not owing, because, as the debt is held to be the measure of the creditor's loss and damage, there can be no loss and damage where there is no debt; and also because in that case the creditor cannot perform the obligation which the law imposes on him of assigning the debt to the public officer or agent, from whom he thus exacts payment. It appears to have been upon this ground (in the case of Sinclair v. M'Lellan, 12th Feb. 1829), an officer who had conducted a poinding, and had paid the alleged debt, was held to be entitled to repetition, on his afterwards discovering that, in consequence of vitiation in a bill which was the ground of debt, and certain irregularities, no debt was owing by the endorsers, and the implied warrandice in the assignation debitum subesse was negatived.

Mackenzie.

But although I have thus indicated these doubts as to the relevancy of these defences, my opinion, as already stated, proceeds not upon these doubts, but upon the failure of the defenders to shew that the diligence is inept, in respect of all or any of the grounds stated by them.

LORD DEAS.—This case naturally divides itself into two branches. The first relates to the question whether the defences are relevant, which simply means, in this case, whether the objections now taken to the diligence, as it stood when presented at the Record Office, be pleadable by this defender? The second relates to the question whether these objections, if so pleadable, are sufficient to void the inhibition? Your Lordships, being of opinion that the objections are not in their own nature sufficient to void the inhibition, may not be called upon to decide the relevancy. But, in the view I took of the case in the Outer-house, and still take of it, it is indispensable to begin with the relevancy.

I did not go into that point at any length in the note to my interlocutor, and, I confess, I did not regard it as an open question. The doubts suggested by your Lordships render me, of course, less confident of being right in so dealing with the question, and these doubts tend at the sametime to throw the law into a least satisfactory of all states,—a state of uncertainty.

The main difficulty raised upon the relevancy of the defences is this. It must, it is said, be uncertain whether any given objections to the diligence could have been pleaded and persisted in to judgment by the debtor, or his competing creditors, and it must farther be uncertain, whether, if pleaded and persisted in, the Court would have decided them in the same way in which your Lordships might do now. It is thus, it is said, uncertain whether the whole debt might not have been recovered, had there been no error on the defender's part, and, in respect of this uncertainty, it is contended that the defender must be liable in damages, to be measured solely by the amount of the debt.

No. 54.

Dec. 20, 1856.
Davidson v.
Mackenzie.

This difficulty, if it be one, would be equally applicable to the case of magistrates of burghs, law-agents, messengers-at-arms, and other persons, defending themselves against claims of damages for errors and omissions in the discharge of their duty. Suppose a mercantile agent should unduly fail to insure a vessel, and the vessel is lost—there, as here, it might be asked, why allow him to plead objections to the claim for loss which, had he done his duty, might never have been pleaded or persisted in by the insurers; or, if so pleaded and persisted in, might have gone before different Judges or a different jury, who might have arrived at a different result? All this being involved in inextricable uncertainty, the amount which ought to have been insured must, it might be said, be the measure of the loss. Yet I do not know that it has been doubted, either here or in England, that the agent, in such a case, may plead all defences,—such as illegality of the adventure, deviation from the voyage, &c., which would have been pleadable by the insurers had the insurance been effected, and may thus involve his employer in questions and law-suits, to which it would be no bar to say that the insurers might have followed a different course or met with a different result. Yet there we should have had all the supposed hardship and uncertainty which are urged in the present case.

This leads me to observe that there are two classes of cases in the books which have always been distinguished, and are in themselves quite distinguishable. The one is the class of cases in which, on the part of messengers-at-arms, magistrates of burghs, or law-agents (for the same principle applies to them all), there has been some failure in duty, the consequences of which, upon the recovery of the debt, do not admit of precise ascertainment, but where no objections exist either to the constitution of the debt or to the regularity and validity of the diligence. For example, the law-agent fails to instruct the messenger to execute a caption,—the messenger fails to apprehend the debtor,—or the magistrate fails to receive him into prison, or unduly liberates him, or allows him to escape when there. In such cases it is impossible to tell what might have been the effect of apprehending or detaining the debtor. He might be utterly insolvent, and, yet, he might have had the money in his pocket, or at his command, and might have paid the debt, although to the prejudice of his other creditors, rather than go to or remain in prison. Or some friend might have paid it for him, to prevent his apprehension, or to obtain his liberation; and if there exist no good objections to the debt or diligence, the debtor could have had, in such cases, no defence against payment, and so neither can any one who comes into his place.

But there is another class of cases, different from the above, and which have gone on and been decided along side of them, for above two centuries, without it having been supposed that there was any inconsistency between the two sets of decisions. I refer, now, to that class of cases in which, although there has been an error or failure in duty on the part of the law-agent, the messenger-at arms, or the magistrate, there do, at the sametime, exist prior objections to the debt or to the validity or regularity of the diligence, which the debtor himself, or his creditors in a competition, might have pleaded, and which, if so pleaded, would have been sufficient to invalidate the diligence. In such cases it has always been held, that the party at fault can shew the diligence to be inept, he is not liable for the debt because, in that view, it must be held there has been no damage.

No distinction has ever been taken, nor do I see how any well could be taken between fatal irregularities patent upon the face of the writ, and fatal irregularities occurring in the grounds and warrants of the writ. Nor between objections in point of fact, which admit of ascertainment, and objections in point of law, which require the decision of the Court.

For example, if it could be shewn that, at the time the messenger ought to have used arrestments, or had used them in an erroneous form, the common debtor would be dead, so that the arrestments, however formal and regular, would have been ineffectual, the messenger is not liable. In like manner, if it could be shewn here, that, at the date of executing the inhibition, Major Anstruther was dead, there could be no liability for irregularities or omissions on the part either of the messenger or the Keeper of the Record. Yet the fact of the death would, of course, not be discoverable on the face of the diligence, nor otherwise than by enquiry.

Then, as to objections in point of law, it is true we cannot be sure that the debtor would have pleaded and persisted in these objections, or that one Judge would have decided them in the same way as another Judge. But the presumption is that the Judge decides rightly, and, if rightly, then that the decision of another Judge would be the same. It matters not whether the objections to the diligence be plain and palpable, or whether they be nice, difficult, and critical. Your Lordships are presumed to know the law in all cases, intricate as well as easy, and to be able to decide it rightly, with less or more aid from the bar, as the case may require.

No. 54.

Davidson v.
Mackenzie.

Nor is the plea of uncertainty as to what the debtor might have done, any better than the plea of uncertainty as to what other Judges might have done. A debtor may become bankrupt or die, and his trustee, or his heir, may take objections to the debt, or to the diligence against his estate, which the debtor himself might never have taken. Even the same individual may be less or more litigious at different times. But this is not the kind of uncertainty, any more than uncertainty of decision, to which the law looks, and which is referred to in the cases quoted, and which I shall immediately notice. Even if the distinction between the two kinds of uncertainty were more shadowy than it is, it is a distinction which has been adjudicated upon, after full argument,—has been long settled in our law,—and cannot, I conceive, be now disregarded.

Nor is there anything startling in the proposition that, if a man is called upon to pay a debt, he shall be entitled to take the position of the debtor in respect of his rights as well as of his liabilities:—to plead whatever the debtor might have pleaded, while liable to pay whatever the debtor was compellable under that diligence, to have paid. It is unnecessary, in the present case, to carry the principle farther than this. For it is not easy to figure any objection to an inhibition, pleadable by the debtor's creditors in a competition, which would not be equally pleadable by the debtor himself. At all events, there can be no doubt that all the objections stated here might have been competently and, if well founded, availably pleaded by the debtor, either in a petition for recall of the inhibition or in a reduction and declarator to have it found ineffectual to restrain him in the administration and disposal of his estate. An inhibition, your Lordships know, is a diligence which may be obtained behind the debtor's back; and, if he could not object to it after it is obtained and used, he could not object at all. It ties him up at once, and without warning, from all power of dealing with or disposing of his heritable estate; and, consequently, if he can shew that it is, in any material respect, informal or irregular, he is entitled to have it forthwith recalled. Accordingly, many of the cases, in which technical and critical objections to inhibitions have been sustained, have been cases of petitions presented by the debtors for their recall. For instance, Eliot v. Johnston, 26th June 1829, Fac. Coll., in which the objections to the inhibition were of a very critical kind, the Court, with the single exception of Lord Craigie, concurred in laying it down that the debtor, having an interest in the free administration of his estate, had a corresponding right to insist that the diligence by which he was restrained should be in all respects strict and formal, and that there was no room for distinguishing between objections stated by the debtor himself and those occurring in a competition between his creditors. So in the late case of Smith v. Flowerdew, 5th March 1850 (12 D. 818), even an adjudication was set aside upon the most critical objections stated by the debtor, although the summons had been duly served on her in the outset, and she had allowed decree to go out and possession to follow for many years without objection or complaint. Again, in McRosty v. Halley, 2d March 1850 (12 D. 816), summary diligence upon a bill of exchange payable on demand was held to be inept, upon an objection by the debtor that the date of the bill was written on an erasure. In short, there is no objection, however critical, to diligence against the person or estate, which may not be pleaded by the debtor himself; and if by the debtor himself, then why not by a party who, by being sued for the debt, comes to stand in the debtor's place?

It may ~~not~~ be that such party may raise questions which might not otherwise have been raised. That did not happen here. For all the objections now ~~made to the inhibition~~ were stated in the process of ranking and sale; and, although the Court ~~admitted one objection~~—namely, the error in the record—to be palpably sufficient, ~~and that~~ ~~into the others~~, we may fairly hold that these would have been gone ~~into~~ and decided if necessary. But, apart from this, look at the opposite view ~~of the case~~, which would exclude the relevancy of all prior defects in the

No. 54. diligence. Is the creditor to get payment of his debt from the messenger, or magistrate, or law-agent, or Keeper of the Record, although the diligence was, even on the face of it, palpably blundered and inept from the outset? Suppose that here, or in the case of Cooke v. Falconer, it had been found necessary, after the letters had been erroneously recorded, to execute the inhibition of new against the debtor, or at some additional market-cross, and the messenger had then returned an execution which, after being separately recorded, was found to be blundered and inept, would he still be bound to pay the debt without being entitled to plead the previous nullity in the record? And, if entitled to plead that objection, would he not be equally entitled to plead whatever other objections to the diligence the debtor could have pleaded, and which existed when it was put into his hands for execution?

Davidson v.
Mackenzie.

Accordingly, all the cases cited for the pursuers will be found to be cases of the class to which I have first alluded, in which there were no objections to the debt or to the regularity and validity of the diligence. These cases were five in all,—two of which have been noticed by Lord Curriehill. Taking them in the order of their dates, the first is Ross v. Hay (5 Brown's Supp. 577), in which the messenger did not execute the diligence against the debtor, although instructed to do so. The second is Murray v. Durne (Hume's Dec. 323), in which a law-agent was instructed to raise a horning, and to use arrestment and other diligence, and represented that he had done so, while, in fact, he had done nothing of the kind. The third is King v. Stevenson (Ib. 344), in which a messenger was instructed to apprehend the debtor on a particular morning, before a sist could arrive on a second bill of suspension which, it was feared, would be presented, and where the messenger reported that he had done so, but, in fact, had not done it, the consequence of which was that the sist arrived and the diligence was defeated. The fourth is Chatto and Company v. Marshall, 17th January 1811, F. C., in which the messenger four different times got orders to execute a poinding, but failed to do so. The fifth and last is Macmillan v. Gray, 2d March 1820, F. C., in which, after decree in foro had been obtained and arrestments used, the law-agent lost the process inclusive of the decree and whole proceedings. In each and all of these cases it was impossible to say that the due execution of the diligence might not have produced payment of the debt; and, there being no objections alleged against the validity and regularity of the grounds of debt and diligence, the measure of the damage was, naturally and properly, held to be the amount of the debt.

It is true that in the last of these cases there was a vague allegation that the debt was not justly due. But the decree in foro, which constituted the debt, not being denied to be regular, formed a conclusive answer to that objection, and left the case the same as if nothing had been said against the debt at all.

The opinion of President Blair in Chatto and Company v. Marshall was, of course, given with reference to the case before him. The messenger had committed a breach of duty, which, as his Lordship observed, there was reason to believe, “did not arise from mere negligence or inattention, but was wilful and corrupt, for the purpose of protecting the debtor.” No sequestration was awarded till more than sixty days after the poinding ought to have been executed, so that the poinding might have produced full payment; and it was far from clear (as his Lordship added), that “if the messenger had reported his reason for not executing the diligence, the party might not have operated payment by means of caption or other diligence.” If there was any doubt in such a case as to whether the debt might or might not have been recovered, it was of course right to give the doubt against the corrupt messenger. The debt and diligence were unobjectionable; and I am not aware that the opinion of President Blair, as applicable to the case in which it was given, or to the class of cases to which it belongs, has ever been questioned. Certainly I do not question it here.

So it was in Macmillan v. Gray, where Lord Alloway and the Court adopted the same doctrine. The decree being in foro, excluded (as already observed) the competency of maintaining that there was no debt. No objection was stated to the regularity of the decree and diligence; and the debt, as Lord Alloway observed being only L.40, it was impossible to say that, if the decree and diligence had not been lost, the debt would not have been recovered.

These are the whole authorities relied on by the pursuers upon this branch the case, but to which I conceive they are inapplicable, and in no degree inconsistent with that other class of cases where the diligence, in carrying out which an error or failure in duty had occurred, was shewn to have been inept in respect of some previous blunder or irregularity.

Davidson v.
Mackenzie.

For example, in the case of Adam v. The Bailies of Ayr (M. 3748), in which the magistrates had allowed the debtor to escape, the defence against liability for the debt was, that "the horning whereupon caption was executed was null, because the charge given to the party, whereupon he was denounced, was not lawful, seeing the same bore to be executed at his dwelling-place, and made no special mention nor designation of his dwelling where he was charged, which allegiance was found relevant, and so that the horning was null, and therefore the bailies were assoilzied simpliciter from the pursuit." Again, in Potter v. Baillie, M. 7788, one of the bailies of Inverness having failed to take a debtor into custody, when required to do so upon a caption, and having been sued for the debt, his defence was that the denunciation upon the horning, which necessarily preceded the caption, was null, as being at the wrong market-cross. The answer was, that the horning and denunciation could only be challenged by reduction, "and, albeit the horning were null, yet that cannot excuse the defender, who was obliged to obey the charge of the King's letters." "But the Lords found the allegiance, upon the nullity of the horning, relevant, and therefore assoilzied the defender." So in Wyllie v. the Bailies of Wigtown, M. 7793, where the magistrates had set the debtor at liberty, but apprehended him again, three years afterwards, when he died in their hands, "the Lords permitted the bailies to say all which the party might say against the debt if he were living, and to insist in the suspension." But as the bailies seem to have had nothing to say against the debt, and alleged no flaw in the diligence, they were held liable in payment. Then we have the case of Sinclair v. Wilson and McLellan, 12th Feb. 1829, S. & D., which appears to me to be the strongest of all possible cases. There a messenger had failed to execute diligence on a bill of exchange. His cautioner (who of course stood precisely in his place) was compelled to pay the debt, under a decree in absence obtained against him and the messenger, the cautioner receiving an assignation with warrandice from fact and deed. It was afterwards discovered that the bill was vitiated in its date, and that there was an error in the instrument of protest, and the cautioner was consequently held entitled to get back what he had paid. This case obviously proceeded on the footing that the messenger and his cautioner were entitled to plead all objections to the bill and diligence which could have been pleaded by the debtor. Accordingly, Lord Newton, Ordinary, says in his note, "He conceives that the messenger could not have been subjected in damages for neglect had it appeared that the document of debt was vitiated, or the diligence inept;" and the Court necessarily adopted the same doctrine, otherwise the judgment arrived at could not have been pronounced. The difficulty arose from payment having actually been made, under a decree, although in absence, and an assignation which bore warrandice from fact and deed only, in place of absolute warrandice. But even this difficulty did not prevent the Court from giving effect to the principle I am now stating. The case, with deference, cannot be solved as one of your Lordships has proposed to solve it, by holding that the objection was to the debt. The justice of the debt was not questioned. The objection was to the diligence as proceeding upon a vitiated bill and an irregular instrument of protest, which did not form a valid warrant for such diligence, although these might (as was observed in M'Rostie's case), have perfectly well warranted an ordinary action.

If I mistake the law on this matter, I mistake it in common with Mr Bell, who distinctly lays it down (1 Com. 460-1) that the responsibility in such cases is only for the loss; and "so if a writer has committed an error which annuls the diligence, but it turns out that this diligence would, on another ground, have been ineffectual, he will be freed from responsibility." Mr Bell does not, I apprehend, rest his doctrine upon the case of M'Lean v. Grant. He lays down the general doctrine, without claiming it necessary to quote the authorities from which he collects it; and he refers, in a note, to the case of M'Lean v. Grant as a case in which this doctrine was applied as to lead to a singular result, which he there explains. But, at the same time, it cannot be doubted that the case of M'Lean proceeds upon a full recognition of the general doctrine, and nobody could know this better than

Mr Bell, who was counsel in the cause. As a recognition of the general doctrine, its authority is not destroyed by any doubt which may be entertained of the soundness of the way in which the doctrine was there applied.

In Cooke v. Falconer, I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the point now under consideration did not require to be decided. But Lord Wood, obviously, assumes the principle in the latter part of his note, in dealing with the objection of want of mandate, and Lord Cuninghame expressly goes upon it in the third head of his opinion, where he holds the previous blunder in the registration to be a conclusive answer to any claim against Mr Falconer for not subsequently publishing the inhibition at Aberdeen, and adds :—"The case is similar to one which has repeatedly occurred, when, in proceedings on other diligences, such as caption, it was discovered that the horning was ill recorded, or erased, or denounced before the lapse of the induciae;" and in which cases (he observes), no damages could be claimed from the agent or messenger accidentally failing to incarcerate the debtor.

If, indeed, it could be shewn that there is a distinction between all these cases and the case of the defender, in respect he is a public officer, charged with a statutory duty, there might be something in the pursuer's plea on this branch of the case. But it is difficult to see any sound distinction. A messenger-at-arms is a public officer, imperatively charged with a public duty, which he must perform on payment of the usual fees. The liability of the defender, like that of magistrates, law-agents, and messengers, is simply a liability for damages. The Act declares the Keeper of the Record "liable to the damages of the parties prejudged by the not due observing of the present Act." It must therefore, I conceive, be open to him to shew that there has been no damage, in the same way, and on the same grounds, as it is open to these other parties to do so.

Holding then, as I must still do, after duly attending to the observations of your Lordships, that the objections taken to the inhibition are pleadable and relevant in the mouth of this defender, the next question comes to be, whether they are sufficient to invalidate the diligence?

And here I cannot help fearing that the doubts which your Lordships entertain on the relevancy may have led you to take a less strict view than you otherwise would have done, of the formalities necessary in this diligence. For when I hear it stated by my brother Lord Ivory, that the strictness of the law on this subject has been relaxed, I confess I hear a doctrine for which I know no sanction in the practice or decisions of this Court. All the recent cases seem to me to establish the reverse. The objections sustained were extremely critical in the cases already noticed of Sinclair v. Wilson and M'Lellan, 12th February 1829, and Elliott v. Johnston, 26th June 1829. In Forbes v. Gallie, 4th March 1847, the fact that the word "dependence," introduced narratièe into the letters of arrestment, was written on an erasure, was held sufficient to nullify the diligence, although the word stood quite right in the deliverance on the plack bill which was so narrated. The Court held it irrelevant even to say that the word stood as it now did when the writ passed the Signet,—Lord Fullerton observing that, in other writings, it might do to shew that the alteration had been made before signature, "but it is entirely different when we have to deal with diligence," which the party against whom it is to operate may disregard if not complete in all its essentials. In Burleigh and Others v. Horwood, 20th July 1848, the objection was sustained that the words, "Edictal citations at Edinburgh," occurring in the will of the letter of inhibition, were written on an erasure, although the will directed the copy to be left at the Record Office, "in terms of the statute made thereanent," and the officer's execution correctly bore that the copy had been left at the office of the Keeper of the Records of Edictal Citations, in terms of the statute and Acts of Sederunt, and the copy itself contained the words in question fairly written without erasure. This was the unanimous decision of the whole Court, and it seems to me impossible to read the opinion of the consulted Judges, in which the other concurred, and to hold that they recognised the slightest relaxation in the strict rules which have been applied to diligence, against person and property, from the earliest times downwards. The concluding paragraphs of the opinion shew, I think, the reverse, particularly as to inhibitions. Then in Wilkie or Smith v. Flowerdew, 5th March 1850, the objections to the adjudication were, as already observed, of a very critical kind, and were given effect to in circumstances far from favourable to the debtor by whom they were pleaded,—Lord Cuninghame observing, “All the later cases shew the stricter practice of your Lordships.” Then look at the case of M’Rostie, 2d March 1850, than which I know no instance of the Court dealing more strictly, or perhaps so strictly, with the matter of diligence at any period of our law. As counsel in that case, by referring to Whitehead v. Henderson, 19th February 1836, and to some earlier cases, I at first prevailed with the Court to allow a proof, before answer, that the erasure in the date of the bill of exchange, on which the diligence proceeded, had been made at the time of acceptance, with the knowledge of the acceptor (vide 12 D. 124.) But, after a proof had been led, the Lord Ordinary reported the case with a strong indication of opinion that, although the proof might be sufficient to establish the fact relied on, and thereby to support an ordinary action on the bill, it ought not to be held admissible in a question of summary diligence; and so the Court found, overruling the previous decisions to the contrary. This appears to me to have been an application of the strictest of all possible rules to the matter of diligence; for, as the bill was payable on demand, and interest could only run from the date of demand, which was fixed by the instrument of protest, nothing whatever turned upon the date of the bill, the erasure in which was held, nevertheless, to nullify the diligence, whatever might be the fact as to the erasure having been made with the knowledge of the acceptor at the time of acceptance.

Davidson v.
Mackenzie.

Nor do I know any reason why these rules ought to be relaxed. As Lord Jeffrey observed in Forbes v. Gallie,—“Writs of diligence are edge-tools, which ought to be handled with a delicate scrupulosity; and, if the property or person of another is to be attached under them, they ought to be of a nature beyond the reach of question.” This is specially true of the diligence of inhibition, which, as Lord Ross observes, (1 Lec. 459,) “from the period of its introduction had and continues to have the strongest, the most sudden and determinate effect of any writ known in our law;” and which, he afterwards says, (p. 468,) is “the most cruel and impolitic diligence that was ever introduced into the law of any country.” By this diligence a party may, without warning or opportunity of resistance, be, and is, deprived of all power of disposal of his heritable estate, whether acquired before or after the date of the inhibition. The mere production of an executed inhibition (as happened in the present case) is enough to enable the party to obtain execution against his alleged debtor, who, being thus laid under restraint, without notice, and for an alleged debt which may, after all, turn out not to be due, is entitled to insist that the diligence and its warrants and executions shall be, in every respect, strictly regular and formal, otherwise that the diligence shall not bind him. As Lord Balgray observed, in Elliot v. Johnston,—“There was no diligence of which the law of Scotland was so jealous, or where objections of a critical nature had been sustained, as the diligence of inhibition, which, until lately, was only granted causa cognita. It was necessary that the bill which prayed the letters of inhibition should be correct in itself; and the fiat ut petitur was a warrant for the diligence which proceeded on this.”

Now, applying these rules to the diligence in the present case, it did not appear to me, for the reasons stated in the note to my interlocutor, that the diligence should be held to have been valid, supposing there had been no error committed in recording it. I need not here repeat these reasons. It is not necessary that objections should amount to a want of what we call solemnities in the procedure. Defect in the appropriate and usual formalities is enough. This is apparent from nearly all the decisions in regard to such diligence. Now, the only objection to the procedure here is that which relates to the defective date of the plack bill (which all the authorities agree in holding to be just a citation to the Court), and, consequently, in the warrant which bears to have been granted in terms of that bill. As Lord Glenlee observed, in Kyd’s case (11th March 1826),—“The bill comes in place of a summons, and the fiat ut petitur is in fact the decree.” There is no statute authorising citation of persons out of the kingdom. It is authorised solely by custom; and the position meant to be laid down under the first head of my note is simply this,—that, in order to take benefit from the custom, the custom must be followed in all its material parts; much in the same way as the statute must have been followed had such citation been authorised by statute :—that the custom requires that it shall appear, from the terms of the plack bill or its prayer, that warrant is sought to cite the party as forth of the kingdom, otherwise the deliverance embodied in the words "fiat ut petitur" will not imply such a warrant,—that this material part of the custom was not observed here; and, consequently, that no warrant ever existed for citing the debtor as forth of the kingdom.

To this objection I have heard no answer. The case of Lord Braco, which was the solitary case referred to, and of which we have no satisfactory report, has been shewn from the session papers to have been decided on specialties. Besides, it related to an adjudication, which proceeds upon a regular summons under the Signet; and it depends upon whether we look upon an adjudication as a summons or a diligence (both of which characters have been ascribed to it), whether a special warrant to cite as forth the kingdom would be necessary,—custom not having required this in regular summonses as it has always done in diligences, such as inhibition. There is not a single formulist, from the earliest times downwards, who does not lay it down that, wherever the diligence is meant to be directed against a party forth of the kingdom, the plack bill ought to be framed, in special terms, so as to obtain a warrant to that effect; and I am at a loss to discover why a departure from the prescribed forms, in this respect, should now be sanctioned for the first time. It is not pretended that there is any usage to sanction it. The report of the Deputy-Keeper of the Signet shews the reverse. The onus lies, I think, on the pursuers to show that they have complied with the custom, on which alone they can found as sanctioning edictal citation at all. But, in place of this, it is established, both by the reports obtained upon the custom, and by the forms (or precedents) in the style books, which are part of our custom, that the custom has not, in this case, been complied with.

As Mr Ross observes (1 Lec. 202), "it is only the voice of their Sovereign that people who are absent are obliged to hear; and, therefore, whoever means to act or do anything at the market-cross, pier and shore, must have a special authority for that purpose." He then states, that the form is "to present a bill or petition to the Supreme Court," stating that the debtor is out of the kingdom, and praying for authority to cite or intimate at the market-cross of Edinburgh, pier and shore of Leith (now changed, by statute, to the Office for Edictal Citations). He adds, "Writers have not authority to insert warrants out of the kingdom, as they are termed. Bills must, or at least ought to be presented, requesting that liberty from the Court." The same rule applies both to civil and to criminal process; and, accordingly, Mr Hume says (v. 2, p. 259), "Last of all, from the oldest times, our custom has been familiar with an expedient, which the law of some countries does not apply even to civil process, for citation of persons who are forth of the realm of Scotland. Special authority for this purpose must be asked in the bill for the criminal letters."

It is true that the plack bill does not require any actual signature. But it must bear to be the bill of some writer to the signet named. And, so here, it bears to be "Alexander Monypenny's bill." I should not like to be in the shoes of any one who would put the name of Alexander Monypenny there without his authority. So much is it the bill of the writer to the signet, that it ought always to begin (as I have been taught) with the words, "My Lords," in the singular (being the writer's address to the Court), at the instance of whatever number of parties he may crave the letters to be granted. At all events, nobody but a writer to the signet can present such a bill. It is a privilege, involving a duty, like that of presenting signature for a crown charter in Exchequer; and the writer to the signet becomes responsible that the letters to be expedite, under the signet, shall correspond precisely with the bill. Accordingly, Mr Beveridge says (p. 164), "A bill may be defined a petition praying for letters under the King's signet, conceived in the same terms. In other words, it is the draft of the letters;" and he adds (p. 170), that accuracy is essential, "because the bill is the measure of the letters."

I do not resume the other heads of my note, having nothing to add to them. The first head has always appeared to me to be the most important (though it may be strengthened when taken in connection with the second), and it is precisely the head which it seems to me your Lordships have rather overlooked. I regret the looseness of procedure which this decision may appear to sanction, and think would have been more wholesome to have adhered to the strictness usual in dealing with matters of diligence.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor: — “ Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary submitted to review: Repel the defences in the original action, in so far as founded on the alleged irregularities of the inhibition and execution thereof: Find that the original defender, and now his representatives, are liable to the pursuer in such damages, if any, as shall be proved to have resulted from the denial of effect to the inhibition in the process of ranking and sale, referred to in the record, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to consider as to the damages claimed in the original action; and, if he shall see cause, to receive a particular condescendence thereof: Also remit to the Lord Ordinary to hear counsel in the supplementary action, and, generally, to proceed further in the conjoined actions as shall be just; with power to disjoin the actions if, in the course of the proceedings, he shall consider it right so to do; reserving, in the conjoined actions, all questions of expenses.”

Burgh—Election—Suspension and Interdict—3 and 4 William IV, cap. 76.—

At the usual meeting for the annual election of office-bearers of a royal burgh, a motion was made and carried by the majority of the councillors present, for the adjournment of the election till a specified day. An amendment to proceed at once with the election was adopted by the minority, and certain gentlemen were declared to be elected to the offices of bailie and treasurer. A note of suspension and interdict was then brought by the minority to prevent the majority proceeding with an election in terms of their resolution;—Held (dub. Lord Deas), that suspension was incompetent, and observed, that it was only after a completed election, at which all parties had voted, or in circumstances in which the councillors who had not voted could not be held to have been excluded from exercising their privilege, that such a procedure was competent.

STRAURAER is a royal burgh. The Town-Council of the burgh consists of eighteen members, six or one-third of whom annually go out of office, in terms of the statute 3d and 4th William IV., cap. 76. The statute provides that any councillor, magistrate, or office-bearer elected ad interim, shall go out of office on the first Tuesday of November next ensuing his election, and the vacancy thereby occurring shall be supplied at the next annual election of councillors and magistrates or office-bearers in such burgh.

During the year ending in November 1856, one of the members of the Town-Council of Strauraer died, and another was elected ad interim to supply his place, in terms of the statute. The member so elected vacated office on the first Tuesday of November, along with the six members retiring by rotation, so that, upon the day for the annual election to supply vacancies, there were seven vacancies to be filled up. The respondents averred that there were eight.

Of the members retiring by rotation one was a bailie of the burgh. There was also a vacancy in the office of treasurer, and these offices fell to be filled up after the election of the new councillors, in terms of the 24th section of the statute, which provides, “ That when any magistrate or office-bearer (other than the provost or chief magistrate and treasurer) shall be elected, the place of such magistrate or office-bearer going out of office, the place of such magistrate or office-bearer shall be supplied by election by the council as soon as the full number thereof shall have been completed by the annual election of the third then hereby directed to take place, the said election to be made by plurality of voices, and the chief or senior attending magistrate to have a double or casting vote in case of equality."

On 20th October 1856 notice was publicly given that the election for filling up the seven vacancies in the council would take place on Tuesday the 4th of November. The election took place accordingly, when the respondents were duly elected, and the provost directed written notice to be sent to them of their election, requiring them also to appear within the Town-Hall upon Thursday the 6th November, to declare whether or no they accepted of office. On 6th November the respondents appeared declared their acceptance of, and were duly sworn into office. Thereafter the clerk declared the councillors of the burgh to be the eighteen persons specified in the minute of the meeting of the 6th November. His right of authority to do so was denied by the respondents, and the declaration itself was also said by them to be not correct in point of fact.

In terms of these notices, a meeting of council assembled in the Town Hall on the 7th November 1856, when, inter alia, the following procedure took place:—The respondent Mr Ingram, a newly elected councillor moved "that in respect Mr James M'Dowall has become disabled, by non-residence and by his name being withdrawn from the roll of electors, to serve as a member of the Town Council, the town-clerk be instructed to give the requisite notice, under the 25th clause of the 3d and 4th William IV., cap. 76, to the remaining members of council, to meet and elect a councillor ad interim, in room of Mr M'Dowall, and that this meeting do now adjourn to the day then fixed for such election, and at that time to proceed with the business of this meeting, as well as with the election of councillors ad interim." This motion was seconded by the respondent Mr M'Culloch. On the other hand, Mr Murdoch moved as an amendment, "that in respect Mr M'Dowall has this day intimated his intention to resign the office of councillor, and his resignation cannot be accepted or dealt with till the expiration of three weeks at least, the council do now proceed to the statutory election of office-bearers, and that Mr Peter M'Lean be now elected one of the bailies of this burgh, in room of Mr David Kennedy, who filled the office, but who was one of the retiring councillors, and had not been re-elected; and that Mr William Gibson be appointed treasurer." The motion and amendment having been put to the meeting, the motion was carried by a majority of ten to seven. Thereupon Mr Murdoch protested "that as no other candidates had been proposed for election at this statutory meeting, the gentlemen named by him have been duly and lawfully elected." Following up the above resolution, the respondents issued notices calling a meeting of council for the 17th November, "to elect a councillor ad interim in room of Mr James M'Dowall, and then to proceed with election of office-bearers." The 26th section of the statute enacts, "That any person elected and accepting the office of councillor, magistrate, or other office-bearer, of any Town Council, under the provisions of this Act, may resign his office at any time, upon giving not less than three weeks notice of such intention, by a written intimation to the town-clerk, or chief or senior magistrate." The first notice given by Mr James M'Dowall of his intention to resign was alleged by the complainers to have been at the meeting on 7th November 1856.

The minority, including Mr M'Lean, who was proposed for the office of bailie, and Mr Gibson for the office of treasurer, then presented this petition and complaint, praying the Court to interdict the respondents "from molesting the complainers, William Gibson and Peter Maclean, in the possession and enjoyment, or in the discharge of the duties of their respective offices treasurer and one of the bailies of the said burgh of Stranraer; as also from acting upon or following up in any way the resolution of 7th November 1856; and in particular, from proceeding in terms of the resolution to elect a councillor, bailie, and treasurer, or any other office-bearer for the burgh, upon the 17th day of November; or to do otherwise," &c.

No. 55.

Kerr.

Answers were lodged for the respondents, in which they stated, inter alia, that on "the 7th of November 1856, when the election of the suspenders Messrs Maclean and Gibson, as one of the bailies and as treasurer respectively for the burgh of Stranraer, was alleged to have taken place, the council did not consist of the full number of councillors required by the sett of the burgh, and by the Act of Parliament, in respect that upwards of a year before the election in November 1856, Mr M'Dowall, a councillor, retired from business, went to reside in or near Lanark, and ceased to have any connection with the burgh of Stranraer. By so doing he became disqualified as a councillor, and eo ipso of this disqualification, ceased to be such. In the month of October last he was, by the assessor of the burgh, struck from the list of parliamentary voters, a proceeding confirmed by the Sheriff in the course of the same month. Therefore they alleged that no real or effectual election had taken place.

The complainers pleaded;—That Messrs Gibson and Maclean had been duly proposed and elected as treasurer and bailie respectively, at the statutory meeting for election of office-bearers, and it was therefore incompetent to proceed to any election on the footing that these offices were vacant: That the resolution of 7th November to adjourn the election was, in the circumstances, null and contrary to statute; and that Mr M'Dowall not having resigned, any election to supply his place as a councillor would be illegal.¹

The respondents pleaded;—That Messrs M'Lean and Gibson had not been duly elected, and possessed neither title nor interest to insist in the present application; and the object of the application (in so far as the other suspenders were concerned) being merely to maintain the two suspenders in offices to which they had no just claim, the application was altogether without foundation, and ought to be dismissed. Farther, that interdict was incompetent; the only question thereby raised being the validity of the election, a question incapable of being decided except by way of declarator.²

The Lord Ordinary, on 12th November, granted interim interdict, and on 4th December reported the case to the Court.* The minutes of the meeting of council of 17th November bore, that the agent for Messrs M'Lean and Gibson appeared, "and in virtue of the warrant of the Lord Ordinary, claimed that these gentlemen be now sworn into office, which was done accordingly."

To-day the case was put out for hearing, and having been opened, the senior counsel on both sides stated that they proposed to allow the case to stand on the opening speeches of the junior counsel without farther argument. Lord Deas intimated that he had as yet formed no opinion upon the Gibson v.

Kerr.

LORD IVORY proceeded to deliver his opinion as follows :—

Pressed as we are by the circumstances in which this burgh is placed, we must give such judgment as we best can where so little time is allowed us for deliberation. There is an important question here, whether this suspension is brought under circumstances which render such an application competent. In the ordinary case, where a party has been inducted into office, and the election has been completed, suspension and interdict is the natural remedy for preventing that officer being hindered or molested in the exercise of his duties. But in the present case there is no such completed election. There is no completed investment of the office in the sense of all the cases to which we have been referred, for on the 17th November the swearing in of Messrs Maclean and Gibson, for the first time, takes place; that is, five days after the date of the suspension and interdict, and therefore nothing had been done prior to the date of the suspension for investing these gentlemen in their respective offices.

On 7th November matters were left where the subsequent meeting of the 17th took them up. The election on the 7th is a very clumsy form of election. It is not taken up as the substantial matter of business of that day. It is engrafted on a motion for adjournment, and therefore until the question of adjournment is disposed of, the matter of the election could not be taken up. In all the cases to which we have been referred, both parties have been engaged in what substantially was an election, one party wishing to elect one candidate, and another party wishing to elect another candidate, and so forth. In all these cases the parties meet in the same arena. The same question is in discussion between them, and it is only in such circumstances that the matter comes into this position that the party not exercising the elective franchise at the proper time is not in the situation of throwing away his vote. Besides, you are not to mix up in elections of this kind matters of a complex nature, as was done here. You must so manage that each individual councillor may give his vote for the one candidate or the other, as he pleases; and farther, you are not to mix up the voting for an election with the voting on a motion for adjournment. These things are all mixed up here. Unless the votes of the majority are to be held as thrown away, you cannot hold the election by the minority to be good. That is quite sufficient to determine this case, and as the suspension takes up matters at that stage, I hold it to be not a competent mode for extricating the question. I do not wish to enter into the general proposition that suspension cannot in any circumstances be a proper mode for extricating such a question. But when the matter is at a stage of defect and imperfection, where interdict is to stop parties on both sides from proceeding further with the business, and where the question of right affects only the intermediate stage of the election, then suspension and interdict is not the proper mode for trying that question. There is more than that in this case. I am not prepared to say that if there be good and reasonable and bona fide grounds for asking an adjournment, there is any statutory rule forbidding the adjournment of the day for electing Magistrates. It is not as if the statute had fixed the election for a certain day, so that if not completed on that day, the election could not be completed on any other day. The Council must meet on that day, but until their number is complete, they cannot elect, and therefore you are not tied up to any absolute point of time as regards the day of the election. There are, doubtless, circumstances in which the election may be adjourned, and if so, it is reasonable at least to entertain a motion for adjournment, made on sufficient grounds and in good faith.

Considering all these things, I think that this suspension and interdict must be refused. I am sorry that interdict had ever been granted, for it has raised many difficulties calculated to keep this body in feud. But we must now remedy it as well as we can: And, on the whole, I have no doubt as to the propriety of refusing this application.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I also concur. I only wish to say that there are farther grounds on which I do not wish to give any opinion at all.

LORD DEAS.—It is unfortunate that this case, which involves points of importance, should occur for decision when the Court is just about to rise for the Recess, and all parties are pressed for time. I am confirmed in thinking a completed argument desirable, by observing that the main ground of judgment now to be pronounced has been rested by Lord Ivory, with concurrence of your Lordships, on a view not stated from the bar at all : And it is this : At the meeting of 7th November, a motion was made to adjourn the election of office-bearers to a future day. This was met by what is called an amendment, but which was truly both an amendment and a motion, embracing two things quite distinct in themselves, and which ought not to have been linked together—namely, 1st, That the election be at once proceeded with ; and, 2d, That certain persons named should be elected. Now, if the question had been first put—“Adjourn, or proceed ?”—the whole Councillors present would afterwards have had a proper opportunity of voting or declining to vote for or against the particular persons put in nomination, which, as the matter was managed, they have not yet had. According to the best opinion I can form at this moment, this objection to the proceedings appears to me to be well founded, and, the case being pressed to judgment on the argument as it stands, I can only go upon this opinion. I am sensible, at the sametime, that the objection taken to the competency of the suspension ought naturally to come first. But I am still less inclined to deal with that point than with the other, because, while stated and argued by the respondents’ counsel, it was not opened upon by the counsel for the complainers, and, there having been no reply, we are left without any explanation of the grounds on which the case is sought to be distinguished from the case of Fleming ; and I shall therefore say that I am inclined to doubt at present the competency.

I am well pleased, however, as the case is decided by the votes of your Lordships, that no opinion of mine can affect the result.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—“ Refuse the note of suspension and interdict : Recall the interdict ; and find the respondents entitled to expenses, and remit,” &c.

Personal Obligation—Heritable and Moveable.—The proprietor of certain lands who had granted a bond and disposition in security, containing a personal obligation and a conveyance of the lands in security, sold them to joint purchasers, under burden of the payment of the sum contained in the heritable bond. The amount of the bond was retained by the purchasers, who only paid to the seller the balance of the price. The seller assigned to the bondholder his right of relief against the purchasers. The bondholder having brought the subjects to sale, they did not realise the full amount of the debt ;—Held (affirming judgment of Lord Ardmillan), that the purchasers were jointly and severally liable to the bondholder in the balance of the debt.

THE facts of this case were embodied by the Lord Ordinary in his interlocutor, as follows :—

—The late William Reid, who is represented by the pursuer, held a bond and disposition in security from David Tait, over certain subjects in Kirkinloch, for the sum of L.450, which subjects were in January 1839 purchased from Tait by the defenders. The price of the subjects set forth in the disposition by Tait to the defenders was L.615, but it was admitted on record that only L.165 were paid, the difference of L.450 being the sum in the heritable bond to Reid. The subjects were disposed by Tait, and accepted by the defenders, under the lien and burden of the ‘ payment to William Reid of L.450 sterling, and interest thereof from Martinmas last’ (1838), being the sum in the heritable bond. By assignation granted by Tait to the pursuer, the pursuer was vested in all right and claim of relief competent to Tait against the defenders, in terms of the disposition and the transaction of sale, in so far as regards the L.450, which remained in the hands of the defenders, as purchasers, in the manner above explained. The pursuer brought the subjects to sale, when they realised, after the usual deduction of expenses, L.277, 18s. 6d. A sum of L.122, 2s. 7d. had been paid by or for behoof of the defenders, to account of interest; and the balance of the principal sum of L.450, and the interest from Martinmas 1838, under deduction of the sum of L.122, 2s. 7d., formed the subject of the present action."

The defenders pleaded;—That they had never come under any personal obligation to pay the amount of the debt alleged to be due to the pursuer. The mere fact of accepting a disposition of subjects under a real burden did not rear up a personal liability for the amount of the real debt or interest that might have accrued upon it—far less did it rear up a conjunct and several liability against the purchasers.

The Lord Ordinary, on 22d February 1855, pronounced the following interlocutor:—(After findings in fact, as above given)—" Finds, in point of law, as applicable to this state of facts, that the defenders are jointly and severally liable to the pursuer in the said balance of the debt of L.450, with interest as aforesaid, and decerns accordingly against the defenders, jointly and severally, conform to the conclusions of the libel: Finds the defenders liable to the pursuers in expenses." *

The defenders reclaimed, and pleaded;—That there was here no real transfer of the personal obligation, and therefore no personal claim against the defenders.

Counsel for the respondent were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I see no reason to differ from the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD IVORY and LORD CURRIEHILL concurred.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion. Mr Patton founded on the words, " with and under the further lien and burden," as shewing that the burden of the sum of L.450, and interest, was a burden of the same kind with the burdens previously referred to, which he said were inherent conditions of the grant, and the same with those warranted in the bond and disposition in security. But on looking at these conditions, it will be seen that they are of a nature which were personally binding on whosoever should purchase the property, as well (it may be) as real burdens, by being made inherent conditions of the grant:—for instance, not to build certain kinds of manufactories on the ground,—to keep always upon it houses of a certain description, and in good repair,—not to place, or allow obstructions on the street, &c. So that if any inference were to be drawn from the words above alluded to, it would rather be that the burden of payment of the sum in the bond, and interest, was meant to be both a personal and a real burden. But I do not go upon this. Nor do I go upon the footing that the L.450 was truly part of the price. I look upon the mention made of L.615 as the price as important, mainly as favouring the construction of the subsequent clause in the way the Lord Ordinary has construed it,—namely, as importing an obligation of relief, which is truly the whole question in this case. It is not usual for the seller of heritable subjects to remain liable for heritable bonds affecting it without relief, and I am quite satisfied that such is not the legal import of the transaction here.

THE COURT adhered, with additional expenses.

* " NOTE.—The special terms of the disposition to the defenders, according to which they undertook the burden of payment of the sum in the bond to William Reid—the fact that the amount of the bond was retained by the defenders, as purchasers, who only paid to the seller the balance of the price—and the assignation by Tait, the seller, to the pursuer of his right of relief—really remove all difficulty from this case, and distinguish it from the case of Kippen, 24th February 1852 (14 D. 533).

ALEXANDER MARTIN, Defender.—Penny—Mackenzie.

Process—Leave to appeal.—Evidence proceeded with in a cause, pending an appeal of one branch of it.

SEE supra, p. 101.

The pursuers now presented a petition for leave to appeal.

Penney, for the defenders, objected. This was not a case for appeal. The Lord Ordinary had appointed issues to be lodged. The evidence would be very much that of seamen, and if the case were taken to appeal now, and kept up for two or three years, much of that evidence would likely be lost. No injury could result to the pursuers by going on with the case in the usual course.

D. F. Inglis, for the pursuers.—The case naturally divided itself into two parts,—the first question being, whether the defence founded on the allegation of unseaworthiness, could, in the circumstances, be sustained. Both parties wished that defence to be disposed of, and renounced probation upon it, and it had been treated by the Court as a separate case. The reason why parties wished to have that defence so disposed of was that, in the event of its being affirmed, there would be an end of the case. That same reason of expediency applied to this application for appeal. In the event of the judgment of this Court being reversed, the whole of the labour and expense of an enquiry into this branch of the case would be avoided. In the event of the judgment being affirmed, the parties would then be in a position to proceed with the investigation, and with no disadvantage from the delay. There was nothing to prevent the defenders going on with their evidence while the case was pending in the House of Lords, by taking it on commission. The pursuers did not object to the defender getting an issue before going on with their proof.

LORD PRESIDENT (after consultation).—The opinion of the majority of the Court is, that, in the circumstances of this case, and especially there being engrossed in the interlocutor of 18th January 1856 the consent of parties to have this ground of defence disposed of in the first instance, the prayer of the petition should be granted. We shall delay this case until issues are adjusted, but it being understood that the petition is then to be granted.

 ROBERT BARLAS, Claimant.—Pattison.

Title—Confirmation.—Held (affirming judgment of Lord Neaves, abs. Lord Wood), that where one of two children was confirmed executor to her father, who on the predecease of his wife had retained in his own hands the entire goods in communion, which so got mixed up in his executry, and were given up in the inventory, she was not entitled, before paying to the other child her proportion of her mother's share of these goods in communion, to demand that a separate title should be made up to the mother's share.

Question—Whether such a title could have been demanded had the husband's executor been a stranger.

Interest—“Legal interest.”—Such a claim to a proportion of a mother's share of the goods in communion, though not made till twenty years after her death, bears legal interest. The term “legal interest,” where the contrary is not specified, still means five per cent.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Neaves.
R

THE late Henry Marder married Isabella Robertson, without at the time or afterwards executing any marriage-contract. His wife died in October 1832, leaving two children, Margaret and Helen, the claimants, Mrs Smith and Mrs Douglas. The husbands of both daughters were alive at the date of the raising of this action, though both died during its dependence. At Mrs Marder's death, the goods in communion amounted to about L 2000; but no payment was made in name of their mother's share to either of the daughters as representing her. Mr Marder himself died in December 1849, leaving upwards of L.3200 of moveable property. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby his whole estate, heritable and moveable, was conveyed to his daughter, Mrs Smith, who was appointed sole executrix; and she accepted the office, and duly expedite confirmation.

This deed bore to be granted under burden, inter alia, that Mrs Smith should invest L.600, the security to be taken in favour of her sister, Mrs Douglas, in liferent, for her liferent use allenary, and exclusive always of the jus mariti of her husband, and to her children in fee, declaring the provision to be in full of claim of legitim, bairn's part, or otherwise, competent to her through his death. Disputes having arisen as to the amount of Mr Marder's estate, and as to the right of Mrs Douglas under the settlement of an uncle who died in 1831, to a share of the succession to his estate, which had come into her father's hands, a multiplepinding was brought by Mr and Mrs Douglas, and Robert Barlas, as Douglas's assignee, in name of Mrs Smith. Mrs Douglas, in the course of the action, put in a minute, repudiating the settlement, and electing to betake herself to her legal claims; and the only points of interest arose upon the claim of Mr Barlas and Mrs Smith's pleas regarding it. Barlas, as in right of Douglas, claimed, as due to him by the deceased, one-half of the third of the goods in communion at the date of Mrs Marder's death, with interest thereon from said date, under deduction of all sums paid to account; and farther, one-half of the legitim due from the personal estate of the deceased, with interest from his death.

Mrs Smith pleaded, inter alia;—"Assuming that any sum is still due to Mrs Douglas, as one of the executrices of her mother, a title must be made up jointly with the claimant, Mrs Smith, to the late Mrs Marder's share of the goods in communion, before Mrs Douglas or those in her right can uplift and discharge the same."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following finding in regard to Barlas's claim:—"Finds that the claimant Robert Barlas, as assignee and in right of Alexander Douglas, the husband of the said Helen Robertson Marder or Douglas, is entitled to demand that there shall be paid or accounted for to him by the nominal raiser, out of the fund in medio, the one-half share of the free third of the goods in communion between Henry Marder and Isabella Robertson or Marder, the parents of the said Helen Robertson Marder or Douglas, at the death of Mrs Marder, her mother, on the 21st day of October 1832, with the legal interest thereon from that date: as also, the one-half of the legitim due from the moveable succession of the said Henry Marder at his death on the 7th day of December 1849, with the legal interest thereon from that date, as the same may be duly ascertained and fixed; but under deduction always of any sums of money paid to account of the said claims respectively, or which the nominal raiser, as in right of the said Henry Marder or otherwise, could set off against the same."

Mrs Smith reclaimed, praying the Court, inter alia, "to alter said interlocutor, in so far as it finds that the claimant Robert Barlas is entitled to demand that there should be paid or accounted for to him, by the reclamer, out of the fund in medio (under the deductions therein mentioned), any portion of the goods in communion between the late Henry Marder and his late spouse, the said Isabella Robertson or Marder, at the death of the latter in 1832, without finding that a legal title must first be made up to said portion of the goods in communion, and to find that prior to any such payment or accounting, a legal title must be made up thereto ; to recall and alter said interlocutor, in so far as it finds the claimant Robert Barlas entitled to 'legal interest' on said portion of said goods in communion and on the share of the legitim from the death of the said Isabella Robertson or Marder and the death of the said Henry Marder respectively."

Jan. 15, 1857.
Barlas.

It was pleaded in support of the reclaiming note ;—1. Where a claim was made by the next of kin of a deceased wife, confirmation was always required. It was a mother's estate—a moveable right on which she could test—that was in question here, and it could only be taken up by an executor, or some one representing her by some title. Barlas had no title whatever ; no doubt he was Douglas's assignee, but neither Douglas nor his wife had made up any title to Mrs Marder's succession, so that Barlas was not in position to grant an effectual discharge ; and, till he put himself in a position to do this, the reclamer could not be obliged to pay.¹ 2. The term "legal interest" was obscure since the abolition of the usury laws, and, at any rate, five per cent was, in the circumstances, too high a rate. No claim had ever been made by Mrs Douglas for her proportion of her mother's share of the goods in communion. The father was not bound, without such a claim, to realise his estate at his wife's death, and could not be considered a wrong-doer ; and down to 1855, when the minute by Mrs Douglas repudiating the settlement was lodged, the reclamer did not know that legitim was to be claimed, so that she could not be considered wrong, or in mora in not paying it. Thus on neither branch of the claim should penal interest, or interest beyond the date of raising the action, be allowed.

Mr Barlas replied ;—1. The claim here was a proper claim of debt against the husband's estate, which only arose after the wife's death, and in which the wife had no vested right, and stood in an entirely different position from a claim through a mother to jus relictæ, which claim could only exist through the wife's having survived her husband, and the right having thus become vested in her. Here the goods in communion had remained in the husband's hands, and had been given up by Mrs Smith in her confirmation, and thus this claim became a proper debt against the estate. 2. Although it was now lawful to stipulate for a higher rate of interest than five per cent, that rate still answered the technical description of "legal interest." In the claim lodged in the multiplepoinding, interest was stated as part of the demand made, and this being a claim of debt, if well founded, it bore interest by force of law, independently of mora or taciturnity, or of the knowledge of the debtor that it was due—consignation alone could have stopped it.²

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On the question of interest, I think the previous decisions give us the rule, unless something can be stated in limitation of that rule. In the case of Cooper, quoted to us, where the claim was of the same nature as this, and made twenty-nine years after the mother's death, it seems to have been held, that while the father alimented the children there was no liability for interest, but that there was when he did not do so. I had thought more effect was shown to lapse of time, but it seems that is not taken into account as a bar. Now, what we find here is, that the entire goods in communion were dealt with by the deceased as his own, and so dealt with profitably, for it appears from the accounts in process that the principal part was invested, and that the stock was sold at a higher rate than it would have fetched at the wife's death; so that the question might arise, as in Cochrane v. Black, whether the profits should not be communicated. But, at all events, having so dealt with the funds as his own, and changed the securities, his estate must be held liable in interest.

As to the necessity for making up a title, we cannot listen to that demand from one who has confirmed to her father, and acknowledges the funds to have come into her hands, and acknowledges, too, the relationship of the claimant, her own sister. The claim is made by an acknowledged creditor of the succession which she holds, and to which she has confirmed.

LORD MURRAY.—If we were now laying down a rule of law for the first time, I would have it, that, if the party were in any degree blameworthy, he should be mulcted in the highest rate of interest; but that, otherwise, he should pay whatever he drew, whether it were four per cent. or ten per cent. But I do not think the deceased can be said to have been in the position of a trustee who failed in his duty, and I see no evidence of his having drawn more than four per cent., and I would not make him liable in more. Then, as to the title, I think it unnecessary to disturb the practice which would hold this to be sufficient, for the sum in question is included in the confirmation of Mrs Smith. It does not help her case at all to say that a title has to be made up to jus relictæ through the widow, because here we have a case where there is no widow, for the wife predeceased her husband.

LORD WOOD was absent.

LORD COWAN.—As regards the question of interest, I am of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that legal interest is due. A claim of this kind is one of debt, and ought to bear interest, unless there are grounds for excluding the demand, in respect of maintenance, or some such ground. And, where interest is due, it ought to be at the rate of five per cent. when the funds have been used and appropriated for his own purposes by the debtor. It is quite a different case when the fund can be traced as remaining all along in a certain stock, or invested in a certain bank or security, yielding a lower rate of interest. The debtor could not, in such a case, be called on to pay a higher rate than what had been received. To that view effect was given in the ultimate decision of Russell v. Leighton. But I agree that here no specialty of that kind has been made out.

On the second point, I think there are specialties which may enable us to adhere. I apprehend that, in practice, where the wife predeceases with the absolute right of property either to the half or third of the goods in communion, her next of kin must confirm to their author before enforcing their right against the husband. It may be a brother, as in the case of Coldstream, 30th June 1843, or a distant relative, as in the case of Russell v. Leighton, 1st December 1852, or children, as here. In every case, when demanded, confirmation is the only legal evidence of the right; and, accordingly, in the report of the last of the cases mentioned, it is expressly said that, on Fleming's death, A. Leighton and others expedited a confirmation to the wife as next of kin. As regards the question of title, therefore, in the general case the next of kin—be they children or cousins, or more distant relatives—must confirm and expedite a title in their persons to the wife's portion of the goods in communion. Nor is it material that there has been confirmation to the husband's estate. That does not interfere with this principle, that, to take up the succession of the mother, there must be confirmation to her by the next of kin to give them a complete title to pursue, at least to obtain decree against the husband's representatives. But, if your Lordships think, in the special circumstances, confirmation to be unnecessary, I do not dissent, for this is a very extraordinary case. These parties are two sisters, and the defender, Mrs Smith, one of them, is the general donee of the father. As such, she has taken up the whole of his moveable succession,—she does not require to expedite a title in her person to get her share of the goods of her mother,—but yet she insists on her sister making up a title. This technical plea—which is not necessary for the defender's safety in paying—I am not sorry that your Lordships see ground for repelling, and concur in that course.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitted the case to him to be disposed of as regards other points.

 M'Naughton
 v. Caledonian
 Railway Co.

Master and Servant.—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardmillan, abs. Lord Wood), that a master is liable in damages to the representatives of a servant who died of injuries received in his service through the carelessness of a fellow-servant.

THE pursuers of this action of damages against the Caledonian Railway Company were the widow and children of a workman said to have met with his death while in the defenders' employment, in circumstances thus stated by the Lord Ordinary:—"The facts alleged by the pursuers, and to be assumed at present, are briefly these:—M'Naughton, while employed as a joiner or carpenter in repairing a railway carriage on a siding, was killed by a collision caused by an engine driving violently into the siding. No warning was given, and no precautions were taken, to secure the safety of those who might be engaged on the siding. The collision, and consequent injury and death of M'Naughton, are alleged to have been caused by the fault of the defenders' servants, viz. the persons in charge of the engine and the person who arranged the switches."

2D DIVISION.
 Ld. Ardmillan.
 R.

The defenders pleaded;—1. The death was purely accidental. 2. The accident would not have happened, but for the deceased's own neglect of proper precautions. 3. The allegation that injury was occasioned through the culpability of fellow-servants in the defenders' employment is irrelevant, the defenders not being legally responsible in a question with the deceased, or his representatives, for such culpability.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the third plea in law stated for the defenders, and made avizandum, and considered the closed record and debate—Repels the said plea in law, and appoints the cause to be enrolled with a view to further procedure, and reserves the question of expenses." *

* "NOTE.—The defenders' objection to the relevancy of this action raises a question of great general importance, entering deeply into the constitution of one of our most common and familiar contracts.—(Here followed the statement quoted above.)

"The defenders plead that these averments are not relevant to infer their liability, in respect that M'Naughton was in their employment at the time of the collision, and that for injury by one servant to another the common master is not responsible.

"The primary principle of responsibility is, culpa tenet suos auctores. But actual personal fault is not necessary to the responsibility as auctor. A man may be auctor without being personally actor of the wrong. Qui facit per alium facit per se. Another may so represent me that for what he does as actor I may be responsible as auctor. His act in the matter in which he represents me may be by reputation mine, and for his fault in the doing of that I may be responsible. This liability rests on the principle of mandate, and on the representation constituted by the mandate in regard to and within the limits of the matter committed. When the mandate is express, and relates to the doing of the wrong, there can be no doubt of the liability. The mandant is in that case the direct author of the wrong. But the law does not limit the responsibility to the case of express mandate. Where the wrong is done by the mandatory, while acting within the scope of the mandate, he is held as in that matter representing the mandant, and the responsibility of the mandant follows. There is an implied mandate by a master to a servant for doing all acts within his proper service. The servant is doing what, but for the delegation, the master must have done,—the servant is actor, the master is auctor of what is done. Thus it is settled by a great many decisions, and recognised as undoubted law by our institutional writers, that a master is responsible to a stranger for the fault of his servant committed within the scope of the

v. Caledonian
Railway Co.

The Railway Company reclaimed, and pleaded:—It would not do to found their liability, as the Lord Ordinary did, upon the servants being here employment. This has been so long and so firmly fixed in our law, that it is unnecessary to quote authorities. There can be no doubt of the relevancy of the averments in this case, if the person injured had been a stranger. On this point it is understood that the master's responsibility is also recognised by the law of England.

“But it is said that here the person injured was himself in the employment of the defenders, and that a master is not liable for injury done by one servant to another. The fact that the wrong-doer and the sufferer are fellow-servants is founded on as releasing the master from a responsibility which would attach to him if the sufferer were a stranger. In support of this plea, the defenders refer to the law of England, and several very important English authorities have been quoted, particularly the cases of Priestly v. Fowler, 1837, 3 Mees. and Welsb., p. 1; Hutchinson v. York, Newcastle, and Berwick Railway, 22d May 1850, 19 Law Journal, Exch. Rep., p. 296; and Wigmore v. Jay, 22d May 1850, 19 Law Journal, Exch. Rep., p. 300.

“The Lord Ordinary has given to these English authorities his anxious consideration, and compared them with the decisions in the Scottish Courts,—particularly with Linwood v. Hathorn, May 14, 1817; Sword v. Cameron, 13th February 1839; Sneddon v. Adie, 16th June 1849; Rankin v. Dixon, 31st January 1852; Gray v. Brassey, 1st December 1852; and the recent case of Reid v. The Bartons-hill Coal Company, 3d July 1855, now under appeal. So far as he can venture to form any opinion on the English decisions, he is disposed to think that no rule quite so absolute and inflexible as that for which the defenders contend has been settled by express decision, though certainly the authority of the cases and the dicta of the learned Judges are favourable to the defenders' plea. In the law of Scotland, the decisions directly adverse to the absolute rule contended for by the defenders are express and numerous. Masters have been repeatedly found liable for injury done by one servant to another. There is no trace of such a rule in Scottish law as exempts the master from responsibility merely because the injured party as well as the doer is in his employment.

“It is true that the contract of service, and the responsibility of masters for the acts of servants, ought not to be governed by peculiarities of local law, and that the principles, when fully ascertained and judicially recognised, ought to be of general application. There may perhaps be found some standard of responsibility intermediate between an inflexible rule enforcing the master's liability in all cases where one servant is injured by the fault of another, and an inflexible rule exempting the master from liability in all such cases; and it were most expedient that if there be such a standard it should be authoritatively declared and enforced throughout the United Kingdom.

“The case, for instance, might occur of injury to one servant by the fault of another while both were employed in a common operation,—as two men sawing at one plank, or felling one tree, or working together as colliers at one place, and in one department,—when by the carelessness of one the other is injured. There is no warranty of absolute security implied in the contract of service, and if several men, in one employment, engaged together in one common operation, mutually relying on one another, there may be good grounds for adopting the rule of the English law, which exempts the master from responsibility to one of these servants for the fault or carelessness of another.

“On the other hand, cases may occur of a different character where other elements arise, which must enter into the question of liability. It may be that the persons, though servants of the same master, stand in regard to each other in the relation of superior and subordinate. Both are indeed servants, but they are not on the same level, for superintendence is entrusted to the one, and in superintending he is doing the duty, and acting as the representative of the master. In such a case, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that, for the fault of the servant having such superintendence, the master is and ought to be responsible; and in the case of Patterson v. Wallace, in the House of Lords, the master's liability, where there is blame on the part of the servant charged with direction or superintendence, was recognised.—(Macqueen's Rep., 1, 748.)

Then, again, it may be that the two persons, viz., the wrong-doer and the injured, though both at the time servants of one master, are engaged in different operations, and in distinct departments of work. A dairy-maid is bringing home milk from the farm, and is carelessly driven over by the coachman. A painter or slater is engaged at his work on the top of a high ladder, placed against the side of a country house, and is injured by the carelessness of the gardener, who wheels his barrow against the ladder, and upsets it. A clerk in a shipping company's office is sent on board a ship belonging to the company with a message to the captain, and he meets with injury by falling through a hatchway, which the mate has carelessly left unfastened, though apparently closed. A ploughman is at work on a piece of ground held by a railway company, and adjacent to a railway, and is, while in the employment of the company, killed by an engine, which, through the rashness or carelessness of the engine-driver, leaps from the line of rails into the field. Many similar illustrations of injury to one servant by the fault of another in a separate and distinct department suggest themselves. If the absolute rule maintained by the defenders is well founded, the master would in all these cases be exempt from responsibility,—a very startling result to a Scotch lawyer, for whatever support to such a rule may be found in some of the decisions of the Courts, and more particularly in some of the dicta of the learned Judges in England, there is neither precedent nor authority in the law of Scotland in favour of it; and the Lord Ordinary is humbly of opinion that an absolute and inflexible rule releasing the master from responsibility in every case where one servant is injured by the fault of another, is utterly unknown to the law of Scotland.

“Nor has the principle or theory of the rule any more support than the rule itself. The doctrine of an implied undertaking in the contract of service to incur all risk from the fault of servants in all different departments, is not once recognised in Scottish law. A man who habitually works side by side with another in the same operation, may perhaps be viewed as consenting to incur the risk of the carelessness of that fellow-workman in that common operation. They may be viewed as in that matter mutually relying on each other, and not relying on the employer. Even in such a case the exemption of the employer from liability has never been recognised by Scottish law; but the great deference due to the English authorities, and the importance of uniformity of law on such a point, may perhaps recommend the adoption of the English rule to this limited extent. But it is impossible that every person entering the employment of a railway company can mean to rely on the skill, steadiness, and carefulness of all the servants of that company, wherever employed, and in whatever department. A universal undertaking of that kind, extending to hundreds of persons, in widely different places, cannot be lightly implied. It is not to be inferred in point of fact from practice or general understanding, for the practice and understanding in Scotland is the other way; and it is not in Scotland an inference in point of law, for the law has never drawn it, and the whole stream of authority, institutional and judicial, is against it.

“In the present case, which is a fair illustration, the carpenter having nothing to do with the locomotive department, was engaged in his own separate work, in a place where he was entitled to expect safety. It was the duty of the defenders to take all proper precaution for his safety. The locomotive business was in the hands of the defenders, or their servants in that department—not to any extent in the hands of the carpenter. It was surely the duty of the defenders so to work the locomotives as not to run them into what was for the time the carpenter's shop; and if it was their duty to secure his safety by their caution, then those who conducted the locomotives were doing their work in a department with which the carpenter had nothing to do, and for fault in the doing of that work, they, and not the carpenter, must be responsible.

“On the whole matter, the Lord Ordinary,—though disposed to qualify his

 v. Caledonian

of the establishment, so that all must be looked upon as in one service; and the liability contended for did not arise out of and was not an ordinary incident of the contract of service. The maxim qui facit per alium facit per se did not apply to such a case as the present, but to the case of principal and agent. The whole servants of the Company must be looked upon as one family, and, inter familiam, servants took the risk of their fellow-servants, culpa tenet suos auctores; the coachman alone was liable if he drove over the footman. There was no warranty on the part of the master, or obligation on him, to protect one servant from injury from his fellow-servants. As regards the obligation of the master to grant reparation to one of the public, that rested on a different basis altogether; the maxim which applied was respondeat superior, and there were grave reasons of public policy for it. The law the Company contended for was the law of England and of America.¹

Without calling on the pursuers to reply—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I would rather guard myself against adopting all the Lord Ordinary's note. I go on this broad principle, that since the employer is liable to third parties for the injuries sustained by them, he is a fortiori liable for those sustained by his own servants. The defenders say the general policy of the law is otherwise. I do not agree with that. I consider the safety of that large class of men coming under the designation of fellow-workmen ought to be attended to. The notion that each workman undertakes all the risks of accidents caused by, say 1000 other fellow-workmen employed in a railway, and that the master is not to be liable, is to my mind quite opposite to reason and justice.

The question is—what is really in the contract of service? and I cannot help thinking that we cannot imply in it an exclusion of the right of protection to life and person. The duty of the employer is to take care not to allow his servants to injure any one. That is a general duty, and it is not limited merely to the public. If he is liable for injury done to the public, why should he not be also liable for injuries done to one of his own servants, even although such injury should arise by a fellow-servant's neglect or disobedience to orders? The first thing, I think, is to take care of all his own servants; they are brought into constant contact with each other, and the risk of injury is very great. The order and duty, therefore, of being careful and attentive to the life and person of others, applies first and primarily to fellow-servants. Well, if the instructions given clearly apply to the preservation of fellow-servants, then disobedience to them renders the party liable. As to the English cases on this point, if they had declared a master not liable wherever his instructions had been violated, I could have understood it; but that is not said, for he is liable in England in cases of injuries to the public, and why he should not be liable for the injuries done to fellow-servants I cannot imagine. It seems most extraordinary to say that he is free from all risk for accidents caused by fellow-workmen. We are told that workmen will be better cared for by giving them actions of damages against their fellow-workmen—persons from whom, in general, nothing can ever be recovered. I am sure if we introduce this principle into railways, there would be a most dangerous laxity and extreme want of care. If the highest Scotch Court, the House of Lords, shall declare that we have misunderstood the law, or rather declare that it should be altered, we must bow to its authority.

LORD MURRAY.—I go entirely upon the facts which are here alleged. The question is—whether, in these circumstances, the master is liable? and, according to judgment by reserving for serious consideration the propriety of adopting the English rule to a limited extent, and in a limited class of cases,—is of opinion that in this case of injury by the fault of a servant in a separate and distinct department, the plea of the defenders against the relevancy ought not to be sustained."

all our principles, I have no doubt he is, and therefore this action is relevant, and the pursuers are entitled to maintain it on the allegations they have made. I cannot see my way to any principle here which would free the master from his liability. I do not know the English law on this point, but we have a principle which appears to me very wise and just, by which, at any rate, I, as a Scotch Judge, am bound.

Fortune.

LORD WOOD was absent.

LORD COWAN.—The Lord Ordinary has repelled the third plea in law for the defender, and, in reference to Mr Patton's argument, it is material to keep in view the precise terms of that plea. The plea is not contended to be applicable to the special circumstances of this case, as distinguishing it from others of the same class. It is in terms the very plea urged in the case of Gray and Brassey, and is, in the words of Lord Fullerton in that case, "general, absolute, and unqualified." Had the question been an open one in principle, it would have required serious discussion and deliberate consideration, and I would not have been content with merely hearing the opening counsel for the reclamer. But this is not the first time the point has occurred, or that the general question of a master's liability for injury done by one servant to another has been before us. It was before me as Lord Ordinary in Gray and Brassey, prior to the decision in Rankin v. Dixon, in this Division of the Court. It was dealt with in that case as the first attempt to introduce a principle from the law of England, not hitherto recognised in the decisions of the Scotch Courts as such. I reported it to the First Division, in order that an authoritative decision might be pronounced; but their Lordships sent it back to me for judgment. In the meantime the case of Rankin v. Dixon had been decided, in which this very defence was repelled, so that there remained with me no difficulty in repelling the plea for the defenders in Brassey's case; and their Lordships of the First Division, on the case going back to them, adhered to that judgment. Since then we have the decision in Reid v. Bartonshill Coal Company. Thus there are two, if not three, decisions standing in which this defence has been repelled by well-considered judgments of this Court. It would be wrong, in this state of matters, as it appears to me, to entertain serious argument on a principle so thoroughly recognised, until the House of Lords has instructed us to act differently. It may be very expedient that the same rule should prevail in both countries, but so long as the decisions in our own Courts stand unreversed, I do not see how we can do otherwise than affirm the interlocutor of Lord Ardmillan.

THE COURT adhered, and found additional expenses due.

Repetition—Process—Conclusions.—A landlord, by written lease, became bound to pay the tenant L.65 on his producing vouchers to that extent of expenditure on the buildings of the farm. Before the buildings were executed, the landlord allowed the tenant to retain L.65 out of his rent, on condition that the buildings were proceeded with the next Spring. After the lapse of a year or two, the landlord brought an action concluding alternatively for production of the vouchers or repayment of L.65. Objection to the competency of the action, that the only conclusions which the landlord was entitled to insist in were for damages, or to enforce implement, repelled; and inquiry, of consent, allowed to ascertain what sum had actually been spent by the tenant.

Fortune held a farm from Dods under a written lease dated 19th November 1846, but which declared the entry to have been in 1844. Dods had been bound to repair the onstead, and build a new dwelling-house. As to these an arbitration was entered into, and it was found that L.65 would suffice to complete what then (Nov. 1846) required to be done, and that this sum "must be paid by the said George Dods to the said George Fortune, on his exhibiting vouchers that such sum has been truly expended, and that in respect of this allowance, whether expended by the said George Fortune or not, he is bound to leave the whole in good and sufficient and tenantable condition at the termination of the lease. And further, in respect the said arbiters and oversman have ordained the said George Dods to pay to the said George Fortune the sum of L.65 sterling, as a sufficient sum to enable the said George Fortune to complete the new dwelling-house which the said George Dods was bound to erect, and to put the whole onstead, &c., in good and sufficient and tenantable condition, the said George Fortune being bound at his own expense, to drive all carriages for said repairs and dwelling-house and the said George Fortune being also bound to exhibit vouchers or receipts that said sum has been so expended, before it shall be paid by the said George Dods, the said George Fortune hereby binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to maintain, not only the whole onstead, &c., and to leave them at the expiry thereof, in good, sufficient, and tenantable condition."

Such being the state of written obligations between the parties, Dods raised an action in the Sheriff-court of Berwickshire, concluding that Fortune "ought to be decerned, first, to exhibit vouchers or receipts, shewing that he has expended the sum of L.65 sterling in completing the new dwelling-house at Barnside, and putting the whole onstead, &c., in sufficient condition, which sum the defender was not entitled to receive under the lease between the parties, until he had expended the same, and produced vouchers or receipts shewing that he had so expended the same; or, second, he ought to be decerned to repay to the pursuer the said sum of L.65, he having retained the same out of the rent payable by him at Candlemas 1847, and having failed or refused to exhibit vouchers or receipts that he has expended the said sum, or any part thereof, in terms of the obligation in his tack, with the legal interest thereof, from the said term of Candlemas 1847, till payment, and with expenses."

Fortune's defence was, that it had been specially agreed between the parties subsequently to the date of the lease, that no vouchers were to be required until the end of the lease, or until the money had been fully expended, and that the money having been paid by the pursuer of his own accord, near ten years ago, on this understanding, he was not now entitled to ask repayment of it.

A proof having been allowed of this allegation, the whole evidence on each side consisted of that of the parties.

"Dods, the pursuer, deponed—When the defender came to Harehead to pay his rent at Candlemas 1847, he asked me to allow him the L.65. I said the work was not done. He said no; but that if I would allow him the money, he would begin and do it as soon as the Spring set in. On my promise, I allowed him to retain L.65 of his rent. The defender never spoke about being allowed till the end of his tack to produce his vouchers. I went with Swan to Barnside in 1849, and saw that the work was not done, except to the extent of perhaps L.5; and I told the defender that I would insist on his going on with it."

The substance of the defender's evidence was,—“The pursuer said that I was perfectly entitled to have the L.65; and he either gave me the money or desired me to retain it out of my rent; I cannot tell which. I think no one else was present. Pursuer gave me the money to put the houses in repair, keep them in repair, and leave them in repair. I said, that if he required vouchers at the end of my tack or sooner, if I had laid out the money, I would produce them. This conversation took place, I think, when I paid my Candlemas rent in 1847. I do not remember telling the pursuer that I would lay out all the money in the course of that Spring. In 1848 the pursuer and Mr Swan, the joiner, came to Barnside. I do not remember ber Swan asking me whether I had executed the repair for which I had been allowed the L.65. I paid no attention to Swan. He had no business with me. I have no vouchers to produce; and I have produced none to my landlord. The houses shew that I am keeping them in repair. I give the houses as vouchers for what I have done.”

Dods v.
Fortune.

The Sheriff-substitute (Wood) pronounced the following interlocutor:—
“ Finds that the pursuer allowed the defender, when he paid his Candlemas rent, in 1847, to retain L.65, to enable him to execute certain repairs, though the pursuer was not bound to allow this sum before the production of vouchers for its expenditure; that the defender has failed to prove that this was done under any arrangement by which vouchers were not to be demanded before the end of the tack, or before the work was completed; that the defender has produced no vouchers, and is not even now prepared to produce any, which affords a very fair presumption that the money has not been properly expended; that the defender has no right to retain the pursuer's money, without shewing that he has applied it to the purpose for which alone he was allowed to retain it: Therefore, Repels the defences, and decerns against the defender for the sum of L.65, with interest from the date of citation; reserving to him his right of requiring from the pursuer repayment of the said sum, or of any part thereof, when he can produce proper vouchers therefor: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses,” &c.

To this interlocutor the Sheriff-depute (Bell) adhered, except that he found “ the defender liable in payment of interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, from the term of Candlemas, till paid.”

A note of advocacy, presented by Fortune, was brought directly under the statute to the Inner-House, and supported on the ground that the interlocutor proceeded on the basis that the obligation in the lease as to the vouchers still subsisted, but that had been got rid of when the L.65 was paid. Therefore, the first conclusion failed, and the other conclusion amounted to condictio indibiti. Farther, the pursuer nowhere alleged that the money had not been expended, and if he did, the action should have concluded that the money should now be expended, or for damages.

For the landlord it was replied;—The substance of the obligation truly was that if the tenant saw it for his interest to spend a certain sum on the buildings, he should have a claim for repayment; and the fact that the landlord had out of kindness advanced the money, could not alter its nature. He was entitled to see that it was expended. He asked for vouchers as the ordinary mode of proof, but any other evidence would satisfy him; and if the defender had averred that the money had been expended, the litigation would have resolved into an enquiry as to the truth of that fact.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This appears to me a very clear case. A lease was entered into—new buildings were to be erected and repairs to be executed, and what sum the tenant was to be allowed for the fulfilment of this obligation was fixed by a decree-arbitral, but afterwards, as it might be difficult for the tenant to advance the money, the landlord allows him to retain it out of his rent. But for what purpose did he do this?—to lie in his pocket to the end of his lease? No; but, as the tenant himself has deponed, to put, and keep, and leave the house in repair. But this the tenant did not do, he did not repair the premises; and sometime afterwards the landlord goes with a tradesman to see whether the new buildings were completed and the others repaired—(the new house seems to have been mainly built, in the first instance, before the lease), but the tenant refused to have anything to do with this inspection. The landlord found some L.5 only had been expended, and still it was only after some years that he brought this action (the tenant having at this time had in his pocket the money he was allowed as a sum to put him in funds to make the repairs), and I think he has brought it in proper time. The lease having fixed the character of the obligation, he concludes first for the sum then stipulated for. Now, the defence is not—“ I have no

No. 60. vouchers, but I have spent the whole sum or more, and am prepared to prove it.”
 — Had that been the defence, the action would not have gone on as it has done.
 Jan. 15, 1857. Then the summons goes on to the other conclusion for repayment of the L.65, and Dods v. what is the defence?—that it had been agreed that no vouchers were to be required
 Fortune. till the end of the lease or until the money had been fully expended; and parties are allowed a proof, which amounts at the utmost to this, that expenditure was to be taken in lieu of vouchers, but the tenant does not say that the expenditure has taken place, except perhaps to a limited extent. The pursuer’s statement on his oath is quite distinct that he allowed this sum on the express promise that he should go on in Spring, and the defender does not truly deny that. I concur with the Sheriff, but we cannot adopt all his findings, and I am not indisposed now, at the tenant’s expense, to allow an investigation as to how far expenditure had been made—a course to which we are told the landlord does not object.

LORD MURRAY.—I entirely concur. The conduct of the landlord has been perfectly fair throughout. That of the tenant leaves a different impression.

LORD COWAN.—I think it material to observe how the parties stood under their original obligation. It was the landlord who was to complete the dwelling-house and repair the other buildings—the tenant being bound to perform certain cartages.
 But what the parties did was to enter into a submission on the subject, and the arbiters find L.65 to be a sufficient sum to execute all the landlord was bound to do—that he was to pay that sum to the tenant on his producing vouchers for its expenditure, and that the tenant was to leave the whole in good order. All this is embodied in the lease which was granted. The money was thus to be paid for expenditure that had been actually made. Then at Candlemas 1847 or 1848—it is not quite clear which—the tenant asks for the money, and the landlord has to consider whether it was to be paid or not, and objects, because the work had not been actually executed. We must assume that such was the fact, but on the tenant promising to begin in Spring, the landlord, when examined under the interlocutor allowing proof, says he allowed him to retain the L.65, and substantially the defender says the same thing. We must hold that the condition upon which this money was allowed was that it should be immediately expended. Yet the defender does not allege that this has ever been done. Hence, under the second conclusion of the libel, repayment of the L.65 is asked by the pursuer. The foundation of the claim is causa data causa non sequita; and it is entitled to regard, except to the extent of the sum of L.5, which the pursuer admitted had been expended in 1849.
 In these circumstances, although the original condition was to a certain extent departed from, I hold the pursuer to be right, and entitled to a judgment; but your Lordship has proposed an investigation, as to which, as the parties do not object, I shall say nothing, though I generally prefer disposing of cases as they come before us.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Advocate the cause: Recall the interlocutors complained of,—But, of new, find that the respondent allowed the tenant to retain the sum of L.65 shortly after the commencement of the lease, in order to complete a dwelling-house, and to execute other repairs, which, by the condition of the lease, the landlord was bound to repay, when executed by the tenant to the extent of the said sum: Find that the said sum was so given to the tenant for the express purpose of executing repairs in the ensuing Spring, or within reasonable time: Find, that after the lapse of several years, the landlord, who averred that the sum had not been expended, was well entitled to call for vouchers as the mode of establishing the fact of expenditure provided for in the lease:
 Find that the advocator did not in the process either produce vouchers of any kind, or aver the expenditure of any part of the said sum for the purposes for which it was given: Find that the landlord had admitted that to the extent of L.5 money had been expended some years ago,—But, find that to the extent of L.60 the landlord is entitled to have decree for repayment of the money advanced by him, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent from Candlemas 1847, and Find the respondent entitled to expenses hitherto incurred in this and the inferior court, and remit to the Auditor to tax and report, and decern: But, in respect that the advocator has averred at the bar for the first time that a considerable part of the said sum has been actually expended in the way and for the purposes required by the lease,—Allow him, of consent of the respondent, and at his own expense entirely, to prove to the satisfaction of the Court, by inspectors or otherwise, such outlay, before decree is pronounced for the same,” &c.

Process—Proof.—The prorogation of a commission for conjunct proof expired on a box-day in vacation. The pursuers' evidence alone had been then led, and appeals had been taken, and were undisposed of. At the meeting of the Court, the defender moved for a prorogation, which he obtained; and this having been renewed, without his having commenced his proof, circumduction was then granted. Held that, the commission having expired, the subsequent prorogation was incompetent; therefore interlocutor of circumduction recalled.

This was a declarator of right to a gable of a tenement; the pursuers alleging that the defender had made certain offensive erections on the gable, which were injurious to and encroachments upon the pursuers' property.

On 6th June 1856 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Before farther answer, and of consent, allows the pursuers a proof of the alleged encroachments upon their property, referred to in the 11th article of the pursuers' revised condescendence, and of the time when the same appear first to have been made; allows the defender a conjunct proof; grants diligence at both parties' instance against witnesses, and of consent, grants commission to the Judge Ordinary of the bounds at Cupar to take the said proof, to be reported within three weeks from this date; and farther, and of consent, authorises the commissioner to take down the proof according to the mode enjoined in the 10th section of the 16th & 17th Vict., cap. 80."

On 27th June his Lordship granted a prorogation for fourteen days; and again, on 11th July 1856, of consent, to the first box-day in the ensuing vacation, 16th October. By this time the pursuers' proof was closed, but the defender had not led his. On 6th November 1856 his Lordship, of consent, "prorogates the time for the defender reporting his proof for fourteen days." On 21st November, "of consent, farther prorogates the time for reporting his proof for fourteen days;" and, on 10th December, on the pursuers' motion (the defender not having even yet commenced his proof), "Circumduces the term for proving under the diligence granted on 6th June last, and appoints parties to be heard of new in the debate roll on the proof led, and remaining conclusions of the libel undisposed of."

The defender reclaimed, and prayed for a further prorogation, on the ground that the proof led by the pursuers in the Sheriff-court had occupied till the box-day, and was of a kind for which the defender was not prepared from any statements on record. Besides, there were appeals which were not yet disposed of, and, therefore, this interlocutor of circumduction was premature and incompetent.¹

The respondents pleaded;—That a party, to be reponed, must shew cause. The defender had got three prorogations from the box-day, being the 16th

No. 61. October, till 10th December, and had done nothing. There was no technical reason to compel the Court to recall this interlocutor.
Jan. 16, 1856. Livingstone. The reclaiming note merely contained the summons, the 11th article of the pursuers' condescendence, with the defender's answer, and the objections to the evidence under appeal.

The respondents waived all objections to it in point of form.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—There has been a miscarriage here. The commission expired on the box-day in October. It was limited to that date. Again, part of this proof is under appeal, and, until disposed of, it is impossible to know what the proof in chief is to be; and, therefore, whether the commission had expired or not, the defender was not bound to go on with his proof until he knew what the proof in chief was to be. His mistake was in asking the Court on its meeting for a prorogation; and the question is, whether that was a departure from the appeal? But, if not, then the time for the defender leading his proof had not commenced; so that there has been a miscarriage in more respects than one on both sides.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not see how the defender could have done anything between the 16th October and the meeting of the Court, for the commission was reported on the 16th October. That was its extreme limit. The next interlocutor should have been to renew the commission. I think we must recall this interlocutor.

LORD IVORY concurred.

LORD DEAS.—I wish it to be understood that in dealing with this reclaiming note I go entirely, as regards its competency, on the consent of the respondents to waive any objection to it. The record is not printed, nor even the interlocutor closing the record; and I am not prepared to say that this is an interlocutor by default for not implementing an order, in which view alone it could be said to be competent. Upon that question I give no opinion. Neither do I hold the recalling of this circumduction to be a decision upon any general question. No general question was decided in Hook's case, although the rubric erroneously bears so. In the present case I go entirely upon the irregularity of the previous interlocutors and procedure as not properly paving the way for an interlocutor of circumduction; and, but for such irregularity, I should have been disposed to adhere to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Certainly there is no such general rule as that laid down in the case of Hook.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In respect the respondent departs at the bar from any objection to the competency of the reclaiming note, and in respect of the irregularities in the proceedings, recall the interlocutor of the 10th December last: Repone the defender against the same, upon payment by the defender to the pursuer of the modified sum of L.6, 6s. sterling of expenses; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to renew the diligence and commission formerly granted to the defender for leading the proof allowed to him for such time as to his Lordship shall seem proper, and to proceed in the cause as shall be just."

Mrs Ann Livingstone or Fenton, sister of the late Sir Thomas Livingstone and the petitioner, presented separate petitions to the Sheriff of Chancery, each claiming to be served nearest and lawful heir of Sir Thomas, in the lands of Bedlormie and others. In these circumstances, and in order that the rents of the estate might be uplifted for the benefit of the party who should be preferred to the succession, an application was made to the Court for the appointment of a judicial factor; and, on 2d July 1853, Mr William Moncreiff, accountant, was appointed, with the usual powers. No. 62.

The petitions for service having been conjoined, and a proof allowed by the Sheriff of Chancery, Mrs Fenton advocated the cause to the Court of Session; and, after various procedure, the Court found the petitioner entitled to be served nearest and lawful heir of tailzie and provision in special to Sir Thomas Livingstone, his uncle. The petitioner was accordingly duly infeft and seised in the lands of Bedlormie and others. Mrs Fenton presented two appeals to the House of Lords, but having failed to enter into recognizances in the appeals within fourteen days, pursuant to the standing order of the House of Lords, the appeals were dismissed. Carron Co. v.

Others.

In these circumstances, the present application was made by the petitioner for recall of the judicial factor's appointment, and for warrant for an interim payment of the balances consigned by the factor in bank. The petitioner also prayed, that the factor should be appointed to lodge a continuation of his accounts in process; and after an examination of the same, that warrant should be granted for payment of the balance arising thereon; and thereafter, that the factor should be discharged and exonerated of his intrusions and management.

After a remit, the accountant reported favourably for the petitioner, but called the attention of the Lord Ordinary to the circumstance, that the petition for recall was not in name of the judicial factor, but of the successful claimant to the estate.¹

The Lord Ordinary reported the case.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court do not mean to lay down an absolute rule, that petitions for recall of the appointment of a judicial factor must be in name of the factor himself. The case of Williamson was a special one.

Exclusive privilege—Issues—Fraud—Statute 5 & 6 Vict. cap. 100.—Form of issues to try a question of fraudulent invasion of the copyright of a design registered in terms of the 5 & 6 Vict. cap. 100.

THE Carron Company brought this action against Ritchie, Watson, and Company, for L.500 of damages, for violation of their right as proprietors of a new and original design of a fire-grate, registered under the 5 & 6 Vict. cap. 100. Their allegation was,—“The defenders have, during the existence of this right, and at various times between the 1st day of March 1855, and the date of service of this summons, and at or near their Etna Foundry, in or near Glasgow, or at some other foundry or place in the United Kingdom to the pursuers unknown, pirated said design, or part of said design, and have applied said design, or part thereof, viz., the back of the said grate contained in said registered design, or part of said grate-back, or at least a fraudulent imitation of said design, or of said part thereof, for the purpose of sale, to the ornamenting of the backs of grates cast or manufactured by the defenders.” Jan. 17, 1857.

They proposed the following issues:—

“1. Whether the pursuers are the proprietors of the copyright of the design of a fire-grate, attached to the certificate of registration, dated 28th June 1854, and being No. 5 of process, and whether the defenders, in violation of the said copyright, at various times, between the 1st day of March 1855, and the 31st day of January 1856, did apply, or use, or cause or procure to be applied or used, the said design, or some part thereof, for the purpose of sale in the manufacture of the backs of fire-grates, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?

“ 2. Whether the defenders, in violation of the said copyright, at various times, between the 1st of March 1855, and the 31st of January 1856, did publish, expose for sale, and sell, or did cause, or procure to be published, exposed for sale, and sold, certain fire-grates to which said registered design, or part thereof, had been applied, in the knowledge that the pursuers' consent had not been given to such application?”

The defenders denied any piracy of design, and pleaded;—That the pursuers were bound to establish that the part of the design alleged to be copied was an essential part thereof, and the alleged copy thereby within the statutory category of a fraudulent imitation; and farther, that they were bound to establish the same to have been new and original. The mere imitation of a portion of the grate would not constitute a violation of the pursuers' right, everything else being different. There must be a particular specification of the breach complained of, for without it the defenders would be put to great disadvantage.¹

It was replied;—The question is, between a casual similarity and a fraudulent imitation. The allegation on which the action is rested is that the design has been pirated in regard to the backs of grates, and therefore the issue can alone apply to that, and to nothing else.²

The following issues were approved of:—

“ 1. Whether the pursuers are, in terms of the Act 5 & 6 Vict. cap. 100, proprietors of the design, of which No. 5 of process is the certificate of registration?

“ 2. Whether, between the 1st day of March 1855, and the 31st day of January 1856, the defenders did, in violation of the pursuers' copyright in said design, apply the said design, or a fraudulent imitation thereof, for the purpose of sale, to the ornamenting of the backs of fire-grates, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?

“ 3. Whether, during the time aforesaid, the defenders did, in violation of the pursuers' copyright in said design, publish, sell, or expose for sale, backs of fire-grates, to the ornamenting of which the said design, or a fraudulent imitation thereof, was applied, in the knowledge that the pursuers' consent, as proprietors of said design, had not been given to such application, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?”

In a petition for authority to sell a portion of an entailed estate (under the 25th section of the Act, 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36,) for payment of debts with which the fee of the estate was validly burdened, a minute was lodged for the petitioners, craving application of the price of the lands sold in the following manner:—1st, In payment of certain of the principal sums found to be debts with which the estate was validly charged; 2d, In payment of certain arrears of interest upon these debts, which had arisen between the date of the interlocutor finding the estate validly charged with the debts, and the date of the lands being sold, and which the rents of the lands sold had been insufficient to pay; and, 3d, In retaining a sum, being the remainder of the price, and the interest accruing thereon after the date of consignment, to meet expenses incurred in the application for authority to sell. An interlocutor, finding the estate validly charged with debt, had been pronounced on 15th July 1853; and a portion of the lands had been set apart and sold under authority of the Court, and the price consigned, upon 15th May 1856. The price obtained was insufficient to pay the whole debts.

Moncrieff v.
Edinburgh
and Glasgow
Railway Co.

The minute above mentioned was remitted in the usual course by the Lord Ordinary to Mr William Campbell, W.S., who presented a report in favour of the application of the price proposed by the petitioners, in so far as regarded the payment of principal sums, and the reservation of a portion of the price to meet expenses; but with regard to the payment of interests, he submitted the following queries:—“(1.) Whether it be competent for the Court to apply the prices of the lands sold in payment of arrears of interest of the debts? (2.) If this be competent, Whether the Court have a discretionary power to grant or withhold their sanction to such application? and (3.) If they have that power, Whether, in the present case, they ought to sanction the application of a part of the price in payment of the said interests?”

The Lord Ordinary reported the case, and the Court, on the 16th July 1856, approved of the application of the price as proposed in the minute, so far as regards the principal sums and sum retained to meet expenses, reserving for farther consideration the application of the remaining sum of L.1665, 5s. 10d., viz., the sum proposed to be applied in payment of arrears of interest.”

Of this date, the Court, after ascertaining from states lodged by the petitioner, that the rents of the lands sold during the period between the interlocutor of 15th July 1853, and the sale, had been inadequate to that extent to meet the interest of the debts charged upon the estate, pronounced the following interlocutor:—

“THE LORDS, with reference to the reservation contained in their interlocutor of 16th July 1856, and having resumed consideration of the minute No. 201 of process, and Mr Campbell’s report, dated 19th June 1856, with reference to the application of the remaining sum of L.1665, 5s. 10d., Approve of the application of said remaining sum, as proposed in said minute, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed in the cause.”

In his decree-arbital, the arbiter ordained the Railway Company to deposit the sum found due by him, with interest, in one of the chartered banks; and, thereafter, that the proprietors should grant to the Railway Company a valid and ample disposition of those portions of the estate required by the Railway Company. The money was deposited, but the conveyance was not executed, and the Railway Company completed their title under section 76 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, by notarial instrument, reciting the deed of agreement and submission, and decret-arbital or award; and reciting, also, the deposit, and the refusal or inability to convey the lands to the respondents,—which instrument was duly recorded in the General Register of Sasines at Edinburgh in 1851.

Irvine.

In these circumstances, this petition was presented by the judicial factor for authority to uplift the consigned money, and, under section 76 of the Act, to find the Railway Company liable in payment of the expenses.

The Railway Company opposed this application, so far as regarded the matter of expenses, and pleaded:—That under section 79 of the Act, they were not bound to pay any incidental expenses caused by the consignment. The decree-arbital not having been fulfilled by the proprietors of Springhill, the depositions could not be regarded as made under the decree. This expense was caused by their title not having been made up, and consequent inability to grant a conveyance.

Cook, for the petitioner;—The question is, whether the money was deposited in bank by reason of the failure on the part of the proprietors of Springhill to make up a title. But consignment must have been made, whether the title was made up or not.

LORD DEAS.—The arbiter orders consignment,—title or no title.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—The consignment was not made by reason of want of title. I have not the slightest doubt about granting the prayer of this petition.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD IVORY concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Grant the prayer of the petition, and grant warrant to the National Bank of Scotland to pay the said consigned sum of L.488, 10s. 8d., with the whole interest accruing thereon, to the petitioner, as judicial factor foresaid, and decern: Find the said Railway Company liable in the expenses prayed for in terms of the statute, and in expenses of process arising from their opposition, and remit, &c.

Process—Proof.—In an action of divorce, a conjunct probation was allowed, in the course of which the defender entered various appeals. The day after the proof was concluded the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor of circumduction, “in respect the counsel for the defender declines to be heard on his appeals.” The effect was to exclude certain witnesses. Circumduction recalled on the ground that the appeals had not been disposed of.

In the course of taking a conjunct proof in an action of divorce, the defender entered various appeals against decisions by the Sheriff-commissary. The proof was concluded late on the 19th December 1856, and on the 20th December, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—“In respect the counsel for the defender declines to be heard on his appeals, taken in the course of his proof, Circumduces the term for proving against the defender, without prejudice to the report being lodged on Tuesday next: And, on the pursuer’s motion, Allows her a proof, in reference to the evidence of the witnesses John Bethune, Andrew Carrick, and Peter Brown, examined for the defender, and against whom the pursuer protested for reprobator: Renews the remit to the Sheriff Commissaries, to be reported by the box-day in the ensuing Christmas recess.”

The defender reclaimed, and pleaded;—That the circumduction was premature, in respect his appeals were undisposed of. The effect would be to exclude the evidence of certain witnesses altogether.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It sometimes happens that where objections are taken to a witness or to a question, and a decision adverse to their admission is given, and an appeal follows, the evidence is taken pending such appeal. But here the witnesses are excluded altogether, and, the defender having appealed, I rather think that circumduction ought not to have been given till the appeals were disposed of.

Sarah Young, to the production and identification of a letter written and addressed by her to the defender, on the ground that the letter had been all along in the defender’s possession, and could not at that late stage be competently made a production. The pursuer maintained that, as a writing within the power of the defender, it required to be produced before the record was closed; and the Judicature Act, 1825, and the relative Act of Sederunt, were founded on as being conclusive against the competency of its being received and proved by the witness. The Lord Ordinary cannot so read the Act of Sederunt. He apprehends it applies to writings and documents founded on by the parties in the record, or on which they mean to found and use in support of their respective averments on record. The letter in question could have neither value nor relevancy as affecting the statements on record on either side. Its use and application arose only in the course of the proof as a piece of evidence to clear up dates spoken to by witnesses. The discovery of its importance was wholly accidental. It could not be of any value except from the course the proof took. It may be important to confirm or discredit certain of the evidence previously led. The Lord Ordinary, in order to dispose of the objection more satisfactorily, opened the sealed packet and examined the letter.”¹

Judicial factor.—In the Second Division, when the appointment of a curator bonis to minors, or a factor loco tutoris to pupils is craved, the Court appoint a curator ad litem to report as to the facts stated in the petition, and specially as to the amount of the estate, and fitness of the proposed curator or factor for the office.

Judicial factor.—A curator bonis appointed to minors puberes, and a factor loco tutoris to pupils.

Jan. 21, 1857. THIS was a petition presented by Mrs Carter, residing in Montrose, 2D DIVISION. I. widow of Thomas Carter, formerly merchant in London, with concurrence of her children, Mary and Anthony, who were above pupilarity, but under majority. Besides these two children, Mrs Carter had other two children who were in pupilarity. The petitioner stated that the children had become entitled to certain property, which it was necessary should be managed for their behoof. It was therefore prayed, that Mr Savage, writer in Montrose, should be appointed curator bonis to the two children who were beyond pupil-arity, and factor loco tutoris to the two children who were within pupilarity.

At the moving of the petition, a curator ad litem was appointed to investigate the statements in the petition, and, in particular, as to the amount of the estate, and the propriety of appointing the gentleman suggested as factor. Having giving in his report to the effect that the statements as to the estate were correct, and that the proposed factor was a person of respecatbility and fitness for the office, the case was again moved yesterday.

LORD COWAN.—In this case we have now a report from the curator ad litem, who was appointed to report, according to the practice of this Division, when petitions of this kind are presented to us, and it is in every way satisfactory; but there is a peculiarity in this case which deserves notice. The petition prays for the appointment of a curator bonis to persons above pupilarity who can choose curators for themselves. I have observed that, in the other Division, they have refused to appoint a curator bonis to minors puberes; and it is a matter for consideration whether we should follow that course also.

LORD MURRAY.—As the Lord Justice-Clerk, who has paid great attention to this branch of the law, is absent to-day, I would suggest that the matter be delayed

No. 69. JANE M. JOHNSTONE WILSON, Petitioner.—Fraser.

Judicial factor—Minor—Tutor-dative.—Two clergymen appointed tutors-dative to a pupil heir-at-law, and another clergyman appointed tutor-dative to other pupils, being the younger children, under the Act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 96, sec. 19.

THIS was the first application to the Court under the Statute 19 & 20 No. 69.
 Vict. c. 96, sec. 19, transferring to the Court of Session the duties incumbent on the Court of Exchequer, with regard to the appointment of tutors-dative. The petitioner—the widow of the late Mr Johnstone Wilson of Croglin and Stroquhan,—prayed for the appointment of tutors-dative to her five children (all in pupilarity). The petitioner stated :—“ The two brothers of the petitioner’s deceased husband are, the Rev. M. S. Johnstone, minister of Minigaff, and the Rev. T. Johnstone, minister of Anworth. The petitioner’s own brother is the Rev. G. Colville, minister of Canonbie. These persons, who are all above 25 years of age, are the nearest relations of the pupils except the petitioner herself, and are willing to undertake the office of guardians to them. No one of them, however, is willing to undertake the office of factor loco tutoris, with all the responsibility and labour of management upon himself alone ; but they are willing, if joined together, to act as guardians for the petitioner’s children. They are persons in whom the petitioner has every confidence, and whom it is very desirable to obtain as guardians for her children ; and she trusts that she may obtain the sanction of the Court to that to which alone they will consent—their joint appointment.”

 I.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We must follow here our usual course of appointing a curator ad litem to report upon this petition, and as to whether the proposed tutors are suitable for the office, and the amount and nature of the estate to be administered. The petition also suggests to my mind the propriety of intimating it to the officers for the Crown, as it is part of the Crown’s prerogative to nominate tutors-dative.

The petition was accordingly intimated to the Lord Advocate, and the Solicitor-General attended on his Lordship’s behalf, and stated that he had no objection to the petition being granted.

A report was also given in by the curator ad litem who had been appointed, in which he stated that the gentlemen proposed were in every way fit for the office, but he recommended that they should not be appointed jointly to all the children. The estate consisted of heritage and moveables, the former of which the eldest son succeeded as heir-at-law, while the younger children succeeded to the personal estate. In these circumstances, the children might have conflicting interests, and the curator therefore suggested that they should have separate guardians.

To this proposal the petitioner acceded, and

THE COURT made the appointment in the following terms ;—“ Nominate and appoint the Rev. Michael Stewart Johnstone and the Rev.
 George Colville, and the survivor of them, to be tutors and tutordative to Thomas Johnstone Wilson ; and nominate and appoint the Rev. Thomas Johnstone to be tutor-dative to the petitioner’s other children, with the usual powers, they finding caution before extract.”

relative to the conduct of the trust, of which the defender Thomson was factor. These disputes had led to the litigation reported ante, vol. xvii. p. 835, the proceedings in which were here narrated, and the medical certificate obtained in the course of it was quoted. It was dated in 1855, and was to the effect that it appeared to the medical men that Mr Pridie "has laboured for a considerable time under a nervous affection of the heart, and that this has been aggravated by the circumstances in which he has been placed by Dick's trust, of which he is a trustee."

The pursuer now alleged;—The circumstances referred to in said report as having aggravated, or rather caused the disease, was the conduct of the defenders, as trustees in said trust. In the year 1848 the pursuer was free from illness. In that year, however, the defenders began their improper proceedings in reference to the trust-management, by which the pursuer was entirely deprived of all control thereof, or any management whatever as trustee, while the defenders insisted that he should be held responsible qua trustee. These improper, irregular, and unwarrantable proceedings of the defenders produced in the pursuer such agitation and distress, as ultimately were productive of nervous affection of the heart, under which, since 1848, he has been and is still labouring.

Prior to 1848, the pursuer, from his business, averaged, during ten years, L.200 per annum. Owing, however, to the state of bodily health to which the pursuer was reduced by the unwarrantable conduct of the defenders, he became unable to attend to business. The result was that his practice altogether disappeared.

In these circumstances, he brought this action, concluding for damages for loss of business from the year 1848, and for prospective loss of business, and the expenses he had been put to.

The defenders pleaded;—1. That the grounds of action were irrelevant. 2. That they were unfounded in point of fact.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has not set forth relevant grounds to support the conclusions of this action of damages: Therefore sustains the first plea in law stated for the defenders: Dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses." *

* "NOTE.—The injury to the pursuer's health, and the consequent loss of his business, in respect of which damages are sought, are not so directly connected with any wrongful act alleged against the defenders as to sustain this action.

"The pursuer's anxiety in regard to the affairs of the trust, and his desire to bear his part in the management of its business, appear to have sprung from the best motives; and it is much to be regretted that his health and professional interests have suffered. But an action of reparation for consequential damage, resting on such grounds as are here condescended on, is without precedent, and cannot be sustained.

"No question is here raised in regard to the interests of the trust, which are now committed to the charge of Mr Raleigh, the judicial factor. The pursuer has been relieved by the Court of the duties and office of trustee, and has been discharged from responsibility. No pecuniary loss or liability of any kind to the pursuer, directly flowing from the acts of the defenders, has been condescended on; and all risk on that head was removed by the interlocutor of Court. Apart from pecuniary loss, there is no averment of injury and damage directly caused by the acts of the defenders; and where the alleged injury is remote and consequential, there is no relevant ground for an action of damages.—(Starkie on Law of Evidence, vol. ii. p. 299; Powell v. Salisbury, 2 Y. & J. p. 390; Walton v. Fothergill, 7 C. & P. p. 392.) The rule recognised by these and many other authorities in the law of England, has been received and applied by this Court—(Ersk. B. 3, T. 3, sect. 84; Dunlop v. M'Kellar, 31st May 1815, F.C.; Scoular and Brownlee v. Robertson, 19th January 1829; Snare v. Lord Fife's Trustees, 17th January 1852) and must be considered as settled."

No. 70.

Jan. 22, 1857.
Pridie v. Dick.

The pursuer reclaimed. The question came to be, was this consequential damage? It was contended that Stair, 1, ix. 4, and Sedgwick, in his Law of Damages, p. 95, both stated the law in such a way as to cover the present case; and farther, that, in the case of Snare, it had been settled that he was entitled not only to claim as damages the loss of his profit by exhibiting his picture here, but also damages for injury to his character as a bookseller in Reading, arising from the charge of theft brought against him by the Fife Trustees. Here the first duty of the trustees was to consult all the members of the trust, and not to exclude one of them; to do which was just as illegal an act as to commit an assault. Suppose the consequence of the pursuer's extrusion had been loss of funds for which he had been made liable, surely an action would have lain at his instance against his co-trustees. Were the defenders to be relieved of the consequences of their clearly wrong acts because they led, instead of that result, to the injury of the pursuer's health, if the pursuer should be able, as at this stage it must be assumed he would be, to connect his loss of business with that fact?

The defenders' counsel were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking the pursuer has not set forth a relevant ground of damage. That he was excluded from the trust should rather have proved a relief, and given him more time for his other business, but his fear of loss, and his sensitiveness, produced irritability and aggravated heart complaint, so rendering him unfit for business. But it is not alleged that the trustees knew of his heart complaint and designedly irritated him; and was it ever known that a trustee who was opposed by his co-trustees, and, being irritable, was so worried that he could not attend to his business, was entitled to have a claim of damages sent to a jury? I dare say Mr Pridie had many unreasonable clients who made unfounded complaints against him which might irritate him in the same way. Is he to have an action of damages against each of them? It is a pity a man should be in a profession for which he has not nerves; but, were this action sustained, every person he did business with would be liable to an action of damages at his instance. I must say this is, as Lord Murray observed, a most fantastic and nonsensical action.

LORD MURRAY.—This is one of the most entertaining actions I have ever known come into Court, and I was most anxious to hear all that could be said in support of it. It is at the instance of "Our lovite" P. H. Pridie, who complains of being opposed at every turn by his co-trustees, and so, as he had heart complaint, being irritated and having his disease increased. Now it is too strong to suppose that he was always in the right, and his co-trustees always in the wrong. But, at this stage, we must assume it; and even then, surely, the entire conduct of parties is not to be regulated by the condition of health of a co-trustee, about which they may know nothing. Why, if this action be relevant, if a trustee had heart complaint and a co-trustee made a humorous remark, which so excited him that he died, his representatives would have an action of assythment. On such terms no business of any kind could be carried on. No trustee could do anything, being bound not to injure a co-trustee labouring under some unknown disease. He could not oppose his views in any way which could annoy or irritate him. It shews the pitch of refinement we have arrived at in our pleadings when such an action as this can be even thought of.

LORD COWAN.—I also am clear that, on the relevancy, the pursuer has no case. Had the only question been whether the damage was consequential, there would have been more room for discussion. Houldsworth v. British Linen Company (19th December 1850) was a case where that point was gone into.

But the question here is, is any legal ground of damages set forth? The pursuer does not say that the acts of the defenders led to damage to the trust-estate for which he has been made liable, but that the acts, it may be legal, were carried on with contumely to him, and thus irritated him and increased his heart complaint. I never heard of such an action.

THE COURT adhered, and found the pursuer liable in additional expenses.

DAVID WALKER, Defender and Respondent.—Penney—Fraser.

Proof—Succession—Legitimacy.—A person born before the marriage of his mother held proved to be the son of the man whom she married after the birth, although the mother, after her husband's death and at an advanced age, emitted a declaration of his illegitimacy.

Process—Service—Statute 10 & 11 Vict. cap. 47 (Service of Heirs Act)—Judicature Act, sec. 40.—When the Sheriff's judgment in competing claims for service is adhered to by the Court of Session, but not the grounds on which that judgment proceeds, the proper course is to advocate the cause, pronounce special findings, and remit to the Sheriff with instructions.

1st Division.

Ld. Benholme.

C.
Sheriff-substitute of Renfrewshire.

IN a competition before the Sheriff of Renfrewshire for service to the deceased David Walker, the legitimacy of one of the claimants, David Walker, the reputed son of the deceased, was disputed, and after proof, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor, containing findings in point of fact, which he held established the legitimacy of David Walker, whose claim accordingly he preferred. The competing claimant William Walker advocated the cause. The proof was conflicting—many of the witnesses being old persons called to speak to things that happened in the beginning of this century. Admittedly, the claimant David Walker was born before his mother's marriage in 1803; but before his baptism, his mother married the deceased David Walker, who acknowledged the child to be his, and presented him to be baptised. Thereafter, the claimant David Walker lived in family with the deceased and his mother, and it was established that from his birth down till 1853, there had been acknowledgments of his status as legitimate by both his mother and reputed father, and that on his reputed father's death in 1831, he had succeeded to a lease of a farm, and thereafter executed a renunciation as eldest son. On the other hand, his mother at an advanced age emitted a declaration, in which she stated that he was illegitimate, and was the son, not of David Walker, but of a person of the name of David Gray. At that time, however, she was not only old, but feeble, and of deteriorated habits as respected her sobriety, and was living with and under the influence of her younger son, who—on David Walker's refusal to agree to a proposal to collate the whole of his father's heritable estate with the other members of the family—sided against David Walker, and challenged his paternity. A medical man, clergyman, and law-agent, all of them in her confidence, stated that they then heard her statements of her son's illegitimacy for the first time. It was not proved that David Walker's reputed father was not or could not be his father. In these circumstances, the Court held the status of legitimacy to be established, arriving at the same result with the Sheriff-substitute.

A question then arose as to the proper form of the interlocutor, in respect that although the Court arrived at the same result with the Sheriff, they did so upon different grounds—the point being, whether it was necessary or competent to advocate the cause, to pronounce separate findings, and, at the sametime, to remit to the Sheriff with instructions.

The Service of Heirs Act, 10 & 11 Vict. cap. 47, under which the present competition arose, provides that the judgment of the Sheriff, on a petition for service, shall be equivalent to and have the full legal effect of the verdict of the jury under the brieve of inquest according to the former law and practice; and sects. 12 & 13 provide, that the petition and judgment being transmitted to the office of the Director of Chancery, the extract decree shall be equivalent to an extract retour. On the other hand, the Judicature Act, sect. 40, provides that the Court of Session shall, in reviewing the judgment of the inferior Court's proceeding on proof, distinctly specify in their interlocutor the several facts material to the case which they find to be established by the proof, and express how far their judgment proceeds on the matter of fact so found, or on matter of law, and the several points of law which they mean to decide. The question therefore was, whether the findings in fact by this Court were not final, and whether it was competent to advocate the cause and pronounce such findings, and at sametime remit to the Sheriff, whose judgment the Service Act provides for being transmitted to Chancery as the judgment in the cause.

No. 71.

Jan. 23, 1857.

Walker v.
Walker.

D. F. Inglis.—Without a final judgment from the Sheriff, there is not wherewith to go to Chancery. There is nothing in the Service Act to withdraw it from the operation of section 40 of the Judicature Act, and there is neither inconsistency nor incompetency in finding in point of fact the true grounds on which the petitioner should be served, and remitting to the Sheriff to serve him on these grounds.

Penney.—The findings in an advocacy become the judgment of this Court, which cannot be retoured, and, therefore, there is no judgment of service.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I confess I have difficulty in seeing in the statute any machinery whereby the process of service can get from the Court of Session into the Office of Chancery, except through the Sheriff.

The Court made avizandum. At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a matter of some nicety. The service statute does not give any clear direction as to this point. Some things, however, are very clear. In the first place, that the jurisdiction of the Sheriff is specially recognised as extending to petitions for service, and that where there is no advocacy he pronounces a judgment serving the petitioner, which judgment is transmitted to Chancery, and is the thing which is afterwards extracted and becomes the service. Now the statute authorises advocacy of cases either before judgment or afterwards. They may be transferred to this Court to be decided by jury. If the case comes into Court on the ground that the Sheriff has refused to serve the party, then the course adopted is not that this Court, in altering the judgment, shall serve the claimant, but shall remit to the Sheriff to pronounce decree of service, following out the view that his judgment is the service. Then, again, if the case is brought here in a competition, and we think that the Sheriff has preferred the wrong claimant, we alter his judgment, and remit to him to pronounce decree of service in favour of the right person. There, again, it is his decree that is the service. If the case is advocated before proof, we send the case to a jury. If the jury return a verdict, we apply the verdict, but there again we remit to the Sheriff to pronounce decree, which is the service. Therefore, in every stage, it is the decree of the Sheriff which is the decree in the case. The question is, whether we can competently advocate the case, and pronounce separate findings of fact, and also remit to the Sheriff to pronounce decree in the case. We think we may; because if we are to displace the findings of the Sheriff, we must have the case before us in a way in which we can displace it. We must have it under our own jurisdiction, and then we can remit, just as if it were here for a jury trial: We can remit to the Sheriff with instructions. Therefore, being of opinion that the findings of the Sheriff in this case are not such as ought to be in the title of the party; that they are not proper elements for leading to the conclusion at which we have arrived; we think it right to displace them. We think it right also to state our own grounds of judgment, and we shall therefore pronounce a judgment in accordance with these views.

Then, again, the question has been raised, whether we can here pronounce findings which shall be final under the statute in the case of proof? That is not a matter we require to dispose of. It is not our province to determine it at present, at all events. But this we ought to do: We see no reason, in any case proceeding on proof, why we should not, if so disposed, state the grounds on which we arrive at our conclusions in regard to the proof; and farther, it is our duty to take care that there shall not be in any event a miscarriage of the case by reason of our having failed to state these reasons, if the case shall be carried elsewhere, and therefore we shall pronounce the findings, which, we think, ought to be the grounds of the judgment in this case. The statute lays the ground for such a proceeding

No. 71. in a case of this kind. Perhaps it may not be incompetent to deal with it in another way. But we think this form is competent.

Jan. 23, 1857.
Walker v.
Walker.

LORD DEAS observed that it must not be understood that by the course followed here the Court recognised the competency of remitting to the Sheriff after advocating in ordinary causes. It was solely by force of the statute, and because there seemed to be no other way of complying with its terms, that this was done here.

LORD PRESIDENT assented.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Advocate the cause; Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff: Find it established, as matter of fact—1st, That in the end of April, or beginning of May 1804, at Shuna, the late Isabella M'Millan or Walker being then unmarried, gave birth to the claimant David Walker: 2d, That at the time of the birth, she ascribed the paternity to David Walker, now deceased, who, before that date, had gone to the Island of Skye, and was then employed in that island: 3d, That in or about the year 1805, the said Isabella M'Millan went to Skye, taking along with her the said claimant, then a child in arms, and was there married to the said David Walker, now deceased: 4th, That in Skye, soon after the marriage, the said deceased David Walker presented and held up the said claimant for baptism as his son, and he was accordingly baptised as such, and that the deceased, both before and after the marriage, acknowledged the said claimant to be his child, and recognised him as his eldest son: 5th, That the said claimant was brought up and treated as the eldest child of the family, bore the name of David Walker, and was held out to the world, and generally understood and believed by the friends and acquaintances of the family, and persons dealing with the deceased, to be his eldest son, and continued to be so recognised during the life of the said deceased: 6th, That after the death of the said deceased, which took place in September 1831, the said claimant, as eldest son and heir of the said deceased, possessed and occupied as tenant the farm of Netherton, in virtue of an unexpired lease thereof which had been granted in favour of the said deceased until the year 1838, when the said claimant, in his said capacity as eldest son and heir of the deceased, executed a renunciation of the said lease in favour of the landlord: 7th, That subsequent to 1838, the said claimant continued to be recognised, as well by the members of the family as by others who knew him and them, as possessing the status of a lawful son of the said deceased, and as being his eldest son and heir, and the right of the claimant to that character was not questioned till about the year 1851, when disputes arose between him and other members of the family in regard to money matters: Find it not proved that the said claimant was the son of David Gray, as alleged by the other claimants, or that he was the son of any person other than David Walker deceased, or that the said deceased could not be or was not the father of the said claimant: Find, in point of law, that in these circumstances the claimant David Walker must be held to be the eldest son of the said deceased David Walker by Isabella M'Millan, legitimated per subsequens matrimonium of his parents, and was entitled to be preferred in the competition before the Sheriff, and to be served as nearest and lawful heir in general to the said deceased: Therefore, repel the claim of the other claimant William Walker, and refuse the petition for him; sustain and prefer the claim of the said David Walker, and remit to the Sheriff with instructions to pronounce a decree serving the said David Walker nearest and lawful heir in general to the deceased David Walker, in terms of the statute 10th & 11th of Victoria, cap. 47: Find the claimant David Walker entitled to his expenses incurred in this Court," &c.

MRS JEAN FULTON OR BALDERSTON AND HUSBAND, Pursuers.—Pyper—Fraser.

No. 72.

WILLIAM FULTON, Defender.—D. F. Inglis—Young.

Jan. 23, 1857.
Balderston v.
Fulton.

Liferent and Fee—Vesting—Expiry of Trust.—A truster conveyed his estate to trustees, for payment of the annual income to his widow, and, after her decease, to his daughter—an only child—during her lifetime, but exclusive of the jus mariti, which provision was declared to be in full of all her legal claims: And he directed his trustees to make over the trust-estate to “his own nearest heirs,” after the death of the longest liver of himself, his wife, and daughter. After the truster’s death, the daughter claimed and obtained legitim, with consent of the widow, out of the capital of the estate—the deficiency of income to the widow thereby occasioned being also made good out of the capital of the estate. After the widow’s death, in an action at the instance of the daughter and her husband, for declarator that the fee belonged to her, and that the trustees should be decerned to convey the whole estate to her and her husband—Held, (altering judgment of Lord Neaves), (1), that the fee of the estate was vested in the daughter; But (2), that the trust was nevertheless to be kept up, and the fee or capital of the estate to be retained by the trustees during the daughter’s lifetime, in order to secure her in the liferent exclusive of the jus mariti.

The trustees had suspended the daughter’s liferent interest, with the view of restoring the capital to its original amount before her legitim had been paid out of it, in the view that it might ultimately appear that the truster’s own nearest heirs, at the termination of the trust, were entitled to the fee. But it having been decided that the fee actually vested in her, they declined to resist her farther claims. In respect of which declinature, Held that she was entitled to payment, exclusive of the jus mariti, of the free annual proceeds from and after the death of her mother.

THE late Mr James Fulton conveyed to trustees his whole property, first, for payment of his debts; second, for payment to his wife, during her lifetime, in the event of her surviving him, of the free annual income. The third purpose was as follows:—“For payment to Jean Fulton, my daughter, wife of Robert Glas Balderston, during all the days and years of her lifetime, after the decease of the longest liver of me and the said Sarah Gardiner or Fulton, of the whole free annual income, rents, or profits of the estate and effects, heritable and moveable, above conveyed to my said trustees, and which provision in favour of the said Jean Fulton or Balderston is hereby declared to be in full of all bairns’ part of gear, legitim, portion natural, executry, and others, which she can claim through my death, or the death of the said Sarah Gardiner or Fulton,—Declaring hereby that the said free annual income, rents, and profits of my said estate and effects, shall be payable by my said trustees and their foresaids, to the said Jean Fulton or Balderston, exclusive of the jus mariti, or right of administration of the said Robert Glas Balderston, or any other husband she may hereafter marry; and that the receipts for the same to be granted by the said Jean Fulton or Balderston alone, shall, without the consent of such husband, be good and effectual discharges for the said free annual rents or profits, or so much thereof as shall therein be expressed to be received,—And declaring that the provision hereby made in favour of the said Jean Fulton or Balderston shall not be affectable by her husband’s debts or deeds, legal or voluntary, nor by the diligence of his creditors, the same being hereby expressly excluded and debarred.”

The fourth purpose of the trust was as follows:—“For making over to my own nearest heirs, or to any person or persons to whom I shall destine the same, by any writing to be hereafter executed by me, the whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable, above conveyed to my said trustees, after the death of the longest liver of me and the said Sarah Gardiner or Fulton, my wife, and the said Jean Fulton or Balderston, my daughter.”

The trust deed then provided for the management of the trust, with a reservation of the truster's liferent and power to alter or revoke, "and also reserving to the said Sarah Gardiner or Fulton, full power, liberty, and authority from me, in the event of her surviving me, and without the consent of my said trustees, by any deed to be executed by her, and to take effect after her death, to destine and convey the whole estate, heritable and moveable, above conveyed in trust, in such way and manner as she shall think fit."

Mr Fulton died on 14th February 1850, without having altered or revoked the trust-settlement; and without leaving any deed affecting it. He was survived by a widow and daughter, Mrs Jean Fulton or Balderston. The parties named trustees and executors accepted of office. The widow also accepted of the testamentary provision in her favour.

In 1840, Miss Jean Fulton had married Mr Robert Glas Balderston. No contract was executed between them. After Mr Fulton's death, Mr and Mrs Balderston repudiated the liferent provision in favour of Mrs Balderston, contained in the third purpose of the trust; and, by arrangement with the trustees and executors, with the consent of the widow, L.2000 was paid them as the value of the legitim, and a discharge executed therefor. Mrs Fulton was a consenting party, and subscribed the discharge.

By that discharge it was provided that, in the event of Mr and Mrs Balderston acquiring an interest in the trust-estate by the truster's widow dying intestate, survived by Mrs Balderston, and the fourth purpose of the trust coming into operation, Mr and Mrs Balderston thereby discharged all claim competent to them against the trustees by reason of any diminution of the trust-funds caused by the payment to the widow, Mrs Fulton, of an annual sum from the trust-funds equal to the free annual proceeds of the whole estate, undiminished by the L.2000 then paid to Mr and Mrs Balderston.

On 5th January 1854 Mrs Fulton died, without having exercised the power of testing reserved to her by the trust-settlement. This action was then raised by Mr and Mrs Balderston against the trustees, to have it declared that the fee of the estate, both heritable and moveable, vested in the pursuer, Mrs Jean Fulton or Balderston, as her father's only nearest heir, subject only to the special provisions of the trust-settlement, and that whether the same be regarded as testate or intestate succession;—And further, that, all the special purposes of the trust-disposition and settlement having now been fulfilled or superseded, the trustees were bound instantly to convey to the pursuers the whole subjects, heritable and moveable, held by them;—Or otherwise, and in the event of its being held that the pursuers were not entitled to such immediate conveyance and payment, then to have it declared that the trust subsisted only to the effect of securing the pursuer, Mrs Balderston, in the alimentary provision of the income of the trust-estate during her lifetime, the fee thereof being now vested in her, subject to her deeds, and transmissible to her representatives at her death,—and that the trustees should be ordained to make payment to Mrs Fulton or Balderston of the free annual income of the residue of the estate during her life from and since the death of her mother, Mrs Sarah Gardiner or Fulton.

They pleaded;—That the destination in Mr Fulton's trust-deed in favour of his nearest heirs having been purified from the contingency of any subsequent destination by himself, or by his widow after his death, the pursuer, Jean Fulton, his only child, was entitled to the fee of the estate, as having vested in her under that destination at her father's death.

The trustees pleaded;—(1,) Having regard to the terms of the trust-deed under which they act, they were bound to keep up the trust during the lifetime of the pursuer, Mrs Balderston; and, upon her death, to make over the trust-estate, as it should then exist, to the nearest heirs of the truster. (2.) The provision in favour of the nearest heirs of the truster, by the fourth purpose of the trust, was a provision in favour of those who should be the truster's nearest heirs at the termination of the trust,—upon the death of the longest liver of himself, his wife, and daughter. (3.) The pursuers' claim to legitim having been satisfied and discharged, the whole trust-estate now fell absolutely under the provisions of the trust-settlement, and the estate could not be claimed by Mrs Balderston as the truster's heir or representative, or by her husband, as in her right, without giving effect to the settlement, including the provision whereby the estate was vested in the defenders during her lifetime, as trustees for the purpose of providing the liferent to her, to the exclusion of the jus mariti and right of administration of her present husband, and any other husband she might hereafter marry. (4.) Assuming the fee of the estate to be now vested in Mrs Balderston, the annual income thereof, during her lifetime, had been validly put under trust for her behoof, to the exclusion of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband, and so as not to be affectable by his debts or deeds.

Balderston v.
Fulton.

The Lord Ordinary, on 31st January 1850, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the first, second, and third pleas in law for the defenders, assoilzies them from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: But without prejudice to any right which the pursuers may now or afterwards assert to the annual income or interest of the trust-estate of her late father for her lifetime under the trust-deed libelled, consistently with her claim to legitim already settled between the parties: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—It is a general rule of law, that when a right of succession is conferred by a testator on parties called not as individuals, but by description or character, the party entitled to succeed is the person answering the description, or holding the character when the succession opens or takes effect. The rule, it is thought, applies to a provision or destination to a testator's own nearest 'heirs,' which would mean the parties possessing that character, not necessarily at his death, but at the time when the provision or destination comes into operation, whenever that might be.

"In this case, the late Mr Fulton left his whole property to trustees for certain purposes. After payment of debts, the annual income was to be paid to his widow during her lifetime. Then, after the widow's death, it was to be paid to his only child, Mrs Balderston, excluding the jus mariti of her husband, and this provision was declared to be in full of legitim and executry. 'And in the fourth place, for making over to my own nearest heirs, or to any person or persons to whom I shall destine the same by any writing to be hereafter executed by me, the whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable, above conveyed to my said trustees, after the death of the longest liver of me and the said Sarah Gardiner or Fulton, my wife, and the said Jean Fulton or Balderston, my daughter.

"The question is, What is meant by the term in this fourth purpose, 'my own nearest heirs?' The pursuers say it means Mrs Balderston herself, as her father's heir. The defenders, that it means the parties who, at her death, shall hold that character.

"In the circumstances of the case, the pursuers seem to have an interest to try this question, and they have brought the present action for the purpose, but the Lord Ordinary thinks that their claims are not well founded.

"This is a case not of intestate but of testate succession, and it must be decided according to what may appear to be the true intention of the testator.

"The Lord Ordinary does not think that the testator, when leaving a mere liferent to his only child, and then directing his trustees, after her death, to convey his estate to his own nearest heirs, can have intended that his daughter should previously have the fee. He certainly does not say so, and it does not seem to be implied. The fee is only disposed of by a direction to convey, and that conveyance could never be made to his daughter, for it was not to be made till after her

Fulton.

The pursuers reclaimed. They lodged a minute, by which they passed from the summons in so far as it concluded that the defenders should be ordained to convey to them the whole trust-estate, unless the succession to the same should be held to be intestate, adhering to the summons quoad ultra.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—Under the conclusions of this summons, three questions arise—1, Whether the right to the fee of the trust-funds, subject to the special provisions of the trust, vested in Mrs Balderston on the death of her father and mother? 2, Whether she and her husband are entitled, in existing circumstances, to immediate payment of the capital? And, 3, If they are, whether they are entitled to payment of the annual income during the lifetime of Mrs Balderston?

I. The first question depends entirely on the true meaning and construction of the trust-settlement itself. The intention of the truster cannot be ascertained by the transaction which took place after his death between his trustees and his widow and his daughter and her husband.

As the trust-settlement of Mr Fulton was a universal disposition, by which he denuded himself of everything that might belong to him at the time of his death, and vested it in trustees, nothing was left in his hæreditas jacens. Hence no party could render available any right in his succession, otherways than by a claim on the trustees. This is clear as to the provisions created by the trust-deed itself. And even if any part of the trust-estate had not been thereby provided to third parties, such portion of the trust-estate, although the right thereof would have belonged to the truster's legal representative, could not have been rendered available by such representative by service or confirmation as heir or executor to him, or otherways than by a claim on the trustees to whom the universal hæreditas was conveyed.

The first provision in the trust-deed is the usual one as to debts and funeral expenses. The second is a provision in favour of the truster's widow, in the event of her surviving him, of the annual income of the estate during her survivorship. The truster declares that provision to be in full of all her legal rights.

By the third purpose, the trustees are directed, after the death of the survivor of death. The provision, therefore, seems to mean that the conveyance is to be made, and the fee conveyed to the parties, who, after the daughter's death, may then stand in the relation of the testator's heirs. It would otherwise mean, in reality, that the conveyance is to be to the daughter's assignees or representatives, which seems to do violence to the testator's words, where, as here, the daughter's predecease is not a mere casualty in the case, but a contemplated and necessary condition precedent to any conveyance in fee.

“These views seemed confirmed by other considerations. 1. A power to name the residuary disponent was not merely reserved to the truster but conferred on the widow, which necessarily suspended and excluded any right of succession, at least till the widow's death. It cannot, therefore, be said that the fee vested anywhere by the deed a morte testatoris. 2. The declaration that Mrs Balderston's provision of liferent was in full of all legal claims, and of executry, indicates an intention to exclude any further prospect of succession on her part, and renders it unlikely that the testator should have intended to give her a sole and absolute fee concurrently with her own limited liferent.

“Several cases have been referred to in argument, but none seem so closely to resemble the present as to form a ruling precedent. The case of Maxwell v. Wylie, 25th May 1837, 15 Shaw, 1005, comes the nearest to it of any that the pursuers have cited, but there the terms used, and history of the deeds, were different, and the Court had only to reconcile a total liferent with a partial right of fee; a liferent given to three unmarried sisters, with a fee divided among six sisters, married and unmarried. Such an arrangement is sufficiently natural and intelligible, but it is materially different from what is here supposed by the pursuer's argument. In consequence of the pursuers sometime ago claiming and receiving payment of a sum of legitim, her liferent interest was, in the meantime, suspended. But it seems not to have been held as finally extinguished, and any claim on this footing has been reserved.”

Mr Fulton or his widow, to pay the annual income of his estate to his daughter. That provision is qualified with two conditions—1, that it is in full of legitim; and 2, that it is to be free from and exclusive of not only the jus mariti, but also the legal right of administration, of her husband. These two purposes of the trust, which were intended to provide for the testator's widow and only child during their lifetimes, appear to be the only ones, as to which he had then made up his mind. There were no other individuals for whom he made any special provision.

By the fourth purpose, the trustees are expressly directed to retain the possession and administration of the estate, and keep it vested in their own persons during the lifetime of the truster's wife and daughter, or the survivor of them, and to denude of the fee or capital thereof, after the death of both of these ladies, in favour either of the truster's nearest heir, or of any other party to whom he should have destined the same. Mr Fulton died on the 14th February 1850, without having made any such destination of the residue. He was survived by both widow and daughter. The widow survived for about four years, without having exercised a faculty, which the settlement conferred on her, of disposing of the estate; and from 1854, the fee or capital of the trust-estate could not be claimed from the trustees by any party whatever, except the truster's heir.

From that time, and indeed from the time of the truster's death, the party in the position of being his heir at law, both in heritage and moveables, was his daughter; although this was a matter of contingency at the date of the settlement in 1844, because it was then possible that she might predecease him, with or without children, or that he might leave a son, who would be his heir. But according to the event that did happen, his only daughter was his sole heir at law and next of kin.

She was married to Mr Balderston, and he and she jointly so far defeated the purpose of this trust, that they claimed and got legitim, which was valued at L.2000, thereby partly defeating the directions in the settlement. In that state of matters, they have brought this action, concluding, inter alia, to have it found and declared that the fee of the estate has vested in Mrs Balderston, as her father's only nearest heir, subject only to the special provisions of the trust-settlement. In judging of this claim, we start with the fundamental principle to which I have already alluded—that such a general trust-settlement, although it takes all the trust-estate out of the hereditas jacens of the granter, operates as a trust for his legal representatives, in so far as the trustees may not have been directed to pay or make over that estate to other parties. Keeping this principle in view, the question is,—Has the testator cut off the claim, which would thus belong to the party who on his death was in the position of his heir-at-law, by his having directed the trustees, upon the other provisions being fulfilled, to make over the estate to his nearest heirs? It is difficult to read the direction by the testator to make over the estate to his own nearest heirs, as importing an intention to disinherit his nearest heirs.

It is said that the parties whom he denominates “my own nearest heirs,” in the fourth purpose of the trust, are those who should hold that character, not at the time of his own death, but at the time of the death of the survivor of his wife and daughter, because the direction to the trustees is to make over the estate to those heirs, “after the death of the longest liver of me and the said Sarah Gardiner or Fulton, my wife, and the said Jean Fulton or Balderston, my daughter.”

But these words appear to refer not to the period of vesting of this provision, but to the period when it was to be implemented. The improbability of the testator having any other intention, appears when it is taken into view, that so far as he then knew, the person who might be his nearest heir at the time of his death might be not his daughter Mrs Balderston, but a son of the then existing or of a future marriage. Or he might leave other daughters of that or of a future marriage. And is it credible that he intended that, in such events, such son or daughters should be utterly disinherited, and be left in beggary, unless they should survive both his daughter Mrs Balderston and her mother? Or that, in the event of Mrs Balderston predeceasing her mother leaving children, these children, although his legal representatives, should have no right to even the fee of his estate, unless they should survive their grandmother? It is utterly improbable he intended that, in such events, his own descendants should be disinherited, and the right to the succession of the fee of his estate reserved for collateral relations (he could not know whom they

No. 72. might be), or eventually for the Crown. I cannot put such a construction upon this provision.

Jan. 23, 1857.
Balderston v.
Fulton.

There is another indication of its true meaning. The parties in whose favour the trustees are directed thus to make over this fund, were to be either his nearest heirs, or some other person or persons to whom he might specially destine his estate. He puts these two alternatively,—the nearest heir, and such destinee, in the same category. And suppose he had executed a deed setting forth that, by the settlement, he had made this alternative provision, and that in the exercise of that power he thereby named A B to be the person there referred to, that destination would surely have received effect if the destinee survived the testator, and he might have availed himself of it as a fund of credit, although he might not get possession until the death of the testator's wife and daughter. The only reasonable construction of this provision is, that the nearest heir referred to was just the party who would be in this position at the time of the testator's death, and that this was nothing more than a declaration that, after the wife and daughter were provided for, the reversion of the estate was to go to the testator's nearest heir, unless he should otherwise dispose of it in his lifetime. Therefore, so far as regards the first conclusion of the summons, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of it.

It was stated in the argument, that although no other heir at law was excluded, the testator intended to exclude his daughter, because he declares that the liferent in her favour was to be not only in full of her legal rights, but of all that she could claim from his estate. I do not think that that is the meaning and effect of a clause of this kind. If he had other children, it might have excluded Mrs Balderston from taking any portion along with them. But when there are no other children, such a condition does not operate in favour of collaterals, according to the principle stated in Erskine, 3, 9, 23, and exemplified in the case of Maitland Gibson, 14th Dec. 1843. As here there is no other child in whose favour this clause could operate, it has no effect in preventing Mrs Balderston from claiming under the express provision in favour of the nearest heir.

2. Then as to the second conclusion, which is to have the trustees decreed and ordained to convey to the pursuers the whole subjects, heritable and moveable, now held by them: This is put on the ground that the whole special purposes are now fulfilled or superseded. But they certainly are not. The estate is directed to be held by trustees, in order that the annual produce thereof might be provided for the daughter in such a manner as to exclude the marital rights of her husband. That special purpose, at all events, has not been fulfilled. Nor has it been superseded by Mrs Balderston and her husband having taken legitim. Whatever effect that proceeding might have in creating a forfeiture of the provision in favour of Mrs Balderston, if there be any party in whose favour such forfeiture could operate, it has not superseded the directions of the trust, so far as the performance of them is still practicable.

This plea appears to rest on this fallacy of assuming that the trust is not binding on the heir at law. But as the estate is taken out of the hereditas of the defunct, and his heir can have access to the estate only as having a claim on the trustees, it follows that the heir, when he goes against the trustees, is bound by the condition which the testator has annexed to that claim. A testator, by means of a trust-deed, may create a restriction on the rights of his heirs at law, although he confer no right in favour of any third party.

I therefore hold it to be clear that the pursuers are not entitled to take in terms of this conclusion of the libel in any way whatever, and that the capital must remain in the persons of the trustees during the whole of this lady's lifetime, more especially as her present husband may predecease her, and she might marry again, and this trust must have full effect.

3. There remains the third question,—whether, during her lifetime she is entitled to have the income of the remainder of the estate? Here a very great difficulty arises, from the circumstance that she herself was the party who defeated the testator's intention. Is she entitled to have this provision made effectual to her to any extent whatever, while she repudiates the settlement by continuing to withhold this L.2000? That is a question as to which we have had no assistance from the bar, and I am not at present in a situation to give judgment on it. I see various views of it. If we were dealing with a third party, then this lady and her husband, by having withdrawn part of the capital destined to such third party, must have allowed the income of the remainder to have accumulated for that party's behoof, on the principle of equity of compensation, exemplified by the cases of Kerr and followed by the case of Bennet, and then by the case of Breadalbane. But can that principle operate in favour of the party who contravenes the settlement? I wish further argument on this point before forming an opinion on it, and I suggest that the judgment should be, to give decree in favour of the first conclusion, assailing the defenders from the second, and before answer as to the third, appoint parties to be further heard.

LORD IVORY.—I agree with the result of Lord Curriehill's opinion, and very much with its reasoning. I entirely agree with his Lordship on the construction of this deed that the word "heirs" must be held to be the heirs of the grantor at his death, and that his daughter having come to be such heir, she is the party who is heir of the estate, and that she is vested with the fee a morte testatoris. I also agree that under the deed she was entitled to that liferent which it was the object of the testator apparently to protect. But the deed is not allowed to stand. There is the disturbing element of the daughter having taken legitim, which she was certainly entitled to do. The father had no power to deal with legitim, but the daughter, because she is entitled to disturb this portion of the estate, is not therefore entitled to disturb the rest. She cannot take higher benefit by the deed than to obtain legitim. Anything further she must take under restriction of the deed itself. The difficulty here arises from the circumstance that we are not dealing with the interest of a third party. If the daughter takes the fee, subject to the restriction of the deed, she is taking the benefit of the deed while she also repudiates it. The widow was never the liferenter. But having survived the testator, she was an annuitant, and pro tanto she was a third party, and but for the deed of agreement and of discharge to which she was a consenting party, she would have been as a third party entitled in equity to insist that her annuity provided for her by the trust-deed should not be cut down. The parties seem to have had some view of the equity of compensation themselves, for they agree that if the trustees should be obliged to make up the full amount of the widow's annuity by encroaching on the capital of the trust, the daughter shall not afterwards impeach the right of the trustees to do so. But independently of that, the moment you come to deal with the fee, and with the fee as protected by the trust for securing the daughter in her liferent, the trustees being entrusted with the protection of the daughter against her husband, you come practically to deal with a third party, and if so, it will come to be an anxious question how the doctrine of compensation is to apply, or whether there are other elements to exclude it. The question is, how is it to be dealt with, and I agree with the proposal that it shall not be decided now.

LORD DEAS.—The question here is, whether the beneficial fee of the trust-estate has been given, by the deed, to those who shall be the truster's heirs at the date of his death, or to those who shall be his heirs at the date of the death of the survivor of his wife and daughter?

And this, again, involves the question, whether the words in the 4th purpose of the trust, "after the death of the longest liver of me and the said Jean Fulton or Balderston my daughter," are descriptive of the parties who are to take, or simply of the period at which the trustees are to denude?

Now, the words just quoted, taken in their strictly literal and grammatical sense, are descriptive only of the period of denuding. The 4th purpose is, "for making over to my own nearest heirs, or to any person or persons to whom I shall destine the same," the whole trust-estate and effects, "after the death of the longest liver" of the truster, his wife and daughter. The estate is, thus, to be made over after the death of the wife and daughter, but the heirs, to whom it is to be so made over, are not described as those who shall be the truster's heirs at the time of making over, but simply as his "own nearest heirs." Beyond what is contained in the words, "my own nearest heirs," he gives no description, whatever, of the beneficiaries in the fee. The words used are naturally descriptive of the persons who shall be the truster's heirs so soon as he leaves heirs, which he does at his death, when his succession truly opens and the deed takes effect, although the trustees are not to denude in favour of those heirs till the occurrence of a specified event; just as they were not to denude in favour of his nominatim residuary legatee (if he had named one), till the occurrence of the same event, although the right of such legatee would plainly have had no reference to survivance or predecease of the period of denuding, but simply to survivance or predecease of the date of the truster's death.

But although such may be the natural reading of the fourth purpose, when taken by itself, the following considerations were relied on, in argument, as sufficient to shew that, in no event, was it intended the daughter should take the fee:—1st, The form in which the fee is given, which is simply by a direction to make it over after the death of the wife and daughter. 2d, The power reserved to the wife to destine and convey the fee in the event of her survivance. 3d, The exclusion of the jus mariti as regards the liferent, and yet not as regards the fee. 4th, The supposed inconsistency of giving a liferent and fee to the same individual; and 5th, The stipulation that the liferent should be in full to the daughter of all legitim, executry, and other claims competent to her through the death of her father and mother.

These considerations, however, appear to me to be quite inadequate to support the construction contended for.

1st, Notwithstanding of the form in which the fee is given, the substantial effect of the deed is, that the trustees are to hold for behoof of the fiars (be they who they may) from the first. This would be the case, supposing the heirs who are to take were held to be those who shall be heirs at the death of the mother and daughter. The trustees would hold the fee for behoof of these heirs from the outset; and they must equally hold from the outset, for behoof of the heirs who are to take, supposing these heirs to be those who are heirs at the truster's death.

2d, The power reserved to the wife could only render the fee defeasible, or, at the utmost, suspend the vesting till her death. But even this latter view would create no practical difficulty, as the daughter has survived the mother.

3d, The truster might choose to protect the liferent for the daughter's maintenance, and yet not to exclude either her or her husband from dealing with the fee: subject always to the condition, that the capital must remain intact, in the hands of the trustees, during the life of the wife and daughter. This last indeed seems to me (as it does to your Lordship in the chair), to have been the great object of the deed. This object once accomplished, the truster seems to have been very little solicitous about any particular mode of disposing of the fee; and, accordingly, he merely substituted his own nearest heirs, failing any special destination of it by himself or his wife. Contemplating the probability of such a destination being made by one or other of them, he very naturally confined the exclusion of the jus mariti to the liferent, which alone it was his fixed purpose to secure to the daughter, although, failing the contemplated destination, she might happen to become fiar.

4th, There was no inconsistency in giving an absolute liferent to the daughter, and, at the same time, making a destination under which she might, contingently, become fiar.

5th, Nor is it surprising that the truster should stipulate that the liferent, which alone was given indefeasibly to the daughter, should be in full of legitim and all other claims, in place of stipulating that all which was given to her by the deed should be in full of these claims. This latter form of expression might have defeated his object had he or his wife exercised the reserved power, and thereby prevented the daughter from getting the whole of what had been declared to be in full of her claims. The exclusion was, however, applicable to her legal claims only, not to his own good will, by that deed or any other.

I may further observe, that if the daughter had predeceased the mother, none of the above considerations, except the first, could have had place in the question whether the fee had at once vested in the truster's heirs; although, according to the defenders' argument and their second plea in law, the death of the mother (as well as of the daughter) was a condition precedent to the vesting.

But while I thus hold the considerations relied on to be insufficient to control the natural meaning of the words, "my own nearest heirs," as used in the fourth purpose of the trust, I do so upon the footing that the trust must continue to subsist, and the capital to be retained by the trustees during the daughter's lifetime.

To this extent I do not think the objects of the deed could be defeated by any repudiation on her part. Whether the trustees will be entitled, and consequently bound, to retain the interest of the capital still in their hands till the sum withdrawn in name of legitim shall be made up—or whether the whole of that interest will fall to be periodically paid over to the daughter—may be a question upon which it will be proper to hear further argument. The act of claiming legitim was the daughter's act, to which her husband could not have compelled her; and the consequences of that act, as affecting her income, must be gravely considered. But this I hold will be the only question open; and, quoad ultra, effect should be given to the third and fourth pleas in law for the defenders, at the same time that their second and leading plea will fall to be negatived.

Balderston v.
Fulton.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived. I have felt considerable difficulty in construing that part of the deed contained in the fourth purpose of it. It admitted of two constructions, and taking light from the other parts of the deed, I find my difficulty increased. But one thing is very clear, that there was a settled purpose in the mind of the truster to secure the annual proceeds of this estate to his daughter during her lifetime, exclusive of the jus mariti of her husband; and the clause admitting of two constructions, that which was in consistency with the clear intention of the purpose of the testator was to be taken in preference to the other, although that other, in the absence of this leading purpose being so clearly expressed, would have been the more natural one. I have come to be of opinion that that purpose will be effectually accomplished as far as it admits of being accomplished, and therefore I concur in holding that the judgment should be in favour of the pursuer on the first conclusion of the action, and in favour of the defenders on the second conclusion. There must be an absolute settlement of the question that the daughter is not entitled to have the estate made over to her now. My reading of the deed cannot be satisfied without that being absolutely found. Then comes the question as to the disposal of the annual proceeds, and as to that there must be further discussion.

On 19th July 1856, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—
“Recall the interlocutor of the 31st of January 1855 reclaimed against: Find that there was vested in the pursuer Mrs Jean Fulton or Balderston, only child and nearest heir of the late James Fulton, a right to the fee or capital of the estate heritable and moveable, which belonged to him, and which was by the trust-disposition libelled on directed to be made over by his trust-disponees after the death of the longest liver of Mrs Sarah Gardiner or Fulton, his wife, and of the said pursuer, after the special provisions in the said trust-settlement should be performed: Sustain the defender's third and fourth pleas in law, and find that the defenders are not bound to convey and pay over the fee or capital of the said estate and effects to the pursuers during the lifetime of the said Mrs Jean Fulton or Balderston: and assoilzie them from the conclusions of this libel to have them decerned and ordained instantly so to convey and pay over the said estate and effects: And before further answer, allow the parties to be heard on the remaining conclusions of the libel, &c., reserving all questions of expenses.”

On 10th December 1856, the case was again put to the roll, when the Court appointed the pursuers to lodge a minute setting forth what they further demanded, and the trustees to lodge answers thereto.

The pursuers stated that what they demanded was “that the defenders should be decerned and ordained to make payment to the pursuer, Mrs Balderston, exclusive of the jus mariti of her present or any future husband, and in the manner provided for by her father's trust-deed, of the free annual income, rents, or profits of the trust-estate remaining in their hands, during all the days and years of her life, from and after the death of her mother, Sarah Gardiner or Fulton, the widow of the truster.” And they farther craved decree for their expenses of process to be paid out of the trust estate.

The trustees lodged a minute on 17th December 1856, which was afterwards withdrawn for one dated 15th January 1857, in which they stated that "they had deemed it to be their duty, as trustees, to resist the conclusions of the action, and particularly the first and second conclusions, because it had appeared to them, and they had been advised, that they were bound to defend and maintain the interests of those who, upon the death of the pursuer Mrs Balderston, should possess the character of the truster's "own nearest heirs." Till Mrs Balderston's death it could not be known who would possess that character; and as upon one construction of the 4th purpose of the trust, viz., that which had been adopted by the Lord Ordinary, these persons, whoever they might be, would be entitled to the fee of the estate, the defenders were advised that it was their bounden duty to represent to the Court the interest of these unknown persons.

"By the interlocutor of 19th July 1856 the Court had decided, 1st, that the fee or capital of the trust-estate was vested in the pursuer Mrs Balderston; and, 2d, that the trust was nevertheless to be kept up, and the fee or capital of the estate to be retained by the defenders, as trustees, during Mrs Balderston's lifetime.

"As explained upon the record, the capital of the trust-estate had been diminished to the extent of L.2000, which had been paid to Mrs Balderston in name of legitim, she having repudiated the trust-settlement of her father. The defenders had been withholding her liferent, and had intended to continue to do so until the said sum of L.2000 had been made up, and the capital thereby restored to its original amount, in the view that it might ultimately appear that the truster's own nearest heirs, at the termination of the trust, were entitled to the fee. But it having now been decided that the fee of the capital of the estate had actually become vested in Mrs Balderston, the defenders do not consider it to be consistent with their duty to her, to resist any farther claim which she may make in this action; because, according to the judgment of the Court, there is no other interest, besides hers, for them to represent, or protect, as trustees. They decline to consent to any demand made by Mrs Balderston. They also decline, for the reasons above stated, to resist her claims."

Of this date the case was advised,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The trustees for Mrs Balderston not considering it to be their duty now to resist the claim that is made for Mrs Balderston, the case is in this predicament, that there is no person whatever resisting the pursuers' claim. That being so, there is no course but to pronounce judgment in favour of the pursuers, in terms of their minute.

LORD IVORY.—If I am to understand that by granting the prayer of this minute we are pronouncing decree causa non cognita, thereby throwing the responsibility on the trustees, I have no objection. If, on the other hand, the minute for the defenders is to be interpreted merely as a minute throwing us back on the original discussion in the case, as I think it must be interpreted, it rather appears to me that we cannot deal with it in the manner your Lordship proposes. For we did not have a discussion which applied to the whole case, but only disposed of part of it; and all that the trustees now propose to do is only to allow us to complete the interlocutor. That is tantamount to throwing the responsibility on the Court, and it would not be becoming or competent for us to refuse to exhaust the case on the footing on which it was placed in the original discussion. In pronouncing the former interlocutor we were influenced by this consideration, that the trust-deed was specially directed to the separation of liferent and fee; and, in respect the liferent was brought into collision with the fee, that the liferenter was to be considered very much in the light of a third party, and that the intention of the truster was to protect the liferenter's interest. Now, if this had been the case of a third party, it is perfectly clear that, as in a question with the daughter, by the agreement entered into between her and the trustees, under which she repudiated the provisions in the deed, that third party would have been entitled to say, you have already got an equivalent for any possible claim,—you have repudiated that liferent provided for you,—and have thrown yourselves out of Court.

This minute for the pursuers never could have been sustained in that case, for it asks that which they were to receive in lieu of their claim, and also proposes to keep that which they were giving up. The Court would have been there obliged to apply an equitable principle of compensation. But I do not know, in the view we took of the case, that in point of principle there is any sound distinction between the case of a third party and the case of Mrs Balderston, considered as a liferenter whose interest was to be separated, under the second clause of the deed, from that of the fiar; and, under the first clause, protected as a separate interest, for which the trust was constituted; and, therefore, it appears to me that this is stultifying to some extent our prior interlocutor if we do other than apply the same principle of compensation to the case as it now stands. The motion now made virtually amounts to this, that, having obtained £2000 by repudiation of the liferent provided in the deed, Mrs Balderston now wants the liferent which she formerly gave away. I hold that she has got her whole liferent, and has nothing in that shape now to get. The fee must, therefore, remain subject to the burden of the liferent imposed on it by the truster. Therefore I think we are rather bound to explicate our previous interlocutor in some such way as this, and that whether we are to deal with this as a case in absence, or where the defenders have withdrawn their instance.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—When the interlocutor was pronounced, I anticipated an argument upon a very nice question, upon which we had not formed an opinion; and, accordingly, that interlocutor orders argument on these points. But we are here in an ordinary action, at the instance of Mrs Balderston against the trustees, who are the only defenders, and if they had simply stated, in a minute, “we decline to insist farther,” there is only one course possible. The Court itself is not to argue these nice questions against the pursuer. In an ordinary action this cannot take place; and, when the only defender declines to insist farther in the defence, the Court, according to practice, must, as a matter of course, grant what is demanded by the pursuers, if it be within the summons; the judgment, however, not being pronounced causa cognita. It is stated in the minute that because the Court have decided so and so therefore the defenders are not to insist farther. They may or may not be right in not further opposing the demands of the pursuers, but I wish to guard myself from being understood as holding this to be the case. I required further argument to enable me to form an opinion on the subject.

Mrs Fulton had a testamentary provision made to her, the subject of which was the annual income of the estate; and that was declared to be in full of legitim. I do not know whether or not it might be held, in conformity with the case of McIntosh's Trustees v. Stevenson and others, that it was optional in her to take either of these; and whether or not, on the principle of Tory Anderson, it was not the duty of the trustees to protect her even in the exercise of that option, more particularly as the statement in the record is a very remarkable one in regard to the manner in which that option is said to have been exercised. That statement is, that her husband insisted on her entering into the agreement with the trustees, and that on the application of the trustees she was induced to give a consent to that agreement; and the answer to that article does not appear to be a very distinct denial of it. In that state of matters, I thought it not unlikely the question might have arisen whether or not, while Mrs Balderston is entitled to be alimented by her present husband, the annual income should not be accumulated so as to provide a fund for compensating the loss of that income, in the event of the predecease of her husband, or of his eventually becoming unable to aliment her. But as the defenders no longer oppose the undisposed of conclusion of the action, I think the Court, without forming any opinion one way or another on the merits of that conclusion, have no option, but must causa incognita grant the motion of the pursuers for decree in terms of that conclusion.

LORD JAMES.—The summons contains two sets of conclusions—the one applicable to the fee and to the keeping up of the trust during Mrs Balderston's lifetime;—the other applicable to the annual income—as to which last the summons concludes that the trustees should be decreed to make payment to Mrs Balderston “of the free annual income, rents, or profits of the residue of the said estate, both heritable and moveable, during all the days and years of her life, from and since the death of her mother.”

In relation to the vesting of the fee and the endurance of the trust, we had a full argument; and to those points, accordingly, the interlocutor of 18th July 1856 is confined. Upon the conclusion for payment of the annual income we had no argument whatever, it being naturally enough felt that this conclusion could not be satisfactorily dealt with till the other conclusions were disposed of. In the opinion which I then delivered (and which I find correctly enough reported in the Jurist, except that under head 2d, the word printed "testing" should be "vesting;" and under head 3d, the word printed "conclusion" should be "exclusion,") I expressly stated that the consequences of the claim made to legitim, as affecting the liferent income of Mrs Balderston, would be a question open for and requiring further argument. Accordingly your Lordships, by the interlocutor of 18th July, expressly directed "the parties to be heard on the remaining conclusions of the libel, having reference to the effect, if any, produced on the claim therein made by the deed mentioned" in certain articles of the condescendence—that is to say, the deed of discharge applicable to this very claim of legitim. The case was then repeatedly put to the roll, that the parties might be heard in terms of this interlocutor; but the trustees having declined to enter upon the argument, your Lordships ultimately ordered the minute and answers which have been now lodged—the answers for the trustees being embodied in their minute printed under date 15th January 1857. The operative part of that minute (or answer) is contained in the two concluding sentences—"They decline to consent to any demand made by Mrs Balderston. They also decline, for the reasons above stated, to resist her claims." I cannot say that the reasons thus alluded to are, to my mind, satisfactory; for they amount to this, that the trustees resisted the first and second conclusions of the libel, because they held themselves bound to defend the interests of those unknown persons who might be the truster's nearest heirs at Mrs Balderston's death, but that they do not consider themselves bound to resist any farther claim she may make in this action, "because, according to the judgment of the Court, there is no other interest, besides hers, for them to represent or protect." Now it humbly appears to me that the duty of trustees appointed to secure the alimentary liferent of a wife, to the exclusion of the jus mariti, is not merely to protect the fee for whomsoever it may concern, but to protect the liferent interest of the wife, and this not only against her husband and all third parties, but also against herself. They are bound to see that she does not anticipate or prematurely consume or diminish the fund intended for her separate alimentary support. And, if they fail in this, they fail in the duty imposed upon and undertaken by them. But the question how far they are or are not called upon, in the discharge of that duty, to oppose any particular demand of the wife, is a question which the trustees must decide for themselves, and upon their own responsibility. Here the wife demanded her legitim (for the husband could not have done so without her consent), and the trustees conceded the demand. She now demands the full annual income arising from the remaining capital of the trust-estate from and since her mother's death, without allowing any part of it to be retained by the trustees towards making up the capital withdrawn in name of legitim, and the trustees state judicially that they do not oppose this demand. The demand not being opposed, there is no course open to the Court but to grant it. The whole question of withdrawal from the trust of a portion of the capital in name of legitim, and the consequences of that withdrawal, might have been made the subject of important argument under the concluding portion of the interlocutor of 18th July 1856; and, in common with your Lordships, I anticipated that it would have been so. But if the trustees decline the argument, and state that they do not oppose the claim, the rules of this Court do not require or permit of our going into the question for ourselves. The responsibility of the course followed rests entirely with the trustees. That course may be the right one for anything I know. I give no opinion upon it one way or the other. But in concurring with your Lordship that we must give effect to the wife's demand under the remaining conclusions of the libel, I do so solely in respect the trustees do not oppose that demand.

D. F. Inglis.—The trustees have not withdrawn their defences. They have been all sustained. It must be distinctly understood that there is no withdrawal; and also that in sustaining the third plea, it is held that the claim of legitim is well satisfied and discharged.

LORD DEAS.—That is an additional reason for our present judgment.

No. 72.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—“ Having resumed consideration of the cause, so far as not already disposed of, along with the said two minutes No. 12 and No. 14 of process, and heard the counsel for the parties,—In respect the defenders decline to resist the claims of Mrs Balderston, made in the said minute for the pursuer, No. 12 of process, Decern and ordain the defenders to make payment to the pursuer, Mrs Balderston, exclusive of the jus mariti of her present or any future husband, and in the manner provided for by her father's trust-deed, of the free annual income, rents or profits of the trust-estate remaining in their hands, during all the days and years of her life, from and after the death of her mother, Sarah Gardner or Fulton, the widow of the truster : Further, of consent of both parties, find them respectively entitled to their expenses of process out of the trust-estate : Allow accounts thereof to be given in, and remit,” &c.

JOHN MILLER (Baxter's Trustee), Defender and Respondent.—D. F. Inglis—Penney.

Bankrupt—Diligence—The Statute 2 & 3 Vict. cap. 41, sect. 83, applies equally to all sequestrated estates, whether of living or deceased debtors.—The first deliverance on an application for sequestration of the estate of a deceased debtor was not made till after the lapse of more than seven months from the date of his death. Arrestments were used within sixty days of the sequestration ;—Held (in conformity with the opinion of a majority of the whole Court, aff. judgment of Lord Mackenzie), that the arresting creditors were not entitled to a preference in the sequestration,—the general proviso in sect. 83 that no arrestment or poinding executed within sixty days of the sequestration shall be effectual, applying to all sequestrated debtors, whether living or deceased.

THE facts of this case were thus stated in a joint minute for the parties : Jan. 23, 1857.
—“ The deceased John Handyside Baxter, on whose sequestrated estate the respondent Mr Miller is trustee, died on the 25th day of April 1853. Three of Mr Baxter's daughters obtained themselves decerned and confirmed before the commissary of Forfar executrices-dative qua three of the next of kin of their father. The decree of decerniture in their favour is dated 17th May, and the confirmation 30th June, both in 1853. The amount of estate confirmed to by the executors, as set forth in the inventory, is L.1168, 16s. 5d. A summons at the instance of Rough's trustees against Mr Baxter's executors for L.500, contained in a bond and disposition in security granted by Mr Baxter, was signeted on the 16th April 1855, and after having been duly executed, it was called before Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary, on 24th May, when appearance was entered for the defenders. On the dependence of this action, the appellants used the following arrestments, of the respective dates after-mentioned, viz. :—On the 20th April 1855, in the hands of the branch of the Western Bank of Scotland at Dundee ; on 28th April 1855, in the hands of the Western Bank of Scotland, Glasgow ; and on 3d May 1855, in the hands of Durham and Thomson, stationers and booksellers, Dundee. The funds alleged to be attached by the said arrestments are—1st, a sum of L.828, 1s. 8d. due by the Western Bank in an account held with the branch of the said Bank at Dundee by ‘ Charles Philip for the executors of the late J. H. Baxter, stationer, Dundee,’ with a declaration that it was to be operated on by Charles Philip. Mr Philip is the husband of one of the executrices. 2d, A sum of L.35, 5s. 9d. due by Durham and Thomson on account of stationery furnished them by the executors. The sequestration of the estates of Mr Baxter, as a deceased debtor, was applied for on 12th June 1855, which is the date of the first deliverance. The defences in the action against Mr Baxter's executors were due on the 7th June 1855, but not lodged. The case was enrolled, and when called on 12th June, defences were allowed to be given in by the 15th June. The defences were lodged of that date, and the record was closed on summons and defences on 10th July 1855. The case was thereafter put to Lord Mackenzie's debate-roll, but has not yet been disposed of by him. No decree has yet been pronounced in the said action, and no process of furthcoming has been raised at the appellant's instance."

Mr Baxter's executors pleaded in the action against them;—There being an application for sequestration of the estates of the defunct, under which the whole moveable estate will be adjudged from the defenders, and taken out of their hands, it is incompetent to proceed with the present action; at least the same ought not to be allowed to proceed hoc statu, seeing no decree against the defenders can be pronounced to the effect of compelling them to part with the executry funds, or any part thereof, to the pursuers.

In the sequestration the appellants claimed to be ranked for L.549, 8s. 9d., as the value of their security. The trustee pronounced this deliverance:—"Rejects this claim, in so far as the claimants claim to be preferred over the ordinary creditors, and to be ranked preferably accordingly, upon the ground that the arrestments founded on were executed within sixty days from the date of the sequestration; but he admits the claim to the effect of a ranking pari passu with the ordinary creditors for the principal debt and interest thereon, amounting together to the sum of L.549, 8s. 9d.

Rough's trustees appealed, and prayed to have their claim sustained as a preferable ranking.

On 7th March 1856, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the estates of the deceased John Handyside Baxter were sequestrated under the Bankrupt Act on the 12th June 1855: Finds that the arrestments founded on by the appellants were used on the 20th April, 28th April, and 3d May, all in the year 1855, being within sixty days from the date of the sequestration: Finds that by the 83d section of the Act 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, it is provided that 'no arrestment or poinding executed of the funds or effects of the bankrupt, on or after the sixtieth day prior to the sequestration, shall be effectual,' but reserving to the arrester or poinder, before the date of the sequestration, a preference out of the funds, for the expense bona fide incurred by such diligence: Finds, in conformity with this provision of the Bankrupt Act, that the appellants are not entitled to be ranked as preferable creditors in the sequestration in respect of the arrestments used by them as aforesaid: Therefore affirms the deliverance of the trustee complained of, and dismisses the appeal, reserving the right of the appellants to be ranked as ordinary creditors for their debt, and their right to a preference out of the arrested funds for the expense bona fide incurred by them in their diligence: Finds the appellants liable in expenses, of which allows an account to be given in," &c.*

* "NOTE.—By the Bankrupt Act of 1839, section 4, it is competent to apply for sequestration of the estates of a deceased debtor, but except under certain special circumstances, this can only be done after the expiry of six months from the debtor's death. The 14th section provides, that 'if sequestration shall be awarded, such sequestration shall proceed in the same way as in other cases, with the differences necessarily arising from the death of the debtor.

"There is a general provision in the 83d section cutting down all arrestments or poindings of the debtor's effects within sixty days of the sequestration. Then Rough's trustees reclaimed, and on 9th July 1856 the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In respect of the novelty and importance of the point of law involved, direct copies of the printed papers in the cause, and of the present interlocutor, to be boxed to the Judges of the Second Division and to the permanent Lords Ordinary, with a view to a hearing before the whole Court, on the question whether, regard being had to the fact that the first deliverance on the application for sequestration was not made till after the lapse of more than seven months from the date of the death of the party whose estates were sequestrated, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to or altered?"

Rough's
Trustees v.
Miller.

The hearing took place on 5th December 1856. Rough's trustees pleaded, that their claim was entitled to a preference at common law. A creditor could secure a preference over the moveable estate of a deceased debtor either by confirmation as executor creditor, where no other party had been confirmed executor, or by arresting in the hands of a debtor to the executry.¹

But the executor confirmed was the true debtor, and the funds to which he confirmed were subject to the claims of creditors of the deceased. There could be no poinding of the estate of a deceased debtor till some executor had taken up the estate, and then a creditor might proceed against him as against his own estate.

The Act 2 & 3 Vict. did not destroy the appellants' common law preference over the estate of the deceased debtor. That Act, for the first time, introduced the right to sequester the estate of a deceased debtor, as a mode of administering the estate which was intended to be beneficial. Sections 83 and 84 were the only two which struck against the preference acquired by diligence over the moveable estate of a bankrupt or deceased debtor. Section 84 alone applied to the case of a deceased debtor; section 83 to the case of a living bankrupt, the one being in contradistinction to the other. The provisions applicable to the one did not necessarily apply to the other. The word bankrupt was not synonymous with deceased debtor, and the interpretation clause gave no countenance to that construction. But farther, diligence was not used against the funds and effects of a deceased debtor. The funds were not now his funds, but of his executor, and therefore section 84 did not apply here.²

the 84th section provides that where the sequestration of the estates of a deceased debtor is within seven months after his death, no preference by legal diligence within sixty days before his death, or subsequent thereto, shall be effectual in competition with the trustee.

"Founding upon this clause, the appellants maintain that where the sequestration of the estates of a deceased debtor is awarded after the lapse of seven months from his death, as happens to be the case here, all arrestments used by creditors after that period are effectual, although executed within sixty days of the sequestration. The Lord Ordinary cannot adopt this reading of the statute.

"No doubt the preference claimed by the appellants here is not cut down by the 84th section, because the sequestration was not awarded within seven months of the debtor's death. But this does not exclude the operation of the 83d section, which declares that 'no arrestment or poinding executed of the funds or effects of the bankrupt on or after the sixtieth day prior to the sequestration shall be effectual.' It appears to the Lord Ordinary that this general proviso applies to all sequestrated debtors, whether living or deceased, and if this view be correct, the trustee acted correctly in rejecting the appellants' claim to a preference under their arrestments, which were confessedly executed within sixty days of the sequestration."

Trustees v.
Miller.

The respondent pleaded ;—That the present question did not in the least refer to an executor creditor, for there was confirmation by the daughters and the next of kin, which of course excluded all confirmation by the executor creditor. The question was, whether section 83 applied, or, in other words, whether the word "sequestration," used in the clause, included sequestration of the effects of a deceased debtor? The principle of the clause applied equally to the case of a deceased debtor as that of a bankrupt, and throughout this Act sequestration meant sequestration of a deceased debtor as well as of a living bankrupt. There was not one kind of machinery for the one and another for the other. After sequestration, both dead and living debtors were equally called bankrupts.

Do the vesting clauses apply to the case of a deceased debtor or not? If not, how could the trustee ever get vested? If they do, the present question admitted of easy solution; and section 83, which was in truth one of the vesting clauses itself, clearly applied. There was strength in the argument on the other side when considered as an argument on policy, but not on principle.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

The 83d section of the Bankrupt Act, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, is in the following terms :—"And be it enacted, that the sequestration shall, as at the date thereof, be equivalent to an arrestment in execution and decree of forthcoming, and to an executed or completed poinding; and no arrestment or poinding executed of the funds or effects of the bankrupt on or after the sixtieth day prior to the sequestration, shall be effectual; and such funds or effects, or the proceeds of such effects, if sold, shall be made forthcoming to the trustee: Provided that the arrestor or pointer, before the date of the sequestration, who shall be thus deprived of the benefit of his diligence, shall have preference out of such funds or effects for the expense bona fide incurred by him in such diligence."

This section is in the most comprehensive terms which could be employed. It makes no exceptions. It begins in the same manner with the preceding—the Vesting Section, "The sequestration." In the 82d section this term applies to any sequestration—to every instance of that process of attaching the debtor's property. The next, the 83d, commences in the same way, and with a substantive general declaration as to the effect of that attachment. "The sequestration shall, as of the date thereof, be equivalent," &c. And then it goes on, "and no arrestment or poinding," &c. The first part of the sentence is general. How can the second part of the sentence be restricted on any warrantable principle of construction to any particular description of sequestration?

The attempt to restrain the operation of this section by the criticism that in the 83d, where arrestments and poindings are noticed, the expression used is "of the bankrupt," while in the 84th, mention is made "of the estates of a deceased debtor," and the argument thereon that bankrupt only applies to persons sequestrated during their lives, so as to obtain thereby a limited operation for the 83d section, is wholly unsuccessful. In the first place, the 83d section begins generally, "the sequestration," and the term bankrupt is only brought in subsequently, exactly as in the 82d, where the term is used in necessary reference to all sequestrations. Secondly, The 84th section necessarily used the term "deceased debtor," because it is an enactment specially applicable to that peculiar case, and to a limited class of such cases—viz. sequestration within seven months, in which class the sixty days before death is taken as the date for excluding preference by diligence. Hence the special case was necessarily to be limited in expression to the sequestration of "deceased debtors." Thirdly, The supposed distinction in the statute in point (as alleged) of legal import in the use of the term "bankrupt," and of the term "deceased debtor," is entirely fanciful, and is contradicted by the whole structure and enactments of the statute. The statute begins with two enactments—one for the case of a deceased debtor—the other, for any debtor of the character described—and authorises sequestration in each case. It denominates both classes as debtors. Then, when the machinery of the sequestration is put in motion, they are called bankrupts, and very naturally, as the very act of sequestration is declared to be equivalent to notour bankruptcy. And the whole provisions for the conduct, working, administration, and effects of the sequestration of either of such debtors, are contained in one set of enactments—the statute having further, by way of excluding any such criticism or objections as the present, made the following declaration as to deceased debtors a directory to the Court:—“That the Lord Ordinary shall award sequestration, and issue the other orders as herein-before provided in the case of any other debtor, in so far as circumstances will permit; and he shall ordain any successor who has made up a title to, or is in possession of the estate of the debtor, to transfer such estate, so far as liable to the debts of the deceased, to the trustee to be appointed, as hereinafter directed; and, if desired, the Lord Ordinary shall direct diligence to receive evidence to shew that the debtor resided or had a dwelling-house, or carried on business in Scotland at the time of his death, and was then the owner of heritable or moveable estates in Scotland, and was notour bankrupt, or had retired to, and remained in Sanctuary, as herein before mentioned; and if sequestration shall be awarded, such sequestration shall proceed in the same way as in other cases, with the differences necessarily arising from the death of the debtor.”

Jan. 23, 1857.
Rough's
Trustees v.
Miller.

Now, as to the question before us,—viz. the exclusion of preference by diligence obtained shortly before the sequestration, the death gives rise to no difference. After the death of the party, if his debts are not likely to be soon paid off,—if the management is not satisfactory, the probability of a sequestration will soon come to be suspected, before it is actually applied for, and then there may be attempts to anticipate such by arrestments which, (if there is to be a sequestration), should not be allowed, because a few days prior in time, to defeat the intended statutory distribution.

It would be tedious and most unprofitable to go through the statute in order to shew that all the provisions in the one case are applicable equally to the other (with the exception of differences caused by death), under clauses using the general terms,—“the sequestration,” or “bankrupt.” In truth, the sequestration after death would be wholly unworkable on any other view of the statute.

It was said that the 83d section is not applicable to the case of sequestration of the estates of a dead man, because, on the general construction of the 83d section, adopted by the Lord Ordinary, the effect of the confirmation of an executor-creditor is not struck at. How that matter should possibly exclude the operation of the 83d section as to arrestments and poindings, I am not able to understand. But I notice that sort of conjectural and speculative reasoning on the enactment, merely to say that I do not wish to give any opinion as to the effect of such confirmation, or to anticipate the question which may arise as to the import of the terms of the 14th section, already quoted, in regard to the extent of the estate to be handed over to the trustee by the successor of the deceased, and as to the meaning of the term successor therein employed.

I own I look on the present as a good illustration of the futility of any construction of the general words of a statutory enactment by general conjectural reasoning, and of the necessity of refusing to listen to any such mode of dealing with legislative provisions.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to.

I am unable to construe the 83d section of the Act 2 and 3 Vict., c. 41, in any other way than by holding that it applies to sequestrations both of living and of deceased debtor's estates, and that in all cases the awarding of such sequestration is to render ineffectual any poinding or arrestment of the debtor's effects, executed within 60 days before the sequestration. I consider that “the sequestration” referred to in the beginning of the clause means any sequestration under the Act. I conceive also that the executry funds are still, in the sense of the Act, funds or effects of the deceased debtor, as being attachable for his debts, and as not being the private or individual property of the executor, even when confirmed. And, finally, in reference to the word “bankrupt,” I find it repeatedly used throughout the Act, in the most important clauses, to include a deceased debtor against whom sequestration has been awarded, and whose estate, in the supposed case of competition, might lawfully be regarded as bankrupt or insolvent. On these grounds, as

No. 73.

Jan. 23, 1857.
Rough's
Trustees v.
Miller.

well as in reference to the general purpose of the Act to favour equalisation among creditors where a sequestration ensues, I consider that the clause in question must be construed in its most comprehensive sense.

I think that the 83d and 84th sections are in perfect harmony with each other. By the 83d section, as I conceive, all sequestrations, whether of living or of deceased debtors, operate to cut down preferences obtained by certain diligences within 60 days before the date of the sequestration. By the 84th section, where the sequestration is awarded of a deceased debtor's estate within seven months after his death, there is a further retro-active effect produced, extending to the period of 60 days before the death of the debtor, which additional protection was necessary or reasonable in consequence of the incompetency of such sequestrations, till six months after the death. The ordinary equalisation produced by the 83d section seems nowise inconsistent with the more extensive and special equalisations produced by the 84th section.

LORD COWAN.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to, and have no difficulty in concurring in the reasoning in the note by which it is supported.

The 83d and 84th sections of the statute have in view that equalisation which it was the object of the legislature to introduce, in regard to all sequestrated estates. They are continuous parts of the statutory provision for that purpose, and regulate in that respect the effect of sequestration when awarded. The 84th section is not a separate and distinct enactment, unconnected with the 83d. On the contrary, the special case with which it deals is obviously annexed by way of proviso to the general enactment which it follows and qualifies. In sound construction, as it appears to me, the 84th section requires to be so read.

I am not moved by the argument that the diligence of confirmation, qua executor-creditor, is not in express terms mentioned in the 83d section. Any difficulty which may be felt in disposing of such a case, when it does arise, ought not to affect the question now before the Court, which, in my opinion, is free of difficulty, as well upon the special sections more particularly for consideration, as upon the whole provisions and general object of the sequestration statute.

LORD BENHOLME.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Cowan. And, in addition to the observations contained in it, I have only one remark to make, in reference to the argument of the appellants, founded on the use of the word bankrupt in the 83d section of the statute.

It appears to me, that throughout the statute, the word bankrupt is used to denote the party whose estate has been sequestrated; whether that party is alive or dead, and whether notour bankruptcy has, or has not been founded on, as the ground of the sequestration. And such use of the expression is explained and justified by the consideration that the implication of insolvency is at the bottom of the statutory remedy. Sequestration is intended as a means of dividing an insolvent, and not at all of administering a solvent estate. All its details are devised with reference to this object; and by section 93, no other proof of bankruptcy, except the act of sequestration, is required, in order to establish the competency of a judicial sale.

In proof of the opinion I have thus expressed as to the meaning of the word bankrupt in the statute, I need not refer in detail to the various sections which were noticed at the debate. Perhaps no section could, for this purpose, be referred to more appositely than the 3d or interpretation clause, in which the sequestrated "estates" are defined to mean the various properties of "the bankrupt." But the question itself, and the details by which it may be conclusively solved, have been already so fully stated in the note affixed to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary in the case of Lord Melville v. Paterson, 1st June 1842, that I hold it to be superfluous to do more than to refer to that masterly exposition.

LORD HANDYSIDE.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Cowan, with the addition made by Lord Benholme.

LORD MURRAY.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right.

The bankrupt statute introduced the novelty of sequestrating the effects of debtors deceased. The Legislature must have been convinced that evils arose from mal-administration of the effects of deceased persons whose creditors had not been able to receive payment of their debts, and that sequestration of the effects of deceased debtors was the proper remedy. It was certainly no easy matter to incorporate the procedure applicable to the estate of a person who has died, without any previous act of insolvency, with the usual procedure in cases of ascertained bankruptcy. No person can, however, read the clauses with regard to the sequestration of deceased debtors without being satisfied that it was the intention of the Legislature to apply to the estates of deceased debtors all the rules of ordinary sequestrations which were applicable to that case. This intention is clearly expressed in the statute.

Trustees v.
Miller.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

The question must be disposed of on consideration of the statute (2 & 3 Vict. cap. 41), both in its several clauses and in its general scope and principle. The construction of clauses, in themselves broad and unequivocal, by conjectural and speculative reasoning from the phraseology of a different clause, is hazardous, and ought not to be lightly adopted. The 83d section is clear and comprehensive, and is in accordance with the general scope of the statute, and, with the principle of equalisation which pervades the bankrupt law; “no arrestment or poinding executed of the funds or effects of the bankrupt, on or after the 60th day prior to the sequestration, shall be effectual.”

These words are plain; and there is nothing within this section which can be fairly read as limiting them to the case of sequestration of living debtors. Nor is there anything in the other clauses of the statute which supports such limitation. The 4th section authorises sequestration of the estates of a deceased debtor; the 14th section provides, that in the case of sequestration of the estate of a deceased debtor, “such sequestration shall proceed in the same way as in other cases, with the difference necessarily arising from the death of the debtor;” and accordingly the words, “the sequestration,” are throughout the Act applied equally to the case of living debtors and of deceased debtors. Again, the 25th section declares that “the awarding of sequestration shall render the debtor notour bankrupt;” and the word “bankrupt” is used to denote persons sequestrated, without distinguishing whether the sequestration of the estate be while the debtor is alive or after his decease. It is so used in the 31st, 33d, 34th, 37th, and other sections, and particularly in the vesting clauses,—the 78th, 79th, 80th, and 82d sections. I concur with the Lord Justice-Clerk in thinking that the statute, so far as regards sequestration of the estates of a deceased debtor, “would be wholly unworkable on any other view.”

Then, is this construction of the 83d section to be set aside on account of the provisions in the 84th section? I think not. The 83d section applies to all sequestrations under the statute, whether of the estates of living debtors or of deceased debtors. It is comprehensive and unqualified, and contains no exception. The 84th section applies, not to all cases of sequestration of the estate of a deceased debtor, but merely to such sequestrations when “within seven months of his death.”

It has a special and limited application, and it does not, in my opinion, impair the generality of the immediately preceding section.

The present case is not within the 84th section, but is within the 83d; and no conjectural argument from the 84th section, which does not apply, can legitimately guide the construction of the 83d section, which does apply. It would require very clear expression to support a construction which would frustrate the Act, so far as it applies to deceased debtors. But on what footing are the appellants here? There is no trustee here,—no vested estate in his person,—no claim in the sequestration by the appellants, except under this statute, as applicable to the case of a deceased debtor, and on a construction of the words, “the sequestration,” and “the bankrupt,” in many of the clauses of the statute, which is fatal to that reading of these words in the 83d section, for which the appellant now contends.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I adhere to the opinion I formed of this case when it came before me as Lord Ordinary. I agree with Lord Neaves in thinking that the executor's funds are still, in the sense of the Act, funds or effects of the deceased debtor, as being attachable for his debts, and as not being the private or individual property of the executor, even when confirmed. In the most important clauses of the Act, the word bankrupt is used so as to denote or include a deceased debtor whose estate has been sequestrated; and this cannot be better illustrated than it is in the elaborate note of the Lord Ordinary in the case of Melville v. Paterson, 1st June 1842. And it may not be out of place to remark that the word bankrupt is repeatedly used by the appellants in the same sense in the affidavit lodged by them in this sequestration; and, in claiming a preference in virtue of their arrestment, they treat it as a security held by them over the estate of the bankrupt.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The opinions of the consulted Judges virtually decide this case. I do not mean to detain the Court with any observations, for my opinion concurs with that of the Lord Ordinary, and consequently with that of the consulted Judges; and the grounds are substantially the same in all of them. Therefore I merely say that I am for adhering.

LORD IVORY.—I am very unwilling to express any doubt or difficulty in reference to a case in which the Court seems to be so unanimous against the view that raises the doubt in my mind. I do not mean to go into the grounds of my doubt at any great length; but after considering the opinions of the consulted Judges, these have not been entirely removed. I say that with diffidence; for I cannot but suppose, with the weight of authority against me, that there cannot be any substantial ground for my difficulty. When the question was sent to the consulted Judges, we were under another statute from that which now operates; and it was not so much that the Court had come to a substantial difference of opinion that the consultation was suggested, but because it was a question of novelty—the decision of which would establish a binding rule under the statute, and therefore it was desirable that such decision should be expressed authoritatively. Since that time there has passed a new statute; and therefore had we been in the situation in which the case stands at present, I do not imagine we would have troubled the rest of the Court on the point, for its importance is gone as a question of general application under the former statute. My object now is to keep myself open for reconsideration of the question when it shall arise under the new statute. But under the old statute the question has lost its importance. Still it is of weight as regards the interest of parties; and as it must be disposed of, I am pleased that the Court have seen their way to the view they have taken; for it goes to introduce an equitable principle, which, if it swerves from the statute at all, is on that side which will perhaps result in more substantial justice than a more rigid adherence to the statute would have done.

But taking the case as it stands, there are certain dates necessary to be kept in view as raising the elements of the question. Mr Rough died in April 1853. There were executors confirmed on 30th June 1853; and the effect of that confirmation was in law to take the estate of the deceased debtor ex bonis defuncti, and vest it by legal title in the executors, as trustees to certain effects for the creditors of the deceased; and also, after the lapse of a certain time, so much in their own persons, that their own creditors by a certain form of diligence might attach it. The arrestments we have to deal with were used in June 1855, and were directed against the executors as executors on the estate, and with the view of taking away the estate so vested in them, but not to take it ex bonis defuncti. Sequestration took place within sixty days of that arrestment, but two years after the date of the confirmation of the executors. Are these arrestments cut down as being within sixty days of the sequestration of the deceased debtor?—and that question has arisen on the construction mainly of the 82d and 83d sections of the statute.

In the opinions of the consulted Judges, this difficulty is dealt with as if it depended solely and exclusively on the meaning of the words sequestration and bankrupt. But it appears to me that the difficulty lies a great deal deeper. It would have ill become me to raise difficulties as to the meaning of the word bankrupt after my own decision in the case of Melville,¹ where I was at great pains to apply the canons of construction set forth in the opinions of the consulted Judges, and therefore I would not, so far as that case goes, have been disposed to differ from their Lordships. But I think that they have missed the pith of the difficulty, which still remains precisely where it appeared to me to lie before consultation.

My ratio dubitandi lies in a different direction. The arrestments in dispute are not arrestments of the estate of the deceased debtor. The arrestments are not of an estate vested in the bankrupt—at least they are not so in the proper sense of the statute, or any part of it. They are arrestments of a portion of what was originally his estate. But that portion was taken out of the estate of the deceased debtor by proper diligence of law, and, no longer remaining in bonis defuncti, was vested in the executors, apart altogether from the deceased debtor. So much is this the case, that before the statute, after confirmation by an executor, arrestment would not have been a habile mode of attachment. The estate, after the death of the deceased debtor, could not have been so attached. It must have been attached in the shape, either of a previous confirmation of the executor, or, if afterwards, then by action and diligence against the person of the executor. But, in a competition between arrestment used after the death of the debtor, and the confirmation of an executor-creditor of that debtor, there could not have been a question that the arrestment would have been wholly inhabile as a legal diligence, and therefore not good or effectual as in a competition.

No. 73.

Jan. 23, 1857.
Rough's
Trustees v.
Miller.

Now, looking to section 83 of the statute, my difficulty is, whether these arrestments, with which we are dealing, can by any possibility be other than what would have been good as against the estate of the deceased debtor? If not good, they would not have come into competition. The whole assumption of the enactment is, that they are arrestments applicable to the estate of a debtor, which could be effected by diligence of arrestment; and what makes me more decided in that view of the matter is, that, when I go back to the previous statute, I find that its words are identical with those here used, and at that time sequestration of the estate of a deceased debtor was unknown. Under section 40 of the 54 Geo. III. there is no difficulty in seeing what the enactments have reference to; and when that clause is almost verbatim repeated in the present, without anything to betoken that the Legislature meant to apply the word "arrestment" to arrestment of a different character,—the fair construction is, that it was to be the same kind of arrestment as in the previous statute.

Every portion of the operative words in sect. 83 are contained in the previous statute, before sequestration of a deceased debtor was introduced; and I see no ground for the presumption that it was the intention of the Legislature to give the words in that section a more extended application than in the previous statute. Both statutes seem to have reference to the case in which arrestment could be a habile diligence. There is no reason given in this statute for extending it further to a new kind of arrestment never before known in law. The arrestments dealt with are those used in the life of the debtor; and, accordingly, the recent statute is utterly silent as to what was habile diligence against the estate of a deceased debtor,—the diligence of an executor-creditor. Now, it is a strong thing to say, that when these words in a statute of limited meaning are repeated in another statute which does not say it intends to introduce a new kind of arrestment never before recognised, and is silent as to the only form of diligence by which it was heretofore held competent to attach the moveable estate of a debtor deceased,—the confirmation of an executor-creditor,—it is a very strong thing to say that, under such a clause, you are inferentially to construe the words "arrestment of the estate of a debtor" in a way which no lawyer had previously ventured to do. Section 84 follows upon this, and deals with the confirmation of an executor-creditor, and with all the cases of diligence used within certain periods before and after the debtor's death. I think, therefore, that, between these two clauses, you have the whole that the statute meant to deal with. In the first place, it deals with arrestments used at the only competent time they could be used, viz., in the lifetime of the debtor. In the next place, it deals with preferences used within the periods mentioned in section 84. It gives no other period for equalisation, and these two clauses distinctly apply;—the one to a deceased debtor, and the other to a living debtor. Section 84 also is important in reference to this point.

Now, in these two statutes it is plain that the Legislature, with reference to the words used, were perfectly cognisant of the distinction between arrestment and confirmation of an executor-creditor; that they applied each to a different state of matters, the former being applicable to the case of a debtor who was alive, and confirmation of an executor-creditor being applicable to the case of a debtor who was dead; and that forms an additional element to satisfy me that in construing this statute I am not to force upon it a sense which the Legislature itself seems to exclude by drawing this distinction between these two forms of diligence. This view is not in the least inconsistent with the opinion of any of the consulted Judges, but only with their result. It is not inconsistent with these reasons, viz., that the word "bankrupt" includes the estate of a deceased debtor, and that the word "sequestration" may apply to the one case as to the other. But then it lets in this consideration, that where the words do not necessarily bring it within that case, and where there is nothing discordant between applying the law of diligence as it used to be understood, and holding that the arrestments with which the statute is dealing cannot exist in the one case, and are the only arrestments which can exist in the other;—in the one case, confirmation of an executor-creditor is excluded, but not more so than arrestment of the estate of a deceased debtor is by section 83.

Trustees v.
Miller.

It might then be said that both clauses might apply to particular cases. Suppose the sequestration had been applied for the day after the debtor's death, and that the first deliverance had been a week after his death, there might have been arrestment within the sixty days, and there might have been diligence within so many days before the death—then both clauses would have come into operation; and I am still unable to satisfy my mind, in the absence of express words, that the distinction I have drawn is not sound. So far as the policy of the statute is concerned, I doubt whether that is a proper element for judicial consideration. But as illustrative, I can understand reasons for equalising the estate of a debtor, which will not, however, apply years after the debtor is dead. My opinion, however, cannot affect the judgment in this case. I am only anxious to keep myself open to reconsider the point when it arises.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—The arrestment in dispute was executed on 14th April 1855; and the defunct debtor's estate having been sequestered within sixty days thereafter, viz., on 12th June 1855, the question is, whether or not that arrestment is exempted from the operation of the enactment in the 83d section of the statute 2 & 3 Victoria, c. 41, that no arrestment or poinding of the funds of the bankrupt, used within sixty days before the date of the sequestration, shall be effectual?

No such exemption is expressed in that enactment. The sequestration of the estates of defuncts is expressly authorised in the preceding part of that statute; and the term "the sequestration," in the 83d section, is prima facie as applicable to this kind of sequestration as to the other kinds. These other varieties of sequestration are four in number, viz., (1,) Of the estate of a trader when applied for by himself, with the concurrence of one or more creditors of a certain amount; (2,) Of the estate of a trader who has retired to the sanctuary for a certain period; (3,) Of the estate of such a trader who is rendered a notour bankrupt, when it is applied for without his consent by such creditors; and (4,) Of the estate of a trading company; and the 83d section makes no distinction between the sequestration of the estate of a defunct and these other four varieties of the sequestration, in the provision that the sequestration shall produce such a retrospective effect on the diligence of arrestment or poinding used within sixty days before its date.

The context of the statute confirms this literal and prima facie meaning of the enactment. Throughout the statute, the phrase "the sequestration," is used as meaning all these varieties, except in cases where the meaning is expressly limited to one or more of them. In particular, the phrase is so used as including the sequestration of estates of defuncts. This has been illustrated very clearly in the opinions of the Court in the case of Lord Melville, 1st June 1842, to which I refer.

Moreover, the policy of this statute, and of the prior Bankrupt Statute 54 George III., which is thereby corroborated, is to equalise the ranking of creditors of insolvent estates, and, for that purpose, to cut down preferences attempted to be acquired by individual creditors, by means either of voluntary deeds of the debtors, or of legal diligence by the creditors, after, or within sixty days before, such public acts as are held in law to render the insolvency notorious. The acts of this kind are twofold,—the one being notour bankruptcy, produced by the proceedings set forth in the statute 1696, c. 5, and in the above mentioned statute 54 George III.; and the other being sequestration, whether or not accompanied by notour bankruptcy. Before sequestration of the estates of defuncts was introduced, there were no means of working out such equalisation in reference to their estates, because there were no means of either rendering them notour bankrupts or of sequestrating them after their death. This was felt to be a defect in carrying out the policy of our law, and Professor Bell (Com. II. 88) desiderates a remedy for that defect. The Act 2 & 3 Victoria, which passed soon afterwards, supplied that desideratum by extending the process of sequestration to the estates of defuncts, and by enacting in unqualified terms that "the sequestration" should have this equalising effect. And not only is it an elementary canon of construction that the terms of a statute, even when they are ambiguous, are to be construed in the sense most conformable to the policy of the Act; but further, the 3d section of this statute expressly directs us to construe it "in the most beneficial manner for promoting the ends hereby intended."

No. 73:

Jan. 23, 1857.
Rough's
Trustees v.
Miller.

The main grounds upon which a different meaning is sought to be put upon this enactment, are that the arrestments to which it refers are described as being arrestments of the funds of the bankrupt, whereas a sequestration of a defunct's estate is competent, without any bankruptcy; that while the sequestration dealt with in the 83d section is a proceeding operating as a general arrestment or poinding of the estate for behoof of the creditors, the funds of a defunct debtor are not arrestable or poindable for his debts, and are attachable only by a confirmation quo executors creditors; and that the legislature, although it had this latter kind of diligence in its view, as appears from the 14th and 84th sections of the statute, did not expose it to the retrospective operation of the 83d section. But these considerations do not warrant the inference that sequestration of estates of defuncts is exempted from the operation of the 83d section.

If the enactment were held not to apply to any arrestments or poindings of parties who are not bankrupt in the technical meaning of that phrase, then the numerous sequestrations issued on the application of the debtors themselves, and also the sequestrations issued of the estates of debtors, in respect of their retiring to the sanctuary, would be exempted from the operation of this enactment, because bankruptcy, in this sense, is not necessary to render such sequestration competent. But arrestments and poindings of the estates of such debtors, although they are not bankrupt in that sense, are cut down by the retrospective effect given to sequestrations of their estates; and the term bankrupt is throughout the statute used as meaning merely the party whose estate is sequestrated. This also was very clearly demonstrated in the opinions in the case of Lord Melville already referred to.

Even if the funds of a defunct were not attachable by arrestment, this would be of no avail in this question, because the enactment does not render the sequestration a new species of arrestment, but only provides that it shall be equivalent to arrestment in its effects. But this argument proceeds upon a mistake. By the common law, the funds of a defunct, whose executor has been confirmed, are attachable by arrestment; vide The Globe Insurance Company v. Mackenzie, 31st May 1838, affirmed on appeal, 5th August 1850. And farther, since the date of the statute 4 Geo. IV. c. 98, the funds of a defunct, even where no confirmation of them has been expedite, are attachable by the diligence of arrestment, as was decided in the case of Frith v. Buchanan, 3d March 1837. And as when the statute 2 and 3 Victoria, c. 41, was passed, the moveable funds of defuncts were attachable by arrestment, there is no incongruity in holding that that part of the 83d section, which declares in general and unqualified terms the sequestration to be equivalent to a general arrestment for behoof of the creditors, includes sequestration of the estates of defuncts. And holding that part of the enactment to include such sequestrations, the same expression, when repeated in the same general and unqualified terms in the same clause, and, indeed, in the very same sentence, cannot fairly have a different meaning put upon it.

The inference, again, from confirmation as executor creditor not being cut down retrospectively, as well as the diligence of arrestment and poinding, would have little weight, even if no good reason for the distinction could be suggested; because this enactment, even if the legislature had overlooked such confirmations in framing it, must receive effect so far as it goes.

But a confirmation as executor creditor is a proceeding which is sua natura different from the diligence of arrestment or poinding. The object and effect of such diligence is to confer upon the creditor using it a preference over the other

No. 73.

Rough's
Trustees v.
Miller.

creditors upon the funds so attached. But a confirmation as executor creditor, although commenced at the instance of an individual creditor, is a proceeding in the benefit of which all the creditors may participate, by appearing and being conjoined with the raiser. This is the nature of the proceeding as stated by Erskine, iii. 19, 34, and exemplified in the case of Lee v. Jones, 17th May 1816, F. C. Such a proceeding is thus in effect a species of process of distribution, although what is distributable among the creditors is the fund itself, instead of its proceeds realised by its being uplifted or sold. And ample provision is made for giving the other creditors notice to appear and obtain the benefit of such participation. First of all, an edict is published under the authority of the Commissary-court, which, as Erskine states (iii. 9, 31), "serves as an intimation to all concerned that they may appear in court on a particular day, specified in the edict." And farther, by the statute 4 Geo. IV. c. 98, already mentioned, it is enacted, "that notice of every application for confirmation by any executors creditors shall be inserted in the Edinburgh Gazette at least once immediately after such application shall be made, in evidence whereof a copy of the Gazette in which such notice shall have been inserted shall be produced in Court before any such confirmation shall be farther proceeded with;" and farther provision for this publication is made in the 9th section of the relative Act of Sederunt as to the Commissary-court of 12th November 1825. Thus, means similar to those which are prescribed by the bankrupt statutes for bringing forward creditors to rank in sequestrations, are also prescribed for bringing them forward for ranking in such confirmations. If all of them do come forward and obtain their rateable shares of the confirmed fund,—or, in other words, obtain in this form their fair dividends,—it would be unreasonable, in the event of their debtor's estate being sequestrated at any time thereafter, to compel them to relinquish this dividend to the trustee, in order merely that he might divide among them a second time the same funds, diminished by the expense of such an unnecessary and vexatious proceeding. And if any of them should fail to come forward and obtain a participation in that process of division, the blame would lie with themselves; and there would be no more reason for undoing such a division than there would be if it had taken place in a sequestration. Whether or not this difference between confirmation as executor-creditor, and the diligence of arrestment and poinding, was the reason why the Legislature did not include the former as well as the latter under the retrospective operation of the 83d section of the statute, can only be matter of conjecture. But, at all events, considering the nature and effect of a proceeding of the former description, it is easy to understand why the idea of cutting down such a proceeding may never have even suggested itself to the Legislature. And the circumstance that a completed proceeding of that kind is not interfered with, is no reason for inferring that sequestration of the estates of defuncts is exempted from the general unqualified enactment that the sequestration shall level such arrestments and poindings of the funds of the bankrupt as are used within sixty days of its date.

LORD DEAS.—I am not prepared to say that the difficulties which were suggested by Lord Ivory at consultation have been very satisfactorily met in the opinions of the consulted Judges. But there are difficulties both ways, and, upon the whole, I agree in the result at which the consulted Judges have arrived. The main object of the hearing was to have an authoritative construction of the enactment in question; and, this being now attained, I do not think it necessary to go into the precise grounds upon which I concur in the construction which will now fall to be sanctioned.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having resumed consideration of the cause, in pursuance and in respect of the opinions of the majority of the whole Judges, Refuse the desire of the reclaiming note, No. 13 of process, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find the appellants liable in additional expenses; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same, when lodged, and to report."

Reparation—Relevancy.—Allegations which held relevant to support a claim of damages. Jan. 23, 1857.
Banaghan v.
Smith.

2^D DIVISION.
Lord Neaves.
R.

BANAGHAN, a cotton-waste dealer in Glasgow, pursued John Smith for damages on the following allegations :—" Early in the morning of the 15th December 1854, and about seven o'clock thereof, it being quite dark, the pursuer was aroused from his sleep by a heavy and violent knocking or kicking at the door and window of his house, and which was heard at a considerable distance in the neighbourhood. At the same time, his window-shutter was taken off by the defender, or his associate, Robert Aitken, who then accompanied him. The pursuer not knowing what was meant by these violent proceedings, was thrown into a state of great alarm. The kicking and knocking continuing unabated, the pursuer became seriously alarmed that the door would be broken open, and he was obliged to rise, naked as he was, from his bed, and open it, which was no sooner done than the defender, John Smith, manager for Messrs Aitken and Company, with Robert Aitken, one of the partners thereof, who were the parties who had assailed the house in such a violent manner, pushed in and charged the pursuer with having cotton-waste or other rags belonging to them in his possession. This the pursuer denied. But, notwithstanding of his denial, they demanded a light, and, on obtaining it, they, without any sanction or authority on the part of the pursuer, searched and ransacked the whole premises minutely over, examining every hole and crevice of his house, and maliciously conducted themselves in such a manner as was tantamount to charging him with theft or reset of theft, to the great injury of his feelings. They then left his house. The defender and the said Robert Aitken produced no warrant for searching the premises or attempting to break open the door, and had in fact neither warrant nor authority for so doing. The pursuer being an old man, in consequence of being obliged to stand in his night dress, caught a severe cold."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor :—" Finds that the summons and record contain allegations relevant to support the pursuer's claim of damages, so far as rested on the ground that the defender, on the occasion libelled, violently entered and searched the pursuer's house, without any warrant or authority, with a view to the discovery of articles or property said to have belonged to him, or to Messrs Aitken and Company, and to that extent repels the defender's second plea in law, and appoints parties respectively to prepare and lodge draft of such issues and counter issues as they propose for the trial of the cause." *

In a tentative issue lodged, there was no allusion to injury to character.

The defender reclaimed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It would be very strange were we to dismiss this action. They say in England that a man's house is his castle; and although a search is much more easily made here than in England, no man is entitled to force his way into a house in this way without a warrant. The allegations about catching cold were mere nonsense; but the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary seems quite right.

THE COURT adhered.

W. A. G. & R. ELLIS, W.S.—J. Y. PULLER, S.S.C.—Agents.

* "NOTE.—This may or may not be a frivolous action, and it has certainly not been libelled and maintained upon any clear or consistent grounds. But the Lord Ordinary thinks that there is enough of relevancy to support the action to the extent referred to in the interlocutor.

"From the tentative issue given in, it does not appear that the pursuer now means to insist on a claim of damages as for a charge of theft. If he meant to do so, the Lord Ordinary would consider this ground of action to be excluded, as although it is founded on in the summons, there seems to be no substantive or sufficient statement on that head in the record."

Foreign—Jurisdiction—Refusal to sist an action pending a suit between the same parties in England.—A Scotch company having agents and offices in England, brought an action in Scotland against the representatives of a former agent in England to recover a debt claimed by them, and to obtain a security upon the real and personal estate of the deceased in Scotland. A decree for the administration of the testator's estate having been made in England, the Court of Chancery granted an injunction to restrain the company from continuing the action in Scotland, but upon appeal the order was discharged.

The company then brought another action in Scotland, and another suit having been instituted against the company in England, in which they appeared, the pursuers in that action alleging that the company had acquiesced in the English proceedings, asked for an injunction to restrain the action in Scotland, but it was refused;—Held (affirming judgment of Lord Mackenzie), that the jurisdiction of this Court being undoubted, there was no sufficient reason for sisting proceedings in order that the question might be tried in the Court of Chancery, as the most proper and convenient forum.

The facts of this case were stated by the Lord Ordinary in his note:—
“The Carron Company was incorporated in Scotland, by Royal Charter, on 15th July 1773, and had several places of business in England, under local managers. Henry Stainton was their manager in London from 1808 to the 5th December 1851, when he died, domiciled in England. Besides considerable property in England, he possessed a landed estate and personal property in Scotland; and, in particular, he held 101 shares in the Carron Company, valued at upwards of L.70,000. The defenders, as his trustees and executors, proved the will in England, and on 12th July 1852 they were confirmed executors in Scotland—the moveable property given up in the inventory amounting to L.82,542.

“After Mr Stainton's death the Carron Company insisted that he was indebted to them for L.69,617, 1s. 6d., exclusive of interest, upon his accounts, as their agent, from 1825 to 1851. The company likewise claimed a right to hold his shares of their stock as a security for the sums alleged to be due to them from his estate under their charter, which provides, that if any of the partners should become debtor to the company, his shares were to be subject to the payment of his debt to the company in priority to any other creditors. When this claim was preferred the defenders instituted an administration suit in Chancery, and, in May 1852, the usual decree was made for taking accounts.

“In October 1852 the pursuers raised an action against the defenders in this Court, for payment of the sum alleged to be due to them, but although the summons was executed it was not called in Court, and fell, by the lapse of year and day, in consequence of an injunction obtained by the defenders from the Master of the Rolls, on the 15th November 1852, restraining the pursuers from proceeding with the action in Scotland. A motion to recall the injunction was refused by the Master of the Rolls, but on an appeal by the pursuers, the House of Lords dissolved the injunction on 11th July 1855.—5 H. L. Cases, 416; 24 Law Journal Reports (N.S.) Chanc. 620.

“In the meantime some other proceedings took place in the administration suit. The pursuers, without prejudice to the appeal, made a claim before the Master in respect of their debt; but they declined then to prosecute it, and it was disallowed for want of prosecution. In February 1854 while the appeal was still in dependence, the defenders instituted another suit in the Court of Chancery against the pursuers, having for its object to compel a transfer of the shares of the Carron Company held by Mr Stain ton at his death; and the pursuers appeared and defended themselves against that demand, but under a full reservation of their right to prosecute their claims in Scotland. On 17th July 1855, immediately after the injunction was dissolved by the House of Lords, the pursuers commenced a new action against the defenders in this Court, by a summons, concluding for payment of the sum of L.69,617, 1s. 6d, with interest; and this was afterwards conjoined with a supplementary summons, raised on 29th January 1856. Another attempt was made by the defenders to stay these proceedings in Scotland. With that view the defenders, in November 1855, founding on the second suit instituted by them regarding the shares of the Carron Company, applied to the Master of the Rolls for an injunction to restrain the pursuers, either absolutely, or from taking any proceedings other than such as might be necessary to obtain such security or priority as they might be entitled to by the law of Scotland; but that motion was refused, and an appeal having been taken by the defenders, the judgment of the Master of the Rolls was affirmed, with costs, by the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices, on the 18th December 1855.—(26 Law Journal Rep. p. 191.)

“Notwithstanding these repeated failures to obtain an injunction in England, the defenders now maintain, that although the jurisdiction of this Court is undoubted, the proceedings should be stayed, in order that the question may be tried in the Court of Chancery, as the most proper and convenient forum. But the Lord Ordinary is humbly of opinion that no sufficient grounds have been stated to justify that course here.”

The first and second pleas for the defenders were as follows:—“1. The present action is incompetent, or at least ought to be sisted, in respect of the dependence in the Court of Chancery of a suit for the administration of the estate of the late Mr Stainton, who was a domiciled Englishman, and for the settlement of all debts and claims against said estate, and in which suit the pursuers have already appeared, and made the present claim the subject of discussion and adjudication; and in respect also of the dependence in the same Court of Chancery of another suit for transfer of the shares, and for the accounts and payments specified in article 4 hereof, to which last-mentioned suit the pursuers, the Carron Company, are parties defendants, and have appeared and answered, and taken other proceedings therein. 2. At any rate, as the pursuers are in a position to prosecute the present claim in the suits now in dependence in the Court of Chancery for the administration of the estate of Mr Stainton, and the settlement of all claims against it, and for transfer of the shares, and for the accounts and payments aforesaid, and a number of the documents and papers connected with said estate, and with the matters embraced in the present action, being already produced in the said suits, and the witnesses acquainted with the facts and circumstances connected with the London agency of the Company being principally resident in England, the present action is incompetent, or at least highly inexpedient and inequitable as against the defenders, and they ought not to be called upon in this Court to answer the claims made in the present action.”

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Repels the first pleas in law stated in the record by the defenders: Appoints the case to be put to the roll, in order that parties may be heard on the points which remain to be determined; and, in the meantime, reserves all questions of expenses.” *

* “NOTE.—After hearing a very able argument, the Lord Ordinary has no doubt that this Court has jurisdiction to entertain and give judgment in this action; and thinks no sufficient grounds have been stated by the defenders for staying the proceedings, in order that the matters in dispute may be tried in the Court of Chancery in England.—(His Lordship then narrated the facts as above quoted.)

No. 75. The defenders reclaimed, and pleaded ;—That this action should be sisted till the issue of the proceedings in Chancery ; when, if the pursuers obtain decree, they can appear and get the full benefit from it.

Jan. 27, 1857.
Carron Co. v.
Stainton.

“ This is not an action calling upon the defenders for a general accounting for their intromissions as executors. Neither is it brought by a party claiming as a beneficiary under the will. It is an action by the Carron Company, established by Royal Charter in Scotland, to recover payment of a particular debt alleged to be due them by the representatives of Mr Stainton, who acted as their agent in London. In this respect the present case differs entirely from Brown's Trustees, 17th December 1830 ; Macmaster, 17th June 1834 ; and Munro, 4th July 1839,—being the decisions principally founded on by the defenders.

“ Again, the defenders are not only possessed of a landed estate in the county of Stirling, which belonged to Mr Stainton, but they have been confirmed as his executors in Scotland, having given up in the inventory the shares of the Carron Company and other personal property, to the value of L.82,542. So far as regards these funds the defenders may be regarded as Scotch executors, and this element was held to be of great importance by the Court in deciding the case of M'Morine, 16th January 1845 (7 D. 270). No doubt Mr Stainton was domiciled in England, and his executors reside there. But as a large portion of the executry funds have been confirmed in Scotland, where the Carron Company carry on their business, it would be a very strong step to prevent them from proceeding with this action, the object of which is to operate payment of a particular debt out of the funds in Scotland, and particularly out of the shares of their own company, over which they claim a security by retention, in virtue of the provisions in their charter of incorporation.

“ Another important specialty in the present case is, that it is not pretended by the defenders that there is any competition among the creditors of Henry Stainton, so as to render any administration suit in Chancery necessary so far as they are concerned. When an English executor is called to account by a creditor in Scotland, it is frequently urged as a reason for staying the proceedings, that he is not in safety to pay till all the claims against the estate are known ; that he cannot call the English creditors into Court here ; and that the Courts of England will settle the order of preference rightly for all concerned. Such was the argument used by an English executor, though unsuccessfully, in the case of Campbell, 2d March 1809 (Hume's Reports, p. 258). But there is no reason for any such argument here. For in answer to article 3 of the defenders' statement, the pursuers aver, ‘ that with the exception of the present pursuers, there are no known creditors of the deceased.’ And the defenders, on their part, admit, ‘ that the explanation in this answer is substantially correct, except the statement that the pursuers are creditors of the deceased, which is denied.’ Hence the administration suit in Chancery appears to have been instituted not for the protection of creditors, but for the benefit of parties claiming under the testator's will, and the interests of such parties ought not to be allowed to interfere with the rights of creditors. These observations apply with equal force to the second suit instituted by the defenders in Chancery for a transfer of the shares of the Carron Company, in February 1855, before the appeal against the injunction had been determined by the House of Lords. This second suit was long subsequent to the original action raised by the pursuer in this Court in October 1852, which was discontinued and rendered abortive solely in consequence of the injunction ; and as the House of Lords discharged that order and declared that the Carron Company ought not to have been restrained from going on with their proceedings in Scotland, it appeared to the Master of the Rolls that the pursuers should now be placed as nearly as possible in the same situation in which they would have stood if no such order had been pronounced, and that the new action commenced by them in Scotland ‘ must be treated exactly as if it were the old action still subsisting.’

“ As the case stands, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the defenders have completely failed to shew that the question here raised can be more properly conveniently tried in Chancery than in the Courts of this country ; and the opinion expressed by the House of Lords, and the Lords Justices in England, when the injunction sought by the defenders was refused, strongly confirm the conclusion.

The respondents were not called on.

No. 75.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question of competency is not now before us. The question is one of expediency, but a case of expediency has not been made out. On the contrary, if I may judge from what has passed during the last three years, that no such case has been made out. It was urged by the defenders, that a number of the documents and papers, and some of the principal witnesses acquainted with the facts, were in England. There may be some truth in the statement. But the pursuers meet it by a counter allegation, that the books and accounts of the Carron Company, and the great bulk of the documentary evidence, of which a voluminous inventory has been produced, are in Scotland; and that if parole proof shall be necessary, the Scotch witnesses will probably be more numerous than the English; and they contend, therefore, that, so far as the matter of proof goes, the balance of convenience greatly preponderates in favour of Scotland. Besides, the Court have repeatedly disregarded such considerations as grounds for staying proceedings in Scotland. See Sir John Mires v. York Buildings Company, 2d January 1728, M. 8290; Parker v. Royal Exchange Company, 13th January 1846, 8 D. 365.

“When the defenders applied to the English Courts for an injunction to restrain the proceedings of the Carron Company in Scotland, first, in respect of the administration suit, and, afterwards, in respect of the second suit for the transfer of the shares, the argument in support of the motion on both occasions proceeded on the ground, that it was more convenient that the proceedings should take place in England than in Scotland, and in both instances the defenders were unsuccessful. In delivering judgment upon the appeal in the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor stated, that he had no doubt of the jurisdiction of the Court to restrain proceedings in a foreign country, where this appeared to be expedient or necessary to secure the ends of justice; and he referred to ‘instances of the interference of the Court in cases where matters in dispute could not be so conveniently disposed of in the country in which the subject in dispute was placed, as they could be before the Courts in England. Under this plea of convenience the Court of Chancery restrained the parties from litigation in another country.’ Cases were also noticed where the Court had refused to interfere on the ground that the matter in dispute could be most conveniently disposed of in Scotland. In this state of the authorities, the Lord Chancellor expressed a decided opinion that the Carron Company, as a Scotch corporation, ought not to be precluded from suing in Scotland, and that it would be alike unjust and inexpedient to restrain them from doing so.

“When the new injunction was applied for and refused by the Lord Justices, on 18th December 1855, the Lord Chancellor stated that the second suit instituted in Chancery for the transfer of the Carron Company shares did not, in his opinion, vary the case, and observed,—‘I must guard myself against admitting that, in any circumstances, a suit instituted here for an account, without any decree on which another party could proceed, unless a special case is made, can be a foundation for restraining the defendant here from being an actor in his own country. It may be that he may get his remedy much quicker and speedier in his own country than he can get it here.’ Lord Justice Turner said,—the argument in support of this motion has proceeded on the only ground on which it could proceed, that it was more convenient that the proceedings should take place in England, and that the motion should proceed here, than that it should proceed in Scotland. On that subject it is to be observed, that the Scotch Courts had first jurisdiction in this matter, by the proceedings taken in Scotland by the Carron Company. It is to be observed, also, that this is not a case of extreme inconvenience in proceeding in Scotland, but that it is a case in which there is convenience and inconvenience on one side and the other, and it is a question on the balance of convenience. I have no hesitation in stating, that, in my opinion, in order to warrant interference in cases of this description before decree, it is incumbent on the party who applies to the Court for an injunction, to make out an exceedingly strong case to restrain a defendant from proceeding in the exercise of his legal rights. I think the motion must be refused with costs.’”

No. 75. it would be very inexpedient to prevent the party having an interest to get decree from proceeding with his case. Whether anything may hereafter occur which may be a reason for stopping short is a point about which I say nothing at present.

LORDS IVORY and CURRIEHILL concurred.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion. I concur very much with the observations of the Lord Ordinary in his note, and think it unnecessary to go into detail. The reclaimers, throughout their argument, assumed that the onus lies on the other party of making out a strong case of expediency in going on here, and a strong case of inexpediency in going on in England. I doubt if that be a sound view. They conceded the competency of the action in this Court. They conceded that the Court has jurisdiction, and that the whole question is one of convenience and expediency. This being so, it appears to me that the onus lies on the reclaimers, in the first instance at all events, to make out a case of inconvenience and inexpediency in proceeding here, which they have not even attempted to do, and which I do not see how they could have done if they had attempted it.

THE COURT adhered, with additional expenses.

No. 76. ROBERT MALCOLM KERR AND MANDATORY, Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Maitland—Millar.

ARCHIBALD HAMILTON AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Lord Adv. Moncreiff—J. Lorimer.

Process—Act 13 & 14 Vict. cap. 36—Proof before answer.—In a declarator by a proprietor against certain feuars for a yearly payment by them for the use of certain roads and bridges under their feu-contracts,—Held a proper course for the Lord Ordinary, before answer, to order proof of the practice since the date of the feu-contracts—probation not being renounced; and observed by Lord Deas, that since the Act 13 & 14 Vict. cap. 36, the objection to proofs before answer, in certain cases, has been thereby much taken away.

Jan. 28, 1857. 1ST DIVISION. Lord Neaves. C. THE facts of this case were thus stated by the Lord Ordinary in the note appended to his interlocutor:—
 “This action is brought by the pursuer, as superior of the lands of Hillhead, to declare and enforce his alleged right to, or payment of, sixteen shillings yearly, originally imposed on certain feus held by the defenders of portions of that property.

“Gibson was the original proprietor of Hillhead, which is situated near the river Kelvin. He built a bridge over the river, and entered into an agreement (No. 11 of process) with David Smith, a neighbouring proprietor, for the use of a road adjoining the bridge, and connecting it with a public thoroughfare. For this servitude or privilege, Gibson was to pay Smith a sum of L.15 a-year in name of ground-rent, the arrangement commencing from 1820.

“Gibson, or Reid his trustee, thereafter feued out certain portions of Hillhead to Hamilton, the defenders’ author, for payment of a small feu-duty, with taxed entries in common form. The feu-contract further contained the clause founded on by the pursuer, whereby it was declared ‘that the said John Hamilton shall, along with the other feuars of Hillhead, have such a right in all time coming, as the said Andrew Reid and his foresaids can give to the use of the bridge made and erected by the said James Gibson across the river Kelvin, and the roads leading to and from the said bridge, through the lands feued by the said David Smith on both sides of the river from the trustees of Archibald Campbell of Blythwood, and the said James Gibson, and also the said John Hamilton or his foresaids, shall have right to the use of all the other roads and bridges made or to be made by the said Andrew Reid or his foresaids, or the said James Gibson or his foresaids, for the use of the feuars of the lands of Hillhead. Declaring that the said John Hamil ton and his foresaids shall pay yearly the sum of sixteen shillings for the use of the foresaid roads and bridges.' No. 76.

"Gibson, who had also granted other feus of Hillhead, then conveyed the whole property to the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons in Glasgow, by whom it was immediately feued out to him again, so far as not already feued. The effect of these transactions was simply to vest the Faculty with the mere superiority, the dominium utile of the lands being partly in the original feuars and partly in Gibson himself. The pursuer is precisely in the position of the Faculty. Jan. 28, 1857. Kerr v. Hamilton.

"In these circumstances, the question arises, as to the pursuer's right to this yearly sum of sixteen shillings. If it were part of the proper estate of superiority, his claim would be good. But it is thought that it can not be so considered. It is neither part of the reddendo, nor is it a feudal casualty. It is an annuity declared a real burden, but not necessarily or naturally attached to the superiority."

The defenders pleaded—(1), no title to pursue; (2), no right or title to the annual payment claimed by the pursuer.

The Lord Ordinary, on 24th November 1854, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has not produced or set forth any good right or title to sue for, or recover the sums of money libelled: Therefore, and to that effect, sustains the first and second pleas in law for the defenders, dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c. *

The pursuers reclaimed, and on 12th December 1855 the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In respect the defenders refuse to renounce probation, recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against in hoc statu, and remit to his Lordship to proceed with the cause, reserving all questions of expenses."

On 14th November 1856, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds it advisable that, before determining the cause, the following questions of fact should be inquired into under the 48th section of the statute 13 & 14 Vict. c. 36, viz., 1st, Whether, from the 24th day of April 1828 till the raising of the present action, the annual sum of 16s., stipulated in the feu-contract No. 32 of process, was paid by the defenders and their author to James Gibson, sometime of Hillhead, and applied by him towards, or in part satisfaction of the sum of L.15, payable for a servitude or right of road connected with the lands of Hillhead, in terms of the agree-

* "NOTE.—If the pursuer cannot claim this payment as superior of the lands, it is doubtful if he can found in this action on any other title. But neither does the right seem to have been assigned or disposed to the pursuer as a subject separate from the superiority. It is not mentioned in the conveyance in favour of his authors or himself, and there seems no assignation to him that can be held to cover it. It does not seem to have passed with the disposition of the lands granted by Gibson to the Faculty, but if it did, it would immediately have reverted to Gibson by the feu-disposition which the Faculty granted to him again. If it was no part of the proper superiority estate, it would pass as much under a disposition in feu as under a disposition of the plenum dominium."

"The pursuer is not said to be the party who is now bound to pay the cumulo sum of L.15 to Mr Smith, and there seems reason for holding that this payment of 16s. is a mere contribution towards the larger payment. Neither is the pursuer at least at present the creditor in that payment of L.15, so as to entitle him to this as a part of it. On the other hand, the pursuer is not the proprietor of any of the roads or accommodations for which the payment is imposed. He seems thus to have no equitable claim to uplift this sum, and if, as already assumed, it is not a proper part of his superiority estate, but a separate right, or jus crediti, to which he holds no disposition or assignation, express or implied, his title fails, and his demand must be unsuccessful."

ment No. 11 of process: 2d, Whether no such sum of 16s., or any part thereof, was paid by the defenders or their author to the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons of Glasgow, or was demanded from them by the said Faculty between the said month of April 1828, when the said Faculty acquired the superiority of the said lands of Hillhead, and the 10th day of November 1842, when they conveyed the superiority to the defenders: 3d, Whether the feu-duties of the said lands of Hillhead, stated and warranted in the titles of the said Faculty and the pursuer respectively, as amounting in all to the cumulo sum of L.133, 3s. 11½d., amounted to that sum, exclusively of the sum of 16s. now in dispute: Therefore, before answer, appoints the said questions of fact to be tried before the Lord Ordinary himself, without a jury, on a day to be afterwards fixed, the defenders taking the lead in the proof." *

The pursuer reclaimed, and pleaded;—That the proof allowed was not relevant to the issue. He craved judgment on the merits. But on a question by the Court, he refused to allow the case to go to judgment on the assumption that the facts were as stated by the defender.

The respondents were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I see no reason for disturbing the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. His Lordship has thought it proper to have certain matters expiscated before giving judgment, and the mode proposed by him for doing that is expedi-

* "NOTE.—Under the remit made by the Court in this case, the Lord Ordinary has reconsidered the averments of parties, in order to see whether any inquiry into disputed facts might advantageously be made at this stage.

"Some material points seem already to be fixed by admission or by appropriate written evidence. It is admitted that an agreement existed, being No. 11 of process, between Mr Gibson of Hillhead and Mr David Smith, by which the proprietor of Hillhead agreed to pay the sum of L.15 for an important right of road for the use of his lands. The pursuer himself was, at one time, in right of that agreement, as the party entitled to receive the stipulated payment of L.15.

"The defenders say that Mr Gibson, in feuing out the lands of Hillhead, allocated this sum of L.15 among the different feuars. The Lord Ordinary thinks that this allegation, whatever it means, can only be proved by the feu-contracts, or other documents, fixing the rights of parties. It appears, that in some feu-contracts or charters, to which the pursuer himself was a party, the feuars were taken bound to pay to Smith a certain proportion, eo nomine, of the sum of L.15 referred to. But the feu-contract of the defenders is not expressed in the same way, and it cannot therefore be said, on the same grounds, that the 16s. in question is, in their case, an allocation of the L.15. The 16s. is made payable in the defenders' contract for roads, but it is not made payable to Smith, nor is it declared to be a proportion of the L.15. If it be meant that Gibson, or Reid his trustee, in granting this contract, intended the payment to stand on this footing, it is thought that such intention cannot competently be made the subject of a general proof.

"It seems to the Lord Ordinary, however, that the mode in which the parties acted in the matter, may be a legitimate subject of inquiry. One question here is, whether this payment of 16s. forms a part or appendage of the superiority estate, and there may be some ambiguity in the terms of the deed in regard to it. But, in April 1828, within a few days after the date of the defenders' feu-contract, the superiority estate was conveyed to the Faculty of Physicians, and if from that time to the raising of this action, a period now of upwards of twenty years, the sum of 16s. has always been paid to Gibson, and has gone pro tanto to relieve him of his liability for the L.15; if it was never paid to the Faculty of Physicians during the fourteen years for which they were superiors; and if, as the pursuer alleges, it has never been paid to him; if, moreover, in the titles both of the Faculty and of the pursuer, the feu-duties were estimated at a certain cumulo sum, of which the 16s. formed no part, these points seem to be elements for consideration, which ought not to be overlooked, and as to which, at any rate, it seems advisable that inquiry should be made before the case is finally disposed of."

tious in itself, and falls under his own cognisance. If the case had been allowed to take its course under his Lordship's interlocutor of 14th November last, the proof would most probably have been completed during session. But the pursuer has reclaimed, and prayed us to repel the defences, and to declare in terms of the libel. Upon the merits, however, the defenders have not yet been heard, for the first discussion related to the pursuer's title, and this last discussion was upon the proof allowed by the Lord Ordinary under our remit. I cannot say that, on looking into the case, the matters which the Lord Ordinary has wished to have explicated are totally impertinent to the case. Moreover, they have pressed themselves on his Lordship's mind before proceeding to give judgment. For my own part, I should also like to have them cleared up; and I am rather confirmed in that view by the circumstance that the pursuer will not allow the case to be decided on the assumption that these matters of fact are as stated by the defenders. I think, therefore, that we should not disturb the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and that the proper course is to send the case back to him.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion. I do not like this habit of coming here and raising discussions on every little question in the conduct of a case, and I agree that the best test of the pertinency of these averments is, that the pursuer has so little confidence in his own view, that he will not allow the case to go to judgment on the assumption that they are as stated by the defender. What the Lord Ordinary has proposed is probation before answer. I do not say what my opinion shall be when these facts are admitted, or proved, or disproved. When, in the preparation of a case, the Lord Ordinary has thought that on part of the case he would like to have some more light, I cannot interfere with his discretion. As to deciding the case on the merits before it has been brought up to that point before the Lord Ordinary, it would be pessimi exempli to sustain such a proposal.

LORD CURRIEMILL.—The practice which has rather crept into the Outer-House of deciding on the relevancy, has been reprobated by your Lordship. The Lord Ordinary has here so far followed your Lordship's directions. He has pronounced no judgment on the relevancy, and has saved that question by allowing proof before answer. When the facts are ascertained, that question shall be decided. It is said that they are clearly impertinent; but the question here is, what is the meaning of certain documents under which the parties have been acting for nearly thirty years? and under mutual contracts it is always an important element in the construction of them to see how the parties have been acting, for they are supposed to know their own meaning. That is all that the Lord Ordinary has proposed to ascertain. I concur with your Lordship.

LORD DEAS.—I entirely agree with your Lordship; and I only wish to take the opportunity of making a single general observation. Since the Judicature Act was passed, the practice has been discountenanced of allowing proofs before answer. The objection to that course has been the delay and expense. Were it not for that objection, there can be no doubt that it would frequently be desirable to have the facts precisely ascertained in the first instance, in place of deciding in limine matters of law and relevancy which may never require to be decided at all. It has always appeared to me, since the Act 13 & 14 Vict. c. 36 was passed, that the objection to proofs before answer, in certain cases, has been thereby much taken away. Under sect. 48 of that statute the proof can be led before the Lord Ordinary without delay, at very little comparative expense, and in a manner most satisfactory as to its results. And when the Lord Ordinary, in the exercise of his discretion, rejects a proof before answer, under that enactment, on points necessary to satisfy or remove difficulties in his mind, I should, for my own part, require a strong case to be made out before interfering with that discretion. In the present case, I agree with your Lordship that it is impossible to say that the facts averred may not have bearing upon the question to be decided, as, indeed, is indicated by the reclaimer's prayer to have the case decided on the assumption that these facts are admitted.

C.

THE funds requisite for the relief of the poor of the parish of Old Deer are raised in virtue of the Act 8th & 9th Vict. cap. 83. This Act confers upon parochial boards powers for imposing the assessment upon all lands and heritages according to their annual value, and section 37 provides "that in estimating the annual value of lands and heritages, the same shall be taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, such lands and heritages might, in their actual state, be reasonably expected to let from year to year, under deduction of the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain such lands and heritages in their actual state, and all rates, taxes, and public charges payable in respect of the same."

The pursuer is a landed proprietor in the parish of Old Deer, and the object of this action was to set aside the assessment on his own land, which he averred was over-rated, and on two farms belonging to the defender Mr James Ferguson, and occupied by his brother, also a defender, Mr John Ferguson, which he averred were under-rated, for the year from Whitsunday 1853 to Whitsunday 1854. The grounds of action were thus summed up by the pursuer:—"The parochial board have, on the one hand, subjected the pursuer's home-farm, and other grounds in his personal occupancy, to the valuation of a professional land-valuator, and have ordered land recently brought into cultivation by him to be valued, and the value added to his assessable rental; while, on the other hand, and through the influence of the defenders, they have refused to order a valuation of the defenders' said farms, notwithstanding the strong averments made, and which are true in point of fact, of their being under-rated, and have refused to order the 100 acres recently brought into cultivation by the defender Mr John Ferguson from heath to be valued, or the true value thereof to be added to the defenders' assessable rental. The resolution of the board, on the motion of the defenders, to assess upon the pursuer's newly cultivated ground, was passed at a meeting held on 7th June 1853, and the resolution to act differently in regard to the defenders' own newly cultivated ground of 100 acres was passed on the 11th July thereafter, there being only a few weeks between the two meetings; and although the defenders refused to appoint a valuation to be made of the Messrs Ferguson's lands, on the pretence that their rent was ascertainable from the lease, they, in several other instances, appointed the true value of farms belonging to other persons to be ascertained, although under leases at specified rents. Against this inconsistent conduct of the board in unduly favouring the defenders, Messrs Ferguson, the pursuer protested for remedy as accords of law."

It appeared that Mr Ferguson had let the farms to his brother on a nineteen years' lease in usual terms, with a deduction on one of the farms (Newton) of L.50 for five years, in lieu of all improvements. The parochial board took the rent in the lease, as being, in their opinion, a fair and one. It was higher than the valued rent upon which the property-tax was assessed, "and being so, they did not agree to the demand of the pursuer, who did not offer to pay the expense, to have it specially valued merely to gratify him." The proceedings of the parochial board in regard to the objections by the pursuer to the alleged over-valuation of his own property and the under-valuation of the defenders' property were detailed. The pursuer was either personally present or represented at all the meetings, and in fixing the valuation upon the pursuer's property of which he complained, the parochial board stated that "they did so with an earnest desire to deal out equal justice to Mr Russell as to the other rate-payers." It farther appeared that the amount at which the pursuer estimated the defenders' farms to be under-valued was about L.20.

In these circumstances the pursuer pleaded;—That whatever the principle of assessment adopted, all the lands and heritages in the parish ought to be dealt with equally and on the same footing.

The Lord Ordinary, on 20th March 1855, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that no sufficient grounds for reducing the assessment complained of have been alleged by the pursuer: Finds that where lands are possessed under leases for usual terms, and with usual conditions, the yearly rents payable under such leases afford the best criterion for ascertaining and determining the annual value, under section 37 of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, and that no special and unusual provisions appear in the leases in process, so as to take the case out of the general rule; the mere circumstance that the landlord and tenant are brothers not being sufficient to create such specialty, where there is a written contract of lease: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable to the defenders in expenses," &c.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and pleaded;—That according to the terms of the lease, the farm of Newton must now be improved to the extent of L.500. This was therefore, in point of fact, an improving lease, which was not to be taken as the true criterion of the value of the farm during the whole currency. Inquiry ought therefore to be made how far the farm was improved.

The defenders founded on the case of Ainslie v. Turnbull as conclusive.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This action is founded on two grounds—the over-valuation of the pursuer's own lands, which has not been pressed, and the under-valuation of the Messrs Ferguson's land. The pursuer has not stated the extent to which that affects him, and it may be a small extent. But the allegation that lands in the parish are under-valued is a relevant allegation on the part of a proprietor, and in many cases it may be important in its consequences. The allegation here, however, is not very specific. The lands are in a peculiar position. They are not ordinary lands, the value of which is to be ascertained by persons of skill. They are such that affords prima facie evidence of their value, unless something appear to indicate that there are special reasons for the rent being less than the annual value of the lands. There are leases in which it would be clear that the rental stated is not a fair valuation of the land at the time the lands came to be valued. There are improving leases in various parts of the country, which profess to proceed on a small rent, in consideration of the improvements to be made; and there are very long leases, for example, in the west of Perthshire, where the rent is no fair test of the present value of the land; but the leases in the present case are of ordinary endurance. There is no stipulation in them of an unusual character. One of them, indeed, contains a stipulation as to draining. That is not an unusual stipulation. It is an ordinary stipulation; and although, under almost all leases, there may be a variation one year from another in the value of the lands, by reason of a certain amount of improvement taking place, or change in the markets, it is not intended that there shall be a new valuation of these lands every year. That is out of the question. The valuation is presumed to be fairly stated in the lease, unless something appear to the contrary. Now, in this case, the board had various discussions, at which the reclaimer was present or was represented. The matters of fact set forth at these meetings are stated in the minutes,—which rather appear to me to contain more than the usual amount of discussion as to the valuation of these lands. It is not averred that either of the farms were let at an under-valuation, and therefore it appears to me that there is no ground for holding that the board in this case did not make sufficient inquiry as to their value. If that be so, it follows that the reasons of reduction fall. There may be cases in which special inquiry would be allowed, but it is not to be allowed without very strong statements. It would be exceedingly inconvenient and expensive were it otherwise, and the statement of which proof is to be allowed must be a very strong one indeed. The lease is not to be conclusive in all cases; but there would require to be a very specific statement made against it. There is no such specific statement here, and therefore I adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

* "NOTE.—The general rule as regards valuation under the 37th section of the Act was distinctly laid down in the case of Ainslie v. Turnbull, 12th July 1854. The parochial board have here proceeded in the usual manner, and have adopted the actual rent payable under current leases of ordinary endurance as the criterion of value. That there may be an exceptional case, in which such a criterion would be deceptive, is beyond doubt; but very precise and special averments, or very unusual and suspicious provisions in the leases, are necessary to raise such a case. There are none such here. To the landlord the rent is truly the value during the lease, and the 34th section deals with the rights of landlord and tenant, as measured by the same estimate of annual value. The authority of the case of Murray v. Murray, 25th May 1852, is not opposed to the case of Ainslie, nor, it is thought, to the present interlocutor."

LORD IVORY.—I concur. The case of Ainslie fixed this, at least, that there is not to be a valuation of the lands from year to year. Generally speaking, under a bona fide lease, the object of both parties must be to give and receive such an amount of rent as, taking one year with another, shall be the fair value of the subject during that lease. An improving lease, in which the prestations might vary from year to year, may not be conclusive proof of the value of the lands, but it must always be an element in the valuation, and unless in very strong cases, it is not to be assumed to be other than a bona fide contract. The pursuer here makes an objection to his own valuation. That is not supported otherwise than that it is in excess if the assessment on the other lands is under-rated; because the objection is, that if the other parties had been assessed more, his proportion of the assessment would have amounted to so much less. That is relevant, if established. But to what extent it is made out, is an important consideration in a question of this kind. The pursuer's averments may import a legal interest to sue; but when you examine his interest, and measure it by the interest allowed by the statute—viz. the correction of the assessment to the extent the party is injured by it—the interest of this pursuer is practically of a very evanescent kind. It is simply this—that a sum of L.20 shall be divided over the parish. Now I am not disposed to say that that is not a legal interest, sufficient to give a legal title to sue in a very rigorous sense; but it is not a ground on which the Court ought very readily to interfere with the proceedings of the board, where the lease itself, and the proceedings, show that there has been no tangible departure from the working of the statute. The board seems to have given all the attention in their power to this matter, and the result has been, that they have repelled the objections now stated to us. Now we are here to correct when the board fall into error, but not to scrutinise in such a stringent way every possible question that may be raised in the course of their proceedings, as absolutely to paralyse their general duties and usefulness.

As to the L.500, I do not enter into any considerations in regard to it. There is no substantial departure from the statute in the actings of the board. A fair and honest attempt has been made by them to fulfil their duties. These leases are of the ordinary kind, and there is no such interest on the part of the pursuer as would induce the Court to strain at a construction such as shall overturn the proceedings of the board so honestly gone about.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I entirely agree. The rule of valuation set forth in the statute is, that the assessable value shall be that for which the lands may be expected to let one year with another. The statute prescribes no rule for ascertaining that valuation. That is left to the discretion of the parochial board itself; and it is well that it is so, for the members of that board have a material interest in having the valuation correct, inasmuch as it is upon themselves that the assessment falls. In the case of Ainslie, the Court decided, that in ordinary circumstances the rent stated in a lease, where there is no cause to doubt that it is a bona fide lease, is as near an approach to that value described in the statute as can be got. It is proposed here to supersede the lease, and have a valuation. Is a neutral man who knows nothing of the farm as likely to know the true value of the land as the landlord and tenant—the one having the interest to get as much rent as he can, and the other to pay as little as he can? What they agree upon, is the nearest approach to the true rent that we can get. There may be exceptions, to which your Lordship has referred, as in the case of the Blair-Drummond mosses in Perthshire, or of old leases intended to endure for several generations. But here there is nothing unusual in either of the leases. There is no doubt a stipulation as to draining, and the rent is calculated with regard to that improvement. But you cannot go into every minute detail, otherwise the lease would be useless as a criterion of value altogether. Further, the board here have not adopted the rent without inquiry, and that is more satisfactory to my mind than the valuation of a professional man; and therefore I think this is not an exceptional case. I also am for adhering.

LORD DEAS.—I entirely agree with your Lordship in the chair. There is no allegation in this record that any of the leases were entered into collusively, or that the rents were fixed at an undervalue from favour to the tenants or otherwise. Neither is there any allegation that the parochial board acted unfairly or collusively, or that they did not exercise their discretion to the best of their ability. They took into view the fact (as we see from a minute of 5th June 1851), that L.500 was to be expended by the tenant in draining, along with the fact that, in consequence of his doing so, he was to receive a deduction of L.50 per annum for the first five years; and, with these facts before them, they satisfied themselves and came to the resolution that the rent stipulated for the remainder of the lease was a fair rent. I see nothing stated to entitle us to overrule that resolution.

THE COURT adhered, with additional expenses.

Judicial Factor—Special Powers.—Special powers granted to a judicial factor as a mortification to compromise an action brought by him against certain ex officio trustees, on the ground of gross negligence in allowing certain funds belonging to the mortification to be invested in the name of the treasurer in his individual name, whereby the money was lost. Question, to what extent do ex officio trustees undertake the responsibilities, and become bound to the same strict diligence as trustees under private trusts?

THE petitioner was, in 1853, appointed judicial factor upon the trust-estate of the deceased Alexander MacRa, who was an ironmonger in Bristol, and died in 1780. A sum of L.1666, 13s. 4d. was directed by Mr MacRa to be held in trust, in the first place, for behoof of certain annuitants, who are all now dead, and ultimately for behoof of as many indigent boys of the name of MacRa as the remainder of the bequest could support. The last annuitant died in 1850.

The trust has been in operation since about the year 1786. The trustees who accepted and acted were eight in number, all resident in Aberdeen, and holding official positions there. It is in virtue of their official positions that they are trustees of Mr MacRa.¹

In 1825 the whole trust-fund, L.1666, 13s. 4d., was lent out on heritable security. It was repaid in 1845, and receipt of the amount was acknowledged and the security discharged by six of the eight trustees. The money was then lent by the trustees temporarily to the Northern Investment Company until another suitable heritable security could be obtained. They granted as a document of debt a promissory-note payable to "James Nicol, advocate, Aberdeen, as treasurer for the trustees of the late Alexander MacRa." In January 1847, at a meeting of the trustees, at which three only of the eight were present (and by the trust-deed five are requisite for a quorum), the agent, Mr Nicol, reported that a suitable heritable security had been found, and he was accordingly authorised so to lend the money. About six months afterwards, namely, 21st June 1847, Mr Nicol uplifted the money from the Northern Investment Company. In place of lending it on the heritable security as directed, it remained unsecured in his hands, or those of his firm, Nicol and Monro, whose estates were sequestrated in November 1850, and the whole fund lost, with the exception of a dividend of about L.500 from the estates of the bankrupts.

The petitioner lodged a claim upon the sequestrated estate of Nicol and Monro for L.1704, 3s. 2d.

The object of this petition was to obtain the authority of the Court to accept of a sum of about L.964 in full of a claim of about L.1532, which the judicial factor had made against the trustees of the fund, to make good that part of the fund which the factor alleges had been lost in consequence of gross negligence on their part.

The petition stated, that when the bankruptcy of Messrs Nicol and Monro occurred, the parties interested in the management and proper application of the mortified fund laid a memorial before counsel for their opinion as to the liability of those trustees who had acted, and were acting, at the time when the fund was misappropriated by Messrs Nicol and Monro, to make good the loss to which that misappropriation had given rise. Such an opinion was obtained; and, in accordance therewith, the petitioner had prepared a summons against those trustees for the purpose of enforcing payment of the whole amount of the mortified fund, and accumulated interest, as at the date of its misappropriation, making up the said sum of L.1704, 3s. 2d., under deduction of all dividends to be obtained from the estates of Messrs Nicol and Monro, and James Nicol. But before this summons had been adjusted and executed, proposals were made to the petitioner for a compromise of the claim by the payment of such a sum as, with the dividends received and to be received from the estates of Messrs Nicol and Monro, and James Nicol, should make up the principal sum which formed the amount of the mortified trust-fund, but without any of the interest due.

The amount of principal to be thus paid was about L.1160. The amount of interest due, and now proposed to be given up for an immediate settlement, was about L.600, exclusive of the expenses incurred to the trust, which were estimated at about L.100.

The proceedings were laid before counsel, who recommended a compromise. The Lord Ordinary then remitted to Mr James Duncan, W.S., to inquire into the facts. His report was very minute. It appeared that the claim of the factor was directed against twenty-three trustees, many of whom had acted sometime between the years 1832 and 1850, in virtue of their office of senior minister of Aberdeen, senior bailie, dean of guild, or deacon convener of the craftsmen of that burgh; and the Reporter's opinion was, that the loss of the money had arisen so much more directly from an act of fraud on the part of the treasurer, than as a direct consequence of negligence of an extraordinary kind on the part of the trustees, that the judicial factor might find difficulty in having the trustees (against whom the want of bona fides was not alleged) subjected to a penalty as full as if it had been they themselves who had misapplied and appropriated the money. And, in the whole circumstances, the Reporter was very strongly of opinion that it would be highly advantageous for the trust-estate were the Court to authorise the judicial factor to accept of the terms of compromise offered by the late trustees. The judicial factor was himself of this opinion. He stated, that laying altogether out of view the circumstances of peculiar hardship in which the claim originated, he had been advised that a serious ground of litigation might arise from the fact that the trustees were, in this instance, official parties, who maintained that, in facilitating the management of such a mortification, they did not undertake the responsibilities, and were not to be held bound to as strict diligence as trustees under private trusts; and that they had no view or intention to take such an immediate and direct superintendence and management as would render them in any way pecuniarily responsible for the actings of the factor, whom all or most of them found in the administration of the mortified fund on their becoming connected with it. There would be difficulty also in proving the acts of intromission of the successive trustees for which liability was sought to be imposed on them. The representatives of some of them were moreover in impoverished circumstances; and the petitioner understood that, should the offer of compromise be refused, it was in contemplation by the parties who were in better circumstances, against whom the claim was made, seriously to dispute their liability; and should the petitioner be forced into a protracted litigation, in which it was at least possible that he might be unsuccessful, the whole of the trust-estate, in this event, would probably be exhausted.¹

The Lord Ordinary reported the case, expressing himself also favourable to the compromise.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It would be very unfortunate if the Court had no power to authorise a judicial factor to enter into a transaction of this kind. In this case the balance is greatly in favour of entering into a compromise, and we shall grant the requisite power for doing so.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, on the report of Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary, authorise the petitioner to accept of the offer of compromise to which the petition relates; and on payment by the late trustees or their representatives, of such a sum as (with the dividends received from the estates of Nicol and Monro, and James Nicol) shall make up the capital sum of L.1666, 13s. 4d., being the amount of the principal of the mortified fund, to discharge the said trustees, and their heirs and representatives, of all claims competent to the petitioner, as judicial factor, or to those beneficially interested in the said mortified fund, in respect of the actings and intromission of the said trustees with the said fund."

Hay v. Defender.—D. F. Inglis—Baillie.

DAVID M'DONALD (Inspector of the Poor of the Parish of Laurencekirk), Defender.—Cook—Lee.

Poor—Settlement—Parish—Idiotcy and Insanity.—Held (applying the principle of the judgment of the House of Lords in Adamson v. Barbour, and reversing the judgment of the whole Court in Thomson v. Morris, altering also the judgment of Lord Neaves in this case), that the burden of supporting a pauper lunatic in pupillarity, whose father was alive, but had no settlement except in the parish of his birth, fell not upon the parish of the lunatic's birth but upon the parish of the father's birth.

1st Division. ROBERT GREIG was born in the parish of Laurencekirk. He never Lord Neaves. acquired a residence by settlement in any other parish in Scotland. For C. eight or nine years prior to 1847 he was resident in Ireland. In 1848 he and his family became destitute, and applied for and received relief from the city parish of Edinburgh for three months. These advances were afterwards repaid by the parish of Laurencekirk. In 1853 Greig was for some time confined in the prison of Edinburgh. At the date of this action he was resident in Fifeshire.

Thomas Greig was his lawful son, and was born in the parish of Dalkeith on 28th April 1838. In December 1853, in consequence of the imprisonment of his father and otherwise, Thomas Greig, then residing in Edinburgh, became destitute, and an object of parochial relief. Since his infancy he had been subject to fits of epilepsy, and since the date of his destitution in 1853, had been confined as a lunatic in the Morningside Asylum. For five years before the date of this action he had been admittedly in an insane state. The father was earning from 8s. to 11s. per week, out of which he had himself, a wife, and several children to support.

This action was brought in May 1854 by the parish of Edinburgh for repayment by the parish of Laurencekirk, or by the parish of Dalkeith, of the alimentary advances and sums expended in the boarding and supporting of Thomas Greig, first in the poors'-house of Edinburgh, and thereafter in the Asylum at Morningside for the insane.

There was no dispute as to the facts, and by joint minute the defenders, with the view of saving expense, agreed to relieve the pursuer in terms of the libel, and to pay his expenses, under reservation, inter se, of their respective pleas and non-liability pleaded by each. The question therefore was, whether the parish of the father's birth (Laurencekirk) or the parish of the pauper lunatic's birth (Dalkeith) was liable.

Pleaded for Dalkeith;—As the alleged pauper is a minor, and is a lunatic, or at least imbecile or fatuous, and is not forisfamiliated, his settlement follows that of his father, as the head of the family of which he is a member.
Farther, the father of the pauper had no settlement in the parish of Dal-keith, and has no settlement in any parish within Scotland, therefore the parish of Laurencekirk, as the parish of the father's birth, is bound to support the pauper.

Pleaded for Laurencekirk;—The maintenance of the pauper lunatic is a burden separable from that of the maintenance of his father's family, and must be borne by the parish of his own and not of his father's birth.

The Lord Ordinary, on 2d March 1855, pronounced the following interlocutor:—" Finds that Thomas Greig, mentioned in the record, is a proper object of parochial relief, and entitled to the same: Finds that the parish of Dalkeith, as the parish of the said pauper's birth, is bound to relieve the parish of Edinburgh, at whose expense he is now supported, of the burden of his maintenance, and that the parish of Laurencekirk, as the parish of his father's birth, is not bound so to do: Therefore, sustains the defences for the parish of Laurencekirk, and assoilzies the defender, David M'Donald, inspector of said parish, from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Repels the defences for the defender, Alexander Paterson, inspector of the parish of Dalkeith, and finds, declares, and decerns against him in terms of the alternative declaratory and petitory conclusions of the libel: Finds the parish of Dalkeith liable in expenses to the parish of Laurencekirk, and also to the pursuer," &c. *

Hay v.
Paterson.

Paterson (for Dalkeith, the parish of the pauper's birth) reclaimed, and pleaded;—That the case of Barbour was decisive of the question that a child must follow his father's settlement, however that settlement might be constituted. Settlements by birth equally with settlements by residence enured to the children. It was clear that when Thomson v. Morris was decided, that question was not settled, and, therefore, the majority of the Court there addressed their minds to the question—some of them under the impression that the birth-settlement would not avail the children, and some of them that it would. That judgment, therefore, was open to remark, both as pronounced in ignorance of the principle since established, and as shewing that the reasoning by which the different members of the Court then arrived at the same result was not precisely the same. But the question arose, what was to be the judgment now when it had been decided that residential settlement was not stronger than settlement by birth? A lunatic,—at all events, a lunatic, whose lunacy, as in this case, had commenced during pupillarity,—was in the same position as a pupil. There was no difference between a lunatic pupil and a sane pupil. In the case of a pupil there was an absolute incapacity to acquire a settlement for himself, and it therefore followed that he must take the parent's settlement, viz., the settlement of his father, if legitimate, and of his mother if illegitimate. In the present case, it was admitted that the lunatic had not acquired any settlement for himself, and there was the same incapacity. There was no distinction in this respect between an idiot and a pupil. They both laboured under a legal incapacity. The settlement of the lunatic in this case was therefore in the parish of the father's settlement, which was Laurencekirk, the parish of his birth.

Pleaded for Laurencekirk, the parish of the father's birth;—The judgment in Thomson v. Morris was not displaced by the decision in Barbour v. Adamson. There was no conflict between the cases. In Barbour v. Adamson the children were pupils, whose father had been transported. In Thomson v. Morris, and in the present case, the pauper was a lunatic above pupillarity, whose father was able-bodied, and was maintaining himself and the rest of his family. It had been decided in M'Tear v. Lindsay that an able-bodied man had no claim to relief on account of his children, and that the children themselves had no claim to such relief. A lunatic child, however, was admitted in this case to be a proper object of parochial relief itself. It must therefore be a special and exceptional case. The 59th section of the statute dealt with it as such, excluding, in such cases, the principle of keeping families together. If this was an exceptional case in one respect—as giving a child a claim to relief not otherwise possessed—was it not also an exceptional case, as giving the child in such a situation a settlement of its own? Who was the pauper? Not the father, because the claims of the lunatic to relief had been admitted altogether irrespective of the father—but clearly the lunatic himself. His settlement, therefore, must be in the parish of his own birth, unless he had acquired and retained some other settlement. In this case the pauper had acquired no settlement, and the judgment in Thomson v. Morris, which distinguished this as a peculiar class of cases, ought to be applied.¹

* "NOTE.—Apart from the authority of the case of Thomson v. Morris, 19th July 1850, ante, vol. xii. p. 1266, the Lord Ordinary's judgment in the present case could probably have been different from that which he has pronounced. He can see no general principle on which a minor lunatic, who has not acquired a residential settlement, should be thrown on his own birth-settlement while his father is alive. It seems clear that a pupil, whether of sound or unsound mind, follows the settlement of its father; and it is difficult to discover how that settlement should be changed merely by the arrival of puberty or the existence of insanity. But the case of Morris is a direct authority; and although the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Barbour v. Adamson, 1 M'Queen's Rep. 376, suggests adverse analogies of great weight, the Lord Ordinary has not thought himself entitled to depart from a clear precedent still standing unaffected by any express contrary judgment."

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case is one which required very particular attention. It is obvious that the Lord Ordinary has felt considerable difficulty in regard to it. He has felt himself, as it were, pressed between two opposing forces, and was not clear which of them ought to have the greatest influence in moving him to a conclusion. He seems to have yielded to the one to which in his position the greatest deference was due in a question of this kind; being, in his view of it, a direct decision on the point, and the other merely an inference from decisions on a collateral point. I have given to the case all the attention which its peculiar demands, and I have come to the conclusion which I shall now state.

The facts of the case are simple enough. The person who is the object of the litigation was born, it is said, about 1838, in the parish of Dalkeith. The application for support, in reference to which we are now considering this case, was commenced in 1853. At that time this party was fifteen years of age. His father was imprisoned, and the boy became an object, it is said, of parochial relief, both in consequence of the imprisonment of his father and in respect of his own condition. His own condition was this: that from infancy he was feeble, and the subject of disease, and five years before this litigation, that is to say while he was yet a pupil, he had become a lunatic. That is averred on the part of Paterson. It is admitted on the part of Macdonald, and is a settled point in the case.

The father of the lunatic was born in the parish of Laurencekirk, and does not appear to have acquired a settlement elsewhere. It is admitted by both parties that he has no other settlement. Therefore his settlement was in the parish of Laurencekirk. There is no question here in regard to any settlement by residence. The competition is between the parish of the father's birth settlement and the parish in which the lunatic was born. The Lord Ordinary has found that the parish in which the lunatic was born is the parish liable for his aliment.

It is stated in the record, and admitted,—and has been the condition of the argument throughout,—that this pauper lunatic was a proper object of parochial relief. In what precise sense that statement was made I do not know. It is made in the words which were used in another case, viz. that he was an object of parochial relief in his own right, and whether that is meant to be said I do not know. But it is very clear that he was an object of parochial relief in this sense that relief was rightly furnished to him. His father was imprisoned: he himself, at fifteen years of age, was helpless, and there was this further element in his case, that although his father was able-bodied, the obligation which, in the general case, attaches to a father to maintain his family does not necessarily attach in the case of a lunatic in the condition of life of this party, because the provisions of the Poor Law, and other provisions connected with the police of the country, may make it necessary that the lunatic should be separated from the family; and, in such a case, the obligation to furnish that sort of maintenance would not attach to a father in the condition of life in which this family is.

Hay v.
Paterson.

The question now is, who is to be liable for the maintenance furnished to him? It is a general principle, as regards pupils, that their settlement is in the parish of their father's settlement. It is also a principle that, while they are pupils, they cannot acquire settlements for themselves, even by living separate from their father. After they cease to be in pupillarity, and enter into the more advanced stage of life, they may acquire settlements for themselves by separate residence. I speak of children not subject to disability. But, in regard to lunatic children, it has not been decided—except in the case of Morris, so far as I know—that a lunatic child, though beyond pupillarity, is in a different position from a pupil. There are many reasons in respect of which the conditions of the two may be assimilated. But till the case of Morris arose, it had not been decided that a lunatic child never separated from his father has any settlement different from that of the father. There is very little of decision as to the point of time at which the settlement a child has through its father flies off. In ordinary cases it may be very soon after pupillarity. When a child becomes able-bodied and works for himself, he may acquire a settlement by residence. Questions may then arise as to the settlement which may have been acquired by himself; or if he has not acquired a new settlement, questions may arise as to his proper settlement. Upon that I do not wish to give any opinion at present. But, in the case of a lunatic who has not a capacity to acquire a settlement himself, it has never been decided, except in the case of Morris, that his settlement is other than that of his father when the application for relief is made.

But it had been previously decided that the settlement of a lunatic child is in the parish of the parent's settlement. I do not observe in the report of the case of Morris that any reference was made, either in the argument or in the opinions of the Judges, to the case of Gladsmuir, in which that point was very deliberately considered and decided. It was there decided that a lunatic child takes the settlement of its parent,—not of its own birth. The case of Gladsmuir is a leading case in the Poor-Law of Scotland. Many points were disposed of in that case, some of which had the authority of previous decisions, some not. One of the points was, that a natural child takes the settlement of its mother, and not the settlement of its own birth; and that this rule applies where the child is a lunatic, as well as where the child is not a lunatic. Another point decided there, and which had some authority from previous decisions, was, that a child living separate from its parent while in pupillarity does not acquire a separate settlement. And a third point decided there was, that, as regards the settlement of a lunatic child, the liability to maintain it during pupillarity and after pupillarity rests upon the parish of the mother's settlement, where it is a natural child. In that case the demand for relief was made in reference to aliment furnished before the child had attained the years of puberty, and also after the child had attained the years of puberty, and as to the continuing liability thereafter to maintain the child. All that matter was discussed after the child was past pupillarity, and before it had attained majority. The decision was, that the liability rested on the parish in which the mother had her settlement, and not upon the parish in which the child was born. But I see no reference made to that decision in the case of Morris. It appears to have been overlooked.

Now, that decision goes a certain length towards solving the present case. I am quite aware that in that case the mother's settlement was not in the parish of her birth. It was acquired by residence, and confirmed, I may so say, by marriage in the same parish. It was a settlement acquired by her. But that decision established an important principle, viz. that the obligation to support the child did not rest upon the parish of the child's birth in a competition with the parish in which the mother had a settlement. I am not aware that that decision has been at any time disputed. I have never heard it questioned. I hold it to be a standing decision, and one which is to be much regarded in law. The question comes to be, whether that decision or the decision in the case of Morris is to rule this case. I see no room for distinction between the case of Gladsmuir and the case of Morris except in one point, and that point is strongly pressed in the case of Morris, and appears to have weighed with the Court in that case as well as in some subsequent cases. It is this, that the parent's settlement was a birth settlement, not one acquired by residence; and it was argued, that although the child might claim a settlement, and the obligation to afford relief might rest on the parish in which the parent had a settlement in the case where that settlement was acquired by residence or otherwise, the same rule did not hold in a competition between the parishes of birth—and that, in the latter case, the obligation rests on the parish of the pauper's own birth, and not on that of the parent's birth. That distinction—that principle is urged in some of the opinions in the case of Morris, and it was the basis of decision in some subsequent cases. But that distinction or principle has, I think, been wholly overturned and displaced by the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Barbour. And I confess that if I had been called on to give an untrammelled opinion before the occurrence of either of these cases, I should have been obliged to say that I could see no reason for distinction between the case in which the settlement of the parent had been acquired by residence, and the case in which it belonged to him by birth—the nature or origin of the parent's settlement is, I think, immaterial. Such would have been my view before these cases occurred. The only question with me would have been, where is the settlement of the parent?—and, I think, that principle was distinctly laid down by the House of Lords, in altering the judgments of this Court in the case of Barbour and the previous case of Jedburgh. If that be so, I think there is a plain ground for not being bound by the decision pronounced in the case of Morris, which adopted the distinction that has since been displaced by the House of Lords. I do not say that all the Judges proceeded on that ground in that case of Morris. But it was an element which entered strongly into the decision, and so much so, that it ruled the decision in a subsequent case. But it is no longer part of our law, and I do not see that the judgment in the case of Morris would have been the same if the principle had been recognised that, where the question is what is the settlement of the parent, it is of no consequence how that settlement has been obtained. Upon these grounds, I am of opinion that the child here, a lunatic, and in puberty, takes the settlement of the parent. The parish in which the parent has a settlement is liable to maintain it. That is settled by the case of Gladsmuir. It makes no difference whether the parent's settlement was acquired by residence or belonged to him by birth. That is settled by the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Barbour; and taking these two principles, which are now fixed in our law, they lead to the conclusion that the parish of the father's settlement is liable for the maintenance of this lunatic. Whether, at any after period, by the father acquiring a residential settlement elsewhere, or by the lunatic attaining majority or otherwise, any change may be introduced into the position of parties, I do not speculate upon at present. I do not say that the mere circumstance of the child attaining majority will make a difference. But I do not mean to shut the door upon that question, which has not now been argued to us. Circumstances may arise to change the position of parties. But as regards this cause, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be altered, and the liability to maintain the pauper lunatic imposed on the parish in which the father has a settlement.

LORD IVORY.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and would have refrained from adding anything to your Lordship's observations, were it not that we are pronouncing an opinion which is to clash with previous decisions of the Court. The case of Morris, if we were to follow it literally, is undoubtedly a direct authority for the Lord Ordinary's judgment. As such his Lordship has bowed to it, although he has taken the opportunity of stating that, but for it, his judgment might have been different. The judgment of that case also bears apparently on the face of it a degree of weight which perhaps it is not entitled to in itself, for there were circumstances yielded to by some of the Judges who acquiesced in that judgment—among whom I was one—from which it would appear that they acquiesced, because at that time it was understood that there was a principle of construction of the statute which had been acted upon, and which was to be acted upon, and which, whilst it remained, we were not disposed to disturb,—a principle by which, prior to the case of Morris, the birth-place of the individual pauper was taken as a satisfactory element for fixing the liability to the exclusion of the settlement derived from parentage or otherwise. There was a pre-eminence given to such a parish. But the case of Barbour has completely subverted that previous decision, and a most valuable judgment it is in this respect, that it has displaced the application of an element not very satisfactory in itself, and which disturbed the unity of construction, and the simplicity of applying it, which otherwise would have been attained.

The true principle which applies in all these questions is resolved by the answer to the question, Who is the pauper, and what is the settlement of the pauper?

Hay v.
Paterson.

Now it is undoubtedly a general principle—at least during a child's pupillarity, and I think equally so up to the age when the child is able to act for himself, and emancipate himself in his own right—that where a child is the object of relief, it takes a settlement derivative from the parent. The father's settlement is the settlement of the family born in wedlock,—the mother's that of a natural child. In the case of Morris, it was held that that rule was to be applied differently in the case of a lunatic child. The disturbing principle is the emancipation of the child. The birth settlement comes to be displaced by the settlement acquired by the child. But the birth settlement never is lost till such settlement is acquired by it. The child's own birth-place only comes in when settlement by marriage, or settlement by residence, have been acquired, and have been displaced. It comes in then, because there is no settlement to which to resort. A difficulty, which sometimes has made it not so easy to apply that principle, has been suggested in the argument in the present case. That is in the case of the child of an able-bodied parent, and the question, therefore, Who is the pauper? seems to me to be of importance for establishing the liability.

It is said that the father, being an able-bodied man, and the child being presumed to live in family with him, the law will presume that he is able to support his children, and in his own right, therefore, he cannot be recognised as a pauper, so long as he is not reduced to a state of disability, even though unable to support his family. But in the present case, where we are dealing with a pauper lunatic, there may be an exceptional principle introduced, just as in the case of an able-bodied mother with a family deriving a settlement through her, and as regards whom the same question may be put,—Who is the pauper, the mother, or the child? Is the mother, then, by being able-bodied, excluded from relief? But the law has introduced an exception in such a case, from the necessity of the thing. It is said, from natural infirmity and the weakness of the sex, that the mother does not come within that larger principle which affects an able-bodied father, and according to which he is presumed to be able to support his family; and, therefore, although he is excluded from relief, she is not, because it is supposed that she has not the same means of supporting her family, nor the same strength to put these means in action, as an able-bodied father would have. But that presumption arises from a circumstance of a precisely analogous kind to the present. If the natural infirmity in the case of a mother comes into play, so here, the lunacy of the child, which makes it an extraordinary and an exceptional case. The father is reduced, by the extra expense necessary for the aliment of the lunatic child, to the same position in which the law has dealt with the case of a mother alimentering an ordinary family, and, therefore, I am not disturbed at all with the difficulty that here we have an able-bodied father, for we have him reduced to a state of disability—not from bodily infirmity, but from extraordinary causes, such as the law will treat as an exceptional case.

But truly, when you look a little deeper into the matter, it does not appear to me that this difficulty as to the father being able-bodied and the pauper lunatic entitled—according to the admission of parties—to be alimented, as in his own right, materially affects the present question, because, if you hold that it is the father's settlement that is to regulate, as in the case of a widowed mother, still it is the settlement at the time the child became the subject of relief that is to be taken. What is to be the effect of withdrawing the child from the circle of the family, and making it the child of the public:—whether that is to be held equivalent to ordinary emancipation, which disturbs the family connection, and places the child in a different position from the children for whom the father is liable—these considerations may raise questions of difficulty, which we must dispose of when they occur. But it does not disturb my opinion, that from the moment the child is taken possession of by the parish and separated from the family, that from that moment the child may be held no longer to follow the settlement of the father. There may, or may not be thus created that ambulatory character in his settlement that separation shall operate—just as marriage in a woman—so that thenceforth the settlement of the child may be the settlement of a child in its own right, although, up to the point of separation, the settlement of the father is the settlement of the child. Therefore, it matters little here whether we are to consider the father or the child as the pauper, for the father is bound to aliment the child up to the period of separation, and, therefore, whether you say that the child has become a burden by reason of lunacy and withdrawal of his father's protection, or whether you take the father as the pauper by reason of his child's lunacy, is of little consequence in the solution of this question.

A distinction has been taken between puberty and pupillarity. But that is of no consequence here. The parishes are at one, that the pauper became an object of relief at the age of eleven. The condition of the argument is, that the lunatic is in pupillarity, and while in the family of the father; and that is conclusive, upon the principle of the case of Gladsmuir—which I agree is a most important case—but still more from the principle laid down in the case of Barbour, that when a child is separated from a family, the question is, what was the settlement of the child at that moment? It appears to me that here it was a settlement derived from the father, and that the settlement of the father being the settlement of his birth, that parish must now be liable. I must observe that this introduces an easily applied rule, and a very simple one, which must be of great benefit to parishes in the country; for the simpler the rule, the less the litigation. If the father had died, and it was in consequence of his death that this child was thrown on the parish, there would be no difficulty as to who was the pauper, unless the mother were alive, and in a position to take upon her the burden of maintaining her family. But if the whole family had been thrown on the parish, can there be any doubt that, as to such children, they would have followed the settlement of the father at the time of his death, and that that would have been the settlement of his birth? That would have been the very case to which the principle of the case of Barbour applies. If so, how would it have been possible to say that, in such a case, a lunatic child eleven years of age, and living in family, is yet to be separated from the rest of the family? That would introduce elements to effect a change not truly within this question—something which happened afterwards, in order to regulate what went before. The question is, what was the child's settlement at the moment of separation? It is that which regulates, and thus it is that the parish of the father's birth must here be liable.

Upon the whole, therefore, I agree in the proposed judgment. My only hesitation was, whether we ought not to have called in the other Judges, since we are practically displacing their judgment. But that judgment has been already displaced by the judgment in the case of Barbour, and as I think that the Lord Ordinary is with us in the view we now take of the question—and we are unanimous, it would be wrong to put parties to that expense.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—In this case the pauper is not the father of the lunatic, but the lunatic himself, as is stated by the parties on the record, and is established by a final finding of the Lord Ordinary; and the question is, in what parish has he his settlement? This will be best ascertained by tracing his history from the date of his birth on 28th April 1838 to the present time.

His settlement at the time of his birth was not in Dalkeith, in which he was born, but in the parish of his father's settlement—it being an established rule, that the parish in which a father has his settlement, is also the parish of settlement of his infant children. And the parish of the father's settlement was Laurencekirk, as is ascertained by the joint minute of admissions lodged by the parties. It matters not as to this question, how his settlement came to be in that parish; the fact that it was so being judicially admitted by the parties, and being the condition of the argument. Hence Laurencekirk was the parish of the lunatic's original settlement.

His settlement continued to be in the same parish during his pupillarity, which continued until 28th April 1852, because, according to the same minute of admissions, no change took place in the parish of his father's settlement during that period; and the pupil did not then acquire, and was not capable of acquiring, a separate settlement for himself.

During the latter part of that period the pauper was not only in pupillarity, but in a state of insanity—it being further admitted by the parties on the record, that he was in that state from the time when he was about eleven years of age. It is thus also clear, that on 28th April 1852, when he attained the age of puberty, Laurencekirk continued to be the parish of his settlement.

During the period of about twenty months, between April 1852 and December 1853, when the lunatic was removed to the asylum, and became a charge upon the parish, his settlement still continued to be in the parish of Laurencekirk. During that period no change on his settlement did or could take place, he being not only a minor and unforisfamiated, but also in a state of insanity, and in no way capable of changing his prior settlement. Laurencekirk having thus been the parish of his settlement down to the moment of his being placed in the asylum, that proceeding had not, and could not have, the effect of ipso facto changing that settlement. And Laurencekirk, as it thus continued to be the parish of his settlement at the time when he was placed in the asylum, and became an object of parochial relief, continues of course still to be so.

The case of Thomson v. Morris, 19th July 1850, is adverse to this opinion. And I would have followed that case as a precedent, if the principle of it had not been overturned. But I think that it has been overturned by the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Barbour v. Adamson; and that the opinion which I have expressed is in conformity with that authority.

LORD DEAS.—The pauper in this case is the son of Robert Greig, who was born in the parish of Laurencekirk. The pauper himself was born on 28th April 1838, in the parish of Dalkeith. Consequently he was about sixteen when this action was brought in May 1854; and about fifteen in March 1853, when his father was imprisoned, and he himself became (as is admitted) an object of parochial relief. It is farther admitted that the pauper had been insane for four or five years previously—that is to say, he had become insane when in pupillarity, and consequently he never acquired, nor was capable of acquiring, any settlement for himself. His settlement, at the time he became a pauper, was thus his father's settlement; and if the father, as head of the family, had been applying for relief in his own right, it is clear enough that the parish of the father's settlement would have been the parish liable for such relief, although the extent of it might have materially depended on the helplessness of his lunatic son. But the peculiarity arises from the relief being claimed not by the father, but directly by or for the son as a pauper in his own right, and from its being admitted (as it is in the record) that the son is the pauper. The question at issue, therefore, is what is the parish of the son's settlement?

This settlement might be either direct or derivative. Owing to his incapacity, the son could have no direct settlement, except a settlement by birth, which every person obtains by the mere act of coming into the world; and which, although it may be suspended, is never lost, but may always be fallen back upon when every other settlement fails. The characteristics of a proper birth settlement—viz. its being inherent and permanent—obviously cannot be attributed to a derivative birth settlement—for the child may have been forisfamiated or survived the parent before falling into poverty—the marriage which connected the husband and wife may have been dissolved; and so on. These and other considerations led, not unnaturally nor unphilosophically, to an understanding, which was recognised and acted on in Thomson v. Morris, that whenever a birth-settlement was to be resorted to, and the birth-place admitted of ascertainment, the only two points of inquiry were, 1st, Who was the pauper? and 2d, Where was he born? In that case, as in this, it was admitted that the lunatic was the pauper; and there being no residential settlement, either direct or derivative, the Court, not inconsistently with former practice, held that the parish liable was not the parish of the father's birth, but the parish of the pauper's own birth.

But the moment it was settled, as it was by the judgment of the House of Lords in Adamson v. Barbour, that children, not yet forisfamiated, who became paupers in their own right by the desertion of the father (or, what would be the same thing, his imprisonment or transportation), fell to be maintained, not by the parish of their own birth, but by the parish of their father's birth—the principle recognised and given effect to in Thomson v. Morris was necessarily set aside. It must now be held that a birth settlement may be derivative just as much as a residential settlement. Had the children in Barbour's case not been deserted by the father, relief could have been claimed either for or by them, because the father would have been the pauper, and the law presumes every able-bodied father to be capable of maintaining his family, however different the fact may be. It was just because the consequence of the desertion was to make the children paupers in their own right that they became entitled to parochial relief. But, although paupers in their own right, and resorting to a birth-settlement (there being no other), their settlement was held to be in the parish of their father's birth, and not in the parish of their own birth. I can draw no distinction between the case of pupil children who become paupers in their own right by the father's desertion or transportation, and the case of this lunatic, who, while he was still a member of his father's family, is admitted to have become a pauper in his own right by his father's imprisonment and inability to maintain him. Consequently I concur with your Lordships in holding Laurencekirk to be the parish liable to maintain the pauper.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—" Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, except in so far as it finds that Thomas Greig, mentioned in the record, is a proper object of parochial relief, and entitled to the same : Find that the parish of Laurencekirk, as the parish of birth of Robert Greig, father of the pauper the said Thomas Greig, is bound to relieve the parish of Edinburgh, at whose expense the said Thomas Greig is now supported, of the burden of his maintenance; and that the parish of Dalkeith, as the parish of the pauper's birth, is not bound so to do : Sustain the defences for the parish of Dalkeith, and assoilzie the reclamer, Alexander Paterson, inspector of the said parish, from the conclusions of the action, and decern : Repel the defences for the defender, David M'Donald, inspector of the said parish of Laurencekirk : Find, declare, and decern against him, in terms of the alternative, declaratory, and petitory conclusions of the libel : Find the inspector of the parish of Laurencekirk liable in expenses to the pursuer of the action, the inspector of the parish of Edinburgh; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same when lodged, and to report : Find no expenses due to the parish of Dalkeith, as in the question between that parish and the parish of Laurencekirk, and decern."

Reparation—Seduction—Issue.—In an action of damages for seduction it is not necessary to put in issue that the pursuer was previously "a person of virtuous conduct and untainted character."

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Benholme.
R.

THE pursuer brought this action of damages, alleging that she had been long courted by the defender, and that he had promised to marry her, and that, "relying upon his false assurances, and in consequence of the belief and expectation induced by his statements and actings," she had, on a certain day, "yielded to his solicitations, and was prevailed on to permit the defender to have carnal knowledge of her person, whereby she lost her virginity."

The defender, admitting intercourse on the occasion libelled, denied an assurance on his part that he would marry her, or that she had then lost her virginity, and he alleged that he had frequently had intercourse with her before during a series of years, and that, "in her intercourse with other men she frequently exhibited great levity and want of propriety of demeanour such as was, or seemed to be, inconsistent with a notion of her being a virtuous person."

The pursuer proposed the following issue :—" Whether the defender, at sometime previous to the 14th May 1855, courted the pursuer, making false professions of his intention to marry her? And whether the defender, on or about the said 14th May 1855, by means of such courtship or false professions, seduced the pursuer, and prevailed upon her to permit him to have carnal connection with her person; to the loss, damage, and injury, of the said pursuer. Damages laid at L.1000 sterling."

Spence v.
Taylor.

The defender, on the other hand, proposed that the issue should be in the following terms:—"Whether the pursuer, being, previous to the 14th of May 1855, a person of virtuous conduct, and untainted character, was, on or about that date, seduced by the defender, and was in consequence prevailed on by him to permit him to have carnal knowledge of her person, to her injury and damage?"

When the case came before the Inner House (on the Lord Ordinary's report), the defender maintained that the form proposed by him was the invariable form in all cases of the kind,—had been deliberately settled, and was necessary to the justice of the case, the word "seduce" not being a nomem juris.¹

For the pursuer, it was contended;—That the words "of previously virtuous conduct, and of untainted character," ought not to be in the issue; seduction on the false pretence of intention to marry was language which would be perfectly intelligible to the jury, and the pursuer would be entitled to a verdict if, at the time, she was living virtuously.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think the word "seduce" quite enough. There is no word the jury understand so well. In the cases quoted to us there very likely was no discussion, or the pursuer, knowing the facts, wanted her previous character put into the issue in order to strengthen her case. At the same time, though I do not think the pursuer here bound to follow the same course, she will probably make very little way with the jury if she do not make out her character to have been good. On the other hand, although we have often gone back on forms of issues deliberately settled, it may be well that we speak in the robing room to our brethren in the other Division. Promise of marriage, as here alleged, if distinctly made out, may go a great way, even if it should turn out that the pursuer's conduct early in life was not correct.

LORD MURRAY.—I do not object to the alteration of the usual issue in these cases, but I would rather not strike out these words without consulting the other Division.

LORD COWAN.—I observe the conclusion of the summons is put on loss of character, and there is a specific statement in the record to the same effect, which is my only source of difficulty. I am not satisfied that any such issue has been previously matter of deliberate judgment.

On a subsequent day—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—After talking the matter fully over with the First Division, we have resolved that the issue stand as proposed by the pursuer.

No. 81. least alleging themselves to be the remanent members, of a committee appointed by various persons, related, or claiming to be related, to the late Miss Jean Innes, of Stow, for the purpose of investigating their several rights and claims to the estate of the said Miss Jean Innes; and Alexander Colston, alleging himself to be an assumed member of said committee, and it concluded,—“Therefore the defenders, as members, or alleged members, of the foresaid committee, and as employers of the pursuer, or otherways liable to him for doing the business for which this action is raised, ought and should, in so far as they have funds applicable thereto, but not personally or individually, be decerned and ordained to make payment of the sum of L.126, 15s. sterling,” &c.

Jan. 30, 1857.
Spence v.
Taylor.

The pursuer alleged that the committee were empowered to raise a common fund for defraying all their expenses, and for the employment of agents and counsel for conducting that proceeding;—that he had been asked on behalf of the committee “whether he would hold the members of committee, jointly and severally, liable to him for his legal charges and costs for conducting the necessary proceedings in the intended lawsuit to be raised as to the Stow succession, or not.”

This was followed by a minute in the following terms:—“Mr Spence, in the circumstances, gives his professional services, on the condition of receiving such payments to account as the funds can afford, besides his outlay; and of course holding only the parties, and not the committee, personally liable.”

The pursuer said that he was then appointed law-agent for the claimants, and had given much time to their interests. “He has barely, however, received from them more than the actual outlay to which he has been put; and the sum now sued for is the balance of the account which has been incurred to him. The defenders have at present ample funds in their possession.”

The pursuer arrested on the dependence a certain sum of L.80 in the defenders’ hands, but this sum the defenders maintained to be applicable only to a certain specific purpose, and not to the general purposes of the litigation; they stated expressly that they, “as committeemen, have no funds at their command applicable to the general purpose of promoting the litigation in reference to the Innes succession.”

The pursuer being called upon to state whether he craved a proof of his allegation respecting funds being in the defenders’ hands, lodged a minute stating,—“The object of the present action is to constitute the pursuer’s claim, so as to prevent prescription, and enable him to make it good by his hypothec or otherways. The defenders are sued merely qua trustees. The conclusion against them is limited, and the pursuer, in hoc statu, declines leading any proof regarding the trust-funds, but respectfully craves judgment without any such proof.”

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—“In respect that the pursuer has judicially stated that he does not now aver that there were at the date of this action funds in possession of the defenders, applicable to payment of the account sued for, and in respect that the action as laid is founded on the averment of the possession of such funds, and is not a mere action of constitution; Assoilzies the defenders from the conclusion of the action as laid, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses.”

* “NOTE.—It is necessary to consider the structure of the summons, and the nature of the averments of the pursuer, in order to judge whether this action is as is now urged, merely an action of constitution. The pursuer did allege that the defenders were in possession of funds,—that he was entitled to payment of his account,—that payment was refused by the defenders, and that therefore action was rendered necessary. The documents on which the pursuer’s demand is rested

The pursuer reclaimed, maintaining, that though he must now admit that the defenders had not funds in hand, he was still entitled to his decree of constitution, as they might get funds hereafter, or he might be in a position to compel them to take steps with a view to procuring them. No. 81.

Without calling on the defenders' counsel,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I suppose there is no doubt about this case. The action is raised against these people as members of committee. The statement made was, that they had ample funds in their hands. Well, an opportunity was given to prove that. The pursuer declined to do so, and we must hold that there are no funds. The natural conclusion then is, that the action ought to be dismissed; but the pursuer says, "No, I must have decree, because if they ever have funds I may make it available." The object is, that this committee may be forced to raise funds. Now I regard that as an unfair perversion of this action. These people may be liable to a declarator to compel them to raise funds, and when such an action is brought we may consider it. The agent here agreed to act for these people—he must have known that he was just taking his risk. He seems to have thought that he would get payment out of them, but he now admits that they have no funds.

LORD MURRAY.—I can come to no other conclusion than that at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived.

LORD WOOD was absent.

LORD COWAN.—I agree also. This action is for payment, and the summons avers that the defenders have funds. This allegation is met by a denial. The pursuer at last admits that there are none, and so the very basis of liability is cut off. I do not say whether or not the pursuer is in a position to bring a proper action of constitution—but this is not such an action. This agent was asked on what terms he would take the business, and he said he would take it not holding the committee liable—the meaning of which is, that he is to go directly against the parties for whom the committee acted.

THE COURT adhered, and found the reclamer liable in additional expenses.

No. 82.

Entail—Act 10 Geo. III. cap. 51 (Montgomery Act)—11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, sect. 19 (Entail Amendment Act).—Prior and subsequent to the passing of the Entail Amendment Act in 1848, an entail proprietor executed improvements of the nature contemplated by the Montgomery Act, but did not obtain decree therefor. He craved and obtained authority under the Entail Amendment Act to execute bonds for two-thirds of three-fourths of the sums so expended by him. Having exhausted the powers so given him, he again applied for authority to grant bonds for the full amount of two-thirds of his expenditure subsequent to 14th August 1848;—Held (in conformity with the opinions of the whole Court), that the previous procedure formed no bar to his obtaining such authority.

After the Earl of Kintore succeeded to his entailed estates of Kintore and Haulkerton, he executed various improvements of the nature contemplated by the 10 Geo. III. cap. 51, partly before and partly after the passing of the Entail Amendment Act, 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, but had not obtained Jan. 31, 1857.

show that the existence of funds, applicable to payment of his account, was necessary to his action for payment. Accordingly the conclusion is for payment, and is based on the averments of the existence of such funds. These averments he declined to instruct by proof; and the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the abolition of the defenders is the legitimate result of the pursuer's failure to instruct by proof of action. That the pursuer used arrestments in order to attach a fund, is an additional indication of his own view of the action, showing that he brought to enforce payment, and not as a mere constitution."

No. 82. decree therefor to the extent of three-fourths of his expenditure provided for by the Montgomery Act. Amongst the sums so expended were the following, viz. :—From 31st December 1847 to 31st December 1850, the sum of L.8978, 11s. 10d.; and subsequent to 31st December 1850, the sum of L.3200, 0s. 9d.

Jan. 31, 1857.
Kintore.

In 1851 the Earl presented an application, under the 11 & 12 Vict., for authority, inter alia, to grant bonds and dispositions in security, in respect of the expenditure of L.8978, 11s. 10d., but limiting the application to two-thirds of three-fourths thereof, in place of two-thirds of the whole expenditure, so far as regards the period subsequent to the passing of the Entail Amendment Act. The Court accordingly granted authority to the extent of L.4489, 5s. 11d., “in terms of the statute.”

Of the sum of L.8978, 11s. 10d. of expenditure sustained in that petition, there was expended on improvements subsequent to 14th August 1848, the sum of L.8608 15 10

Of which two-thirds, being the sum for which the petitioner was entitled to grant bonds, is	L.5739 3 10
And two-thirds of three-fourths of the same sum, being the amount for which the petitioner had granted bonds in respect of that expenditure, is	4304 7 11
Difference,	L.1434 15 11

In like manner in 1852, with reference to the sum of L.3200, 0s. 9d., the Court, on a similar application, granted authority, “in terms of the prayer of the petition,” for the execution of bonds and dispositions in security to the extent of two-thirds of three-fourths, being L.1600, 0s. 4d. The expenditure so sustained was, as already stated, entirely subsequent to 14th August 1848; and two-thirds thereof, for which the Earl would have been entitled to grant bonds if he had availed himself of the full powers of the Act, is L.2133, 7s. 2d., leaving a balance of L.533, 6s. 10d. For this sum, and the above balance of L.1434, 15s. 11d.—in all L.1968, 2s. 9d.—the Earl now craved authority to grant bonds and dispositions in security in usual form.

Two of the three consenting heirs were pupils. A tutor ad litem was appointed to them, but he did not state any objections to the application.

There had been exactly similar procedure in regard to the Kintore estates, as to which also a similar application was now made.

The Lord Ordinary remitted to Mr Campbell, W.S., to report.

Mr Campbell presented two reports, applicable respectively to the Haulkerton and Kintore estates, but being in substance the same. He referred to the case of Gordon, 12th November 1851 (ante, vol. xiv. p. 16), in which it was decided that the annualrent to be granted under the 16th section in respect of expenditure on improvements executed subsequent to the passing of the Act was to be calculated, not on three-fourth parts of the sums expended, in terms of the 13th section, but on the whole of the sums expended, in terms of the 14th section, and that the bond and disposition in security to be granted in respect of such expenditure, in terms of the 18th section, was to be for two-third parts of the whole expenditure. And he stated as his opinion, that at the time when the petitioner presented his former petitions, he was entitled, under the statute, to obtain authority to grant bonds and dispositions in security for the amount of expenditure, which should include the sums for which the petitioner now craved authority, and that the petitioner was still entitled to obtain that authority, unless the proceedings which took place under these petitions should bar him from doing so. The Reporter did not think that these proceedings formed a bar No. 82. to the present application.

The Lord Ordinary reported the case to the First Division, who, on 28th Jan. 31, 1857.
June 1856, pronounced an interlocutor, appointing the papers to be laid Earl of before the whole Judges for their opinions on the question, whether the Kintore.
prayer of the petition should be granted?

The consulted Judges returned the following opinions:—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that the prayer of the petition, mentioned in the prefixed interlocutor, should be granted.

I am unable to find any reason why a party who has obtained, under one application, authority to grant bonds over the estate for a certain portion of the money he has expended on the entailed estate, may not, at an after period, obtain authority to grant bond for the remainder of the sum. His power does not seem to be affected by the fact that he had previously obtained authority to grant bond for a portion of the money expended. He may exercise his power in the way and at the times which the circumstances of his family or his own views in regard to them suggest. If he has the privilege under the statute, then he may exercise it in the way he chooses. He may not have known of the extent of his privilege, or been disinclined to avail himself of it to the full extent. His views alter: but he is only claiming authority to exercise a power still remaining in him.

The tutor ad litem does not oppose the application, and we have no argument on the part of the heirs of entail. I must say that, on a point as to which the Division entertained so much difficulty as to consult the whole Court, it would seem to be the appropriate, if not necessary duty of the tutor ad litem, to state the grounds of opposition on the part of those with whose interests he is charged. As he has not done so, I have looked to the point with more jealousy, but have not encountered any difficulty.

The interlocutors disposing of the former applications are in themselves no bar to the prayer of this petition. Nor indeed could the Court by any form of interlocutor exclude another application,—if the heir in possession has, under the statute, the privilege he claims.

LOKDS WOOD, MURRAY, COWAN, HANDYSIDE, NEAVES, and MACKENZIE, concurred in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I am of opinion that the prayer of this petition should be granted, and I concur in the views expressed by the Lord Justice-Clerk. The chief, if not the only, difficulty arises from the terms of the 19th section. But I do not think that the 19th section can be fairly construed so as to exclude this application. A power, within certain limits, but up to the measure of these limits, is granted by statute. It has been partially exercised: but within the limits, there remains a power not exercised. The application now made is for authority to exercise that remaining power. The statute does not say that only one bond can be granted—nor that, if more than one, they must be of same date and under one application. I see nothing to prevent a new application, if within the power. To whatever extent the bond is granted, it operates under the 19th section as a discharge. If the bond has exhausted the power, the discharge is total.

LORD BENHOLME.—I am of opinion that the prayer of the petition referred to in the interlocutor of the Court of 28th June 1856, ought to be granted.

The objection arising from the petitioner's previous proceedings will probably assume its most definite shape, by referring to the 19th section of the Entail Amendment Act, which is as follows:—"And be it enacted, that the granting, under authority of this Act, of any bond of annualrent, or bond and disposition in security, in respect of any improvements executed, or to be executed, on an entailed estate in Scotland, shall operate as a discharge of all claims for or on account of such improvements, against such estate, and the rents and profits thereof, and the heirs of entail succeeding thereto, save and except the claims under such bond of annualrent, or bond and disposition in security themselves."

It can hardly be disputed that the bonds and dispositions in security, already executed by the petitioner, in terms of the previous interlocutors of the Court, were granted by the authority of this Act." The petitioner himself must admit this, and maintain that they are valid and effectual, so far as they go.

Jan. 31, 1857.
Earl of Eglinton.

It may also be said that, in one sense, these bonds were granted in reference to the whole improvements upon the entailed estate; since in his several petitions, he stated the full amount of these improvements, and craved authority to execute bonds to the amount of a certain proportion of the improvement monies.

But, considering what was the true intention of this clause, I cannot hold that it will operate so as to exclude the petitioner from exhausting the full remedy which was competent to him under the statute, and which he would have adopted, had he been earlier aware of his legal rights.

The consequence of the petitioner having fallen into this mistake, under his present proceeding, is no doubt somewhat different from what it would have been, had he preferred the other mode of proceeding, competent under the statute, of granting bonds of annualrent. Had the petitioner executed such bond of annualrent as is directed by the 13th section, in reference to monies expended on improvements, subsequent to the passing of the Act; or had he executed such bond of annualrent as is directed by the 14th section, with reference to monies expended on improvements previous to the passing of the Act,—in either case the mistake would have been fatal. The proceeding could not have been considered as taken under the authority of the Act—the two several kinds of bonds of annualrent being different, not merely in their amount, but also in their style and effect. The result would probably have been, that the bond executed by mistake must have been set aside, and a new and appropriate bond executed in place of it.

But under existing circumstances, the mistake committed affects merely the amount of the bond and disposition in security. It may thus be still held as granted “under the authority of the Act.” But in substance it is granted “in reference” only to three-fourths of the improvement money; and to that extent only, in my opinion, it can be held to operate a discharge.

It is possible that the argument in favour of the objection might be made to assume a more formidable aspect than that in which at present it appears to me. I cannot help regretting that we have had so little assistance from the bar. I am not aware that the minute presented for the petitioner makes any mention of the 19th section of the statute; and as the tutor ad litem does not oppose the application, no argument on that side has been addressed to the Court. But after the best consideration that I could give to the case, I have been unable to form any other opinion than what I have expressed.

To-day the case was advised,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have no remarks to make. We have only to give judgment in terms of the opinions of the consulted Judges.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“The Lords having resumed consideration of this cause, with the opinions of the consulted Judges, Grant warrant to the petitioner for execution of a bond and disposition in security, or bonds and dispositions in security, for the sum of L.1968, 2s. 9d., in terms of the statutes; interpose their authority, and decern; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to see the deeds executed, and to report.”

MACKENZIE & BAILLIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 83. THE EARL OF EGLINTON AND WINTON, Petitioner.—Sol.-Gen. Maitland—Mure—Montgomerie.

*Entail—Act 10 Geo. III. cap. 51 (Montgomerie Act)—Act 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, sections 14, 18, and 26; and Act 16 & 17 Vict. cap. 96 (Entail Amendment Acts).—*An heir of entail in possession having obtained decree under the Montgomerie Act for three-fourths of his expenditure on improvements subsequent to the passing of the Entail Amendment Act of 1848, applied for authority to uplift and apply trust-funds in payment pro tanto of his whole expenditure. But he afterwards restricted the proposed application of the trust-funds to three-fourths of his expenditure; and having obtained such authority, and exhausted the powers so conferred on him,—Held (in conformity with opinions of the whole Court), that he was afterwards entitled, under sect. 14 of the 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, to grant bonds of annualrent for the remaining one-fourth, being the whole amount of his expenditure. No. 83.

Observed (per Lord Wood), that it is competent to an heir of entail to avail himself of the provisions of both the 14th and 26th sections of the 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, in reference to any sum of improvement outlay, the one not being exclusive of the other. Jan. 31, 1857. Earl of Eglinton.

Entail—Improvements.—The expense of fitting up a hydraulic ram and erecting a gas work for supplying Eglinton Castle and offices with water and gas, sustained as proper improvement expenditure—but the expense of erecting a racket-court disallowed.

THE petitioner was heir of entail in possession of the entailed estates of Eglinton and others. This petition was founded upon the Entail Amendment Acts 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, sections 14 & 18; and 16 & 17 Vict. cap. 96, and prayed for authority to execute bonds of annualrent, or bonds and dispositions in security over the entailed estates, in respect of certain improvement expenditure by the petitioner. The circumstances in which this petition was presented were these:—In March 1854, the petitioner presented an application to the Court, under the Entail Amendment Act, for warrant to uplift and receive from his grandfather's trustees certain surplus trust-funds, amounting to L.10,000, in repayment pro tanto of several sums of money which had been expended by him in improvements upon the entailed estates. A remit was made to Mr Inglis, W.S., to inquire generally as to the circumstances of the case, and also to men of skill to inspect the operations in question, so far as the same had not already been found and declared by decree of the Court, and to report whether the improvements were of the nature contemplated by the statutes, and whether, and how far the sums charged in the accounts had been bona fide expended or incurred in these improvements. 1st Division. Ld Mackenzie. C.

In the course of the proceedings, it appeared that the improvement outlay consisted of the following items:—

1. Expenditure between the terms of Martinmas 1849 and Martinmas 1851, amounting to L.9396, 0s. 10½d., and for three-fourths of which decree had been obtained by the petitioner against the next heirs of entail, in terms of the Act 10th Geo. III. cap. 51, upon the 16th day of March 1853.

2. Expenditure between Martinmas 1851 and Martinmas 1853, but for which no decree had been obtained, L.4063, 12s. 3½d.

Of this sum there had been expended upon improvements of the nature contemplated by the statutes, consisting of buildings, and additions to Eglinton Castle, and draining the lawn parks, farm-houses and steadings, and planting, L.3637 5 11½

The balance of L.426, 6s. 4d. had been expended on improvements of the nature of repairs, and upholding of the subjects, and otherwise.

3. Between Martinmas 1849 and Martinmas 1853, expenditure in fitting up a hydraulic ram at Eglinton Castle, L.407 0 0

Erecting a gas-work for supplying the castle and offices with gas, 1031 17 10

Erecting a racket-court at the castle, 864 0 9

2302 18 7

For all which no decree had been obtained.

Making together, L.5940 4 6½

These sums were reported to have been bona fide expended in improvements.

Under the above remit, Mr Inglis reported that it appeared to him that the petitioner would be "entitled to receive from the trustees of the late Earl the surplus of trust-funds, amounting to L.10,000, in repayment of the sum of L.5940, 4s. 6½d.; and in repayment, pro tanto, of so much of the sum of L.9396, 0s. 10½d., declared by the aforesaid decret to have been expended between the terms of Martinmas 1849 and Martinmas 1851, as the petitioner can legally claim out of the trust-funds—but what that amount may be seems to be doubtful. In the case of Sir J. S. Richardson,¹ the question was raised, whether an heir of entail, who has constituted improvement outlay against the next heirs, and obtained decree for three-fourths thereof, is entitled to repayment, out of trust-funds or consigned money, of the full amount of the expenditure, or of the three-fourths only which have been created a debt against the heirs of entail? The Court expressed doubt upon the point, but as in that case the fund was insufficient to meet more than three-fourths of the expenditure, authority was granted for applying it in repayment of the sum declared to be a debt against the succeeding heirs, leaving the question open as to whether the petitioner was entitled to payment of the remaining fourth out of consigned or trust-funds, in terms of the 26th section of the Act.

“ The question then raised does not appear from the reports to have been again brought before the Court, and it therefore seems to be questionable if the petitioner is entitled in the present application to have the trust-funds applied towards repayment of more than three-fourths of the improvement expenditure, as ascertained by the decret of declarator.”

A report was thereafter made by Lord Neaves, Ordinary, to the Court, when—in addition to the difficulty which had occurred to Mr Inglis in regard to the extent to which the petitioner was entitled to receive repayment of the sum for which decret of declarator had been obtained—his Lordship stated that he had some doubts in reference to the expenditure which had been made in the erection of the racket-court. As the amount of trust-funds was, however, insufficient to pay more than three-fourths of the sum declared by the decret, and the other expenditure, under deduction of the expense of the racket-court, the petitioner gave in a minute, in accordance with a suggestion to that effect from the bench, stating that, “ in the meantime, he limited the prayer of his petition for application of the trust-funds to the extent of L.10,000, in repayment, pro tanto, of L.7047, 0s. 8d., being three-fourths of the amount for which it is stated in the petition that decret of declarator had been obtained under the Act 10th Geo. III. c. 51, and of the sum of L.3637, 5s. 11½d., part of the sum of L.4063, 12s. 3½d., stated in the petition to have been expended in improvements under the said Act, between Martinmas 1851 and Martinmas 1853, reserving to the petitioner to apply further hereafter, if additional trust-funds should emerge.”

Thereupon, the Court granted warrant and authority for uplifting the trust-funds, amounting to L.10,000, and applying the same in the manner mentioned in the minute. That sum was accordingly uplifted by the petitioner; and it was stated in the present petition, and was instructed by a discharge produced, that, with it, there had been paid off the whole of the L.7047, 0s. 8d., and also the sum of L.2952, 19s. 4d. to account of the L.3637, 5s. 11½d., thus leaving a balance of this latter sum still subsisting undischarged of L.684, 6s. 7½d.

By the above arrangement all questions were avoided in the former application in regard to the one-fourth of the sum for which decret had been obtained, as well as with regard to the amount of the expenditure at Eglinton Castle. The present application was now made with the view of obtaining authority to charge the estates by bonds of annual rent or bond and disposition in security with these sums.

These sums were (1,) L.2349, 0s. 2½d., being the remaining fourth of L.9396, 0s. 10½d., for three-fourths of which decret had been obtained under the Montgomery Act, and payment made under the former petition :

in the former application; and (3) L.2302, 18s. 7d., which was also not Earl of constituted under the Montgomery Act, and, in terms of the arrangement Eglinton.
above mentioned, was not included in the decree in the former application.

The Lord Ordinary remitted to Mr Inglis, W.S., as in the former petition, to report. And Mr Inglis brought under the consideration of the Court the following points:—First, Whether the petitioner was entitled to charge the estates with the remaining fourth of the expenditure declared by the decree obtained in virtue of the Montgomery Act? and, second, To what extent the sum of L.2302, 18s. 7d., expended at Eglinton Castle, formed a proper expenditure in terms of the Act?

The Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) reported the case. The three next heirs of entail being the three eldest sons of the petitioner, who were all in pupilarity, the Court appointed a tutor ad litem to them, and on 19th February 1856, pronounced an interlocutor appointing the petitioner and the tutor ad litem, if so advised, to prepare and interchange mutual minutes.

The tutor declined to lodge a minute.

The petitioner lodged a minute, in which he set forth the above procedure; and, after referring to the decisions in the cases of Gordon¹ and Fleeming,² he stated that it was clear, both from the express terms and the manifest intention of the 14th section of the 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, that that provision was made irrespective of the limitations of the Montgomerie Act. The amount on which the annual rent was to be calculated was “the whole of the sums expended;” and, therefore, it could not be restricted to the portion only of those sums for which decree had been obtained against the heirs of entail. The intention to dispense with these limitations would be seen more clearly if the 13th and 14th sections were read together: the former of these sections provides that where improvements have been executed prior to the passing of the statute, the heir in possession shall only have power to charge the estate with three-fourths of the amount for which he has obtained decree; while the latter section provides that where the improvements have been executed subsequent to the passing of the statute, he shall be entitled to charge the estate with the whole amount. It could not be maintained that any prejudice was done to the heirs of entail in charging the estate with the whole improvement outlay made after the passing of the statute of 1848, because, in acquiescing in the decree of declarator under the Montgomerie Act, they did so in the full knowledge of the provisions of the 14th section, which made the whole, and not three-fourths, of the outlay chargeable on the estate.

A further question had, however, been suggested, which seemed to be the one of most importance in the present case, viz. whether, when proceedings had been taken under the 26th section of the Act, and a certain amount of funds obtained, but not sufficient to repay the whole improvement outlay, it was competent thereafter to have recourse to the remedy provided in the 14th section, for the purpose of charging the unpaid balance upon the estate.

The petitioner submitted that there was no difference in principle as to this matter between a balance of expenditure already constituted which the trust-fund was inadequate to pay, as in the present case, and expenditure made upon subsequent improvements. The 14th section gave right to charge upon the estate the whole constituted expenditure, and the only ground upon which any part of it could not be charged, was, that it had been already paid. It was because he got payment of that part of it, and not

No. 83. because he presented a petition under the 26th section, that the petitioner could not now charge against the estate the three-fourths which were paid. And there being no fund out of which he could get payment of the remaining fourth, his right to charge it against the estate was precisely the same that he would have had so to charge the whole expenditure if there had been no trust-fund at all, or, what would have been the same thing, if it had been entirely exhausted by other and preferable purposes.

Eglinton.

Even if any difficulty of a formal kind could have arisen in consequence of the sum now in question having been the subject of an application under the 26th section, all room for such a question was removed in the present case, by the minute restricting the prayer of that application to the three-fourths; so that the matter must be dealt with upon the footing as if the former petition had never embraced the remaining fourth.

On 28th June 1856 the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—
“The Lords, in respect of the general importance of the question involved, appoint copies of the papers to be laid before the whole Judges, with a view to obtaining their opinions on the question whether the prayer of the petition should be granted as regards the sum of L.2349, 0s. 2½d. sterling mentioned therein, and referred to in the report by Harry Maxwell Inglis, and in the minute for the petitioner.”

The following opinions were returned by the consulted Judges:—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In the page above referred to, in the report of Mr Inglis, the precise sum is not actually mentioned; but I understand the sum of L.2340, 0s. 2½d. to be the fourth of the larger sum mentioned in that page, for three-fourths of which decree under the Montgomerie Act has been obtained.

I must, as in the case of Lord Kintore, express my surprise and disappointment, that in a matter deemed of so much difficulty by the Division as to require the opinions of the whole Judges, the tutor ad litem (the same, I see, for all the three pupil heirs) has not thought it proper to state the grounds on which the objection is understood to rest to the proposal of the petitioner,—even although the question had, in the case of Richardson, been stated to be of great difficulty by the head of the Court.

The Court have not the aid they ought to have,—and any decision to be come to can have little authority in disposing of another case, in which a party may appear to oppose a similar application.

The point is very well stated in the minute for Lord Eglinton. The contrast between the 13th and 14th sections of the Law of Entail Amendment Act is very remarkable. By the 13th section, in regard to the amount of improvements executed before the passing of that Act, and for three-fourths of which decree, in terms of the Montgomerie Act, has been obtained, it was not intended to create an additional burden on the heirs of entail, and authority is only given to grant a bond of annualrent for the amount so fixed.

But the reasons for restraining that authority in cases where the burden on the heirs of entail for improvements made before the passing of the Act was already fixed, did not apply in cases where the improvements were executed after the passing of the Act; and hence the bond of annualrent is not limited to the sum contained in the decree.

The terms of the 14th section declare—“That where an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate, holden by virtue of any tailzie dated prior to the said 1st day of August 1848, shall execute improvements on such estate subsequent to the passing of this Act, and obtain decree for three fourth parts of the sums expended thereon, in terms of the said recited Act of the 10th year of the reign of His Majesty King George the Third, and shall also obtain the authority of the Court as after-mentioned, it shall be lawful for such heir of entail to execute in favour of any party he may think fit a bond of annualrent in ordinary form over such entailed estate, or any portion thereof, binding himself and his heirs of tailzie to make payment of an annual rent, during the period of twenty-five years from and after the date of such decree, or during such part of the said period of twenty-five years as may remain unexpired at the date of such bond, such annu-rent not exceeding the sum of L.7, 2s. for every L.100 of the whole of the sums expended as aforesaid, and so in proportion for any greater or less sum, and being payable half-yearly, by equal moieties at the terms of Whitsunday or Martinmas, beginning the first term's payment at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the date of the bond for the proportion of annualrent then due, with legal interest and penalties in case of failure." No. 83.

Eglinton.

The section takes the very case of decree having been obtained for three-fourths of the sums expended in improvements executed subsequent to the passing of the statute, and then declares that it shall be lawful for the heir of entail to grant a bond of annualrent (at the rate and for the time prescribed) for every L.100 of the whole of the sums expended as aforesaid. These words are explicit, and, in my judgment, exclude construction. The power is given. The Court cannot limit it. The very case of a prior decree is supposed as the very state of things in which the bond may be granted for every L.100 of the whole sums expended, and hence incompatibility between the exercise of that authority and any prior decree cannot be urged on the terms of the enactment. The doubt stated in the case of Richardson does not affect my mind. The remark by Mr Montgomery is quite satisfactory:—"It cannot be maintained that any prejudice is done to the heirs of entail in charging the estate with the whole improvement-outlay made after the passing of the statute of 1848, because, in acquiescing in the decree of declarator under the Montgomery Act, they do so in the full knowledge of the provisions of the 14th section, which makes the whole, and not three-fourths, of the outlay chargeable on the estate."

But I must further add, that I do not think the view of any tacit consent or understanding or arrangement can apply to the case. Under the Montgomery Act parties are called for their interest, in order that they may oppose. If parties do not oppose when so called on, I do not view it as a case of tacit consent, but as a proof that there is no ground of objection to outlay and to the decree sued for, and that the parties could not help themselves or avoid such decree.

But over and above the right to obtain a decree for three-fourths of the sum expended, the power is given to grant bond of annualrent for the whole of the sums expended as aforesaid, i.e. for three-fourths of which the decree may have been obtained.

We are not warranted to deny effect to that power—if the matter is otherwise rightly carried through under the statute.

I am therefore of opinion, that the prayer of the petition, bearing date the 7th of August 1855, should be granted as regards the sum of L.2349, 0s. 2½d. sterling, mentioned therein.

LORD HANDYSIDE.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORD WOOD.—The opinion of the consulted Judges is asked in relation only to the sum of L.2349, 0s. 2½d., being the one-fourth of the sum of L.9396, 0s. 11d. of expenditure on improvements, as to which decree of declarator was obtained, the remaining three-fourths having been paid out of the trust-funds mentioned in the proceedings.

My opinion concurs with that of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

In the first place, looking to the provisions of the 13th and 14th sections of the Entail Amendment Act (1848), I agree with his Lordship in holding that, in virtue of the latter, an heir of entail has the privilege of granting a bond of annualrent for the whole amount of the sum expended on improvements subsequent to the passing of the Act, for three-fourths of which he may have obtained decree, in terms of the Montgomery Act. I think it impossible, upon any sound reading of the 14th section, to hold that, by having taken that decree, the privilege thereby conferred is restricted to granting a bond of annualrent in respect of three-fourths only of the sum expended, and that it cannot be granted in respect of the whole amount. In my opinion, the provisions are expressed in terms which do not admit of such a limitation being attached to them. I can see no ground, whether in respect of tacit consent or understanding, or otherwise, on which the substitute heirs of entail can maintain, that by an annualrent on the full amount of the improvement outlay being allowed to be charged on the estate where a previous decree has been taken for three-fourths of it, any prejudice is done them.

Eglinton.

Assuming that so far a correct view has been taken of the provisions of the Act 1848, then,

In the second place, with regard to a point also noticed in the minute for the petitioner, the Earl of Eglinton, I think it is competent to an heir of entail to avail himself of the provisions of both the 14th and 26th sections of that Act, in reference to any sum of improvement-outlay, the one not being exclusive of the other. I cannot perceive how, where a sum of expenditure has been constituted by decree, in terms of the Montgomerie Act, the heir of entail can be precluded from—on the one hand, getting payment pro tanto under the 26th section, to the extent of the trust-fund that may be applicable to that purpose; and—on the other hand, under the 14th section, granting bond of annualrent in reference to the amount remaining unpaid. Upon any other view, if there were a trust-fund which was sufficient to pay only one-half or two-thirds of the sum expended, the heir of entail would be compelled either to rest satisfied with that, relinquishing all claim for the remainder, or to throw himself entirely upon the relief to be obtained in virtue of the provisions of the 14th section. I can find nothing in the terms of any of the provisions of the Act to warrant their being so restricted in their operative effect. When a decree has not been obtained for the improvement expenditure, there would seem to be no ground for contending that benefit may not be taken, by the heir of entail for his relief, both of the 26th and the 16th sections of the Act. In that case, how could any just objection be stated to the heir of entail separating the expenditure into two parts, and making application to the Court under the 26th section in regard to the one—the sum thereof being equal to the whole amount of the disposable trust-fund—and under the 16th section in regard to the other? Indeed, it would appear that in the case of no decree in terms of the Montgomerie Act having been obtained, the Court had not felt any difficulty, for our opinion is not desired in regard to the sum of L.684, 6s. 7d., being the balance not paid out of the trust-fund, of a sum of L.3637, 5s. 11½d. for improvement-outlay, which had not been constituted by decree. But if the heir of entail is there entitled to grant a bond of annuity in respect of such balance, I can see no room, in the terms of the 14th section of the Entail Amendment Act, for drawing a distinction between that case and the case where a decree has been obtained, and denying to the heir of entail in the latter the privilege which he would have in the former.

But no doubt the present case is marked by this peculiarity, that the application as originally made by the petitioner the Earl of Eglinton, was for payment in full out of the trust-fund, of the whole sums expended on improvements, embracing as well the sum for which decree had been obtained, as those for which it had not. This, as I understand it, was done when in error as to the amount of the trust-fund, and in the belief that it would cover all the sums for which there was any claim. Be that, however, as it may, it does not appear to me, that—when the fact has proved to be that the trust-fund is not adequate to discharge the whole, so that a portion of the expenditure in regard to which decree had been obtained, viz. one-fourth, is left unliquidated after payment (in terms of the restriction of the prayer of the petition then before the Court) of the other three-fourths—the circumstance of the petitioner having taken the course of procedure which was originally adopted, can bar him from now resorting to the provisions of the 14th section, to procure the relief in virtue of them, which he might have competently had, if he had originally made his claim the subject of separate applications, or put it alternatively in one petition, craving application of the trust-fund to its amount, and authority to be given under the 14th section quoad ultra. If indeed the heir of entail is not entitled to combine the two modes of relief, but must elect the one or the other, the case would be different; but as I have already stated, that is a view of the statutory provisions which I have not been able to adopt. Therefore, upon the whole matter, I am of opinion that the prayer of the petition ought to be granted as respects the said sum of L.2349, 0s. 2½d.; for I need hardly remark that if competent in so far as it is founded on the 14th section, it is equally so in so far as alternatively founded on the 18th section of the statute, which makes it lawful for the heir of entail to charge the entailed estate, by bond and disposition in security, to the extent and in the manner there provided.

LORDS MURRAY and COWAN.—We concur in the opinions of the Lord Justice Clerk and Lord Wood.

LORDS BENHOLME, NEAVES, and MACKENZIE.—We are of opinion that the prayer of the petition, bearing date 7th August 1855, ought to be granted, as regards the sum of L.2349, 0s. 2½d. sterling mentioned therein.

No. 83.

Jan. 31, 1857.

Earl of Eglinton.

1. The Entail Amendment Act of 1848 draws a distinction between improvements executed previous, and improvements executed subsequent to the passing of the Act. And this distinction has been held to apply, both to such improvements as have been made the subject of decree, in terms of the Act 10th George III., and to improvements of the nature contemplated by that Act, but which, from irregularity or omission of the statutory forms, cannot be made the subject of such decree. The 13th & 14th sections of the statute authorise two different kinds of bonds of annual-rent, where decree has been taken; the difference between them being founded upon this distinction. And section 16th establishes the same difference, where the bond of annual-rent has to be granted for improvements which cannot be made the subject of decree.

The difference between the two styles of bonds of annual-rent does not consist merely in the amount upon which the annual-rent is calculated; being three-fourths in the one case, and in the other the whole of the sum expended in improvements. There is also an important difference in regard to the parties against whom the annual-rent is to operate, or rather in the date at which the sinking fund (if it may be so called), established by the terms of the bond, is to commence.

Under section 13th the annual-rent is not to bear more than the legal interest during the lifetime of the granter. And the period at which the twenty-five years commence, which, by means of larger annual payments, eventually extinguish the capital sum upon which the bond was calculated, does not arrive till his death.

In the other case, the twenty-five years of the sinking fund commences with the date of the decree, and operates, in the first instance, against the heir of entail himself, who has made the expenditure. If that heir should survive a few years, the burden upon the subsequent heirs of entail will not be heavier than it would have been, under the former kind of bond. For although the annual payment will still be in the proportion of four to three, the length of time which the burden has to last will be diminished, in the proportion which the years of the expender's survival bear to the whole period of twenty-five years. If the expender should survive for twenty-five years, the burden on the succeeding heirs of entail is worked off altogether.

The two styles of bond, therefore, are by no means so unequal in their operation, as might be supposed, if the different amount upon which the two are calculated be alone considered.

We do not consider that any correct or adequate description of the two styles of bonds is given, by stating that by the one style of bond the heir has power to charge the estate with three-fourths only, and by the other, has power to charge it with the whole of the sum expended; nor do we think that there is much in the observation of the petitioner, to be found on page 5 of his minute, to the following effect:—"It cannot be maintained that any prejudice is done to the heirs of entail, in charging the estate with the whole improvement-outlay made after the passing of the statute 1848; because, in acquiescing in the decree of declarator under the Montgomerie Act, they do so in the full knowledge of the provisions of the 14th section, which makes the whole, and not three-fourths of the outlay, chargeable on the estate." This explanation seems unsatisfactory, because, by the 15th section, the very same arrangement and distinction is established, in regard to improvements which cannot be made the subject of decree of declarator. It would appear, therefore, that if any explanation were required in regard to the difference as to the amount in the bond, introduced respectively by the 13th & 14th sections, it is to be found in the different operation of the bonds in regard to the commencement of the sinking fund. Had the 14th section (like the 13th) specified the sum upon which the annual-rent was to be calculated as no more than the sum for which decree had been obtained against the subsequent heirs of entail, it would have been somewhat incongruous and unjust. For, by the style of the bond, the heir himself, who takes the decree, is to bear his share in liquidating the capital; and a long survival on his part, might deprive him of the whole benefit of the decree already obtained.

Upon a full consideration of the two different styles of bonds of annual-rent, it

No. 83. cannot be concluded, that the Legislature intended that the latter style of bond should bear heavier, comparatively, upon the subsequent heirs of entail, than the former style. One thing only appears to be quite certain, that under the latter style of bond, a more speedy liquidation of the burden is secured, in reference to all concerned.

Jan. 31, 1857.
Eglington.

But, whatever weight may be attached to this explanation, we are of opinion that, in regard to the amount upon which the bond of annual-rent is to be calculated, the words of the 14th section are too clear and explicit to leave any room to doubt that it was the whole sum expended, and not merely the three-fourths for which decree had been obtained.

2. The 26th section of the statute introduces a remedy, or rather a privilege, in favour of heirs of entail, which appears to us to be altogether independent of the remedies and privileges introduced by the 13th, 14th, 15th, and other sections of the Act.

These latter remedies are to be taken against the entailed estate or against the heirs of entail; whereas the remedy of the 26th section, is to be taken against no estate and no persons directly; but against pecuniary funds arising from the sale of, or the liquidation of damage done to the estate, or from additional funds being invested under trust, towards the purchase of additional estates to be entailed. Against such funds the Legislature has introduced a more extensive remedy than is, by any of its provisions, competent against the entailed estates themselves, or against the heirs of entail.

As regards the disposal of such funds in paying improvements, the privilege conferred upon the heir of entail is very extensive. It is not confined to monies for which decree has been obtained under the Montgomerie Act; or even to improvements of the nature specified in that Act. It extends to all permanent improvements; whether past or future.

This section makes no reference whatever to the Montgomerie Act. Had that Act never been passed, the operation of section 26 would have been just as extensive as it is. And that the Montgomerie Act was ever passed, does not, in our opinion, suggest any restriction upon the operation of that section. In short, we consider the remedy of section 26 to stand clear of all other statutory remedies, either under the Montgomerie Act, or under the previous sections of the present statute which have reference to it.

Section 26 plainly contemplates a liquidation of the whole sums by which the estate has been permanently improved. That these sums, besides constituting permanent improvements, are also of the nature contemplated by the Montgomerie Act, and have been made the subject of decree against the heirs of entail, to the extent of three-fourths,—suggests no good reason why the 26th section should not apply to them; and still less, any good reason why, if it do apply to them, that remedy should not be taken as is given in that section. That the heir of entail has taken decree in terms of the Montgomerie Act, for three-fourths of the sums he has expended on improvements, seems no reason for depriving him of his remedy against the disengaged fund, or the additional trust-fund. It was plainly the intention of the Legislature that he should have, as against those funds, remedies of a peculiarly extensive kind.

Considering, therefore, that section 26 is in its nature and in its terms plainly independent of the statutory remedies in the 13th, 14th, and 15th sections of the present Act, as well as of the Montgomerie Act, we are not moved by the doubt expressed by the Lord President in the case of Richardson, which also seems to have recurred in an earlier stage of the present case; but think that the petitioner, had the consigned funds been sufficient, would have been entitled to have obtained out of them, the whole sums expended by him in improvements, and not merely the three-fourths for which he had obtained decree under the Montgomerie Act.

3. But the petitioner, out of those funds, has obtained payment of only three-fourths. The funds did not admit of his obtaining payment of the whole. And the question is now raised, whether, in regard to that fourth part, he is to be deprived of the remedy provided by the 14th section, in respect that he has already, to a limited extent, been enabled to avail himself of the remedy introduced by section 26?

We are of opinion that this question ought to be answered in the negative

Here again, we think that the two remedies are independent of each other. The effect of the petitioner's former proceedings under section 26, is just to strike off, by payment, three-fourths of his claim for improvement outlay. To the extent of one-fourth, his claim remains exactly what it was before. And as under section 14, he would formerly have been entitled to grant bond of annualrent calculated upon the whole amount of his outlay,—so there still remains to him, notwithstanding the payment made to him out of the consigned fund, to the extent of three-fourths, the power of granting bond of annualrent for the remaining one-fourth.

Of this date the case was advised.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case, as in the case of the Earl of Kintore, the judgment will be in terms of the opinions of the consulted Judges.

The only other point upon which the reporter expressed a doubt, was whether the expense of erecting a racket-court properly formed part of the expenditure contemplated by the statute.

Sol.-Gen. for the petitioner.—This is a separate building, and therefore must come under the head of offices. It is not unsuitable to the position in life of the petitioner. The offices are adjuncts of the mansion-house, and this is an adjunct of the offices.¹

LORD DEAS.—I doubt whether this is for the improvement of the lands and heritages.

After consultation—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The opinion of the Court is, that this does not fall within the provisions of the statute.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, on report of Lord Mackenzie, and on consideration of the opinions of the consulted Judges on the point referred to in the interlocutor of 28th June 1856, and in conformity to the opinions of the majority of the whole Judges on the foresaid point, and having heard counsel for the parties, Disallow the sum of L.864, 0s. 9d. expended in the erection of a racket-court at Eglinton Castle, in respect such expenditure is not expenditure falling under the provision of the statute referred to in the petition: Find and declare, that in addition to the sum of L.2349. 0s. 2½d. mentioned in the petition, the sums of L.684, 6s. 7½d. and L.2302, 18s. 7d., subject to deduction of the said sum of L.864, 0s. 9d., amounting together, after said deduction, to the sum of L.2123, 4s. 5½d. sterling, have been expended by the petitioner in improvements on the entailed lands and estates of Eglinton, mentioned in the petition, of the nature contemplated by the Act 10 Geo. III. c. 51; and decern: Farther, they find and declare that the whole of the said sums, after deduction as aforesaid, was expended on improvements executed subsequent to the passing of the statute 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36: Grant warrant to and authorise the petitioner" to execute "(1) An annualrent during the period of twenty-five years from and after the date of the decree already obtained by the petitioner, being the 16th day of March 1853, such annualrent not exceeding the sum of L.7, 2s. for every L.100 of the foresaid sum of L.2349, 0s. 2½d.; and (2) An annualrent during the period of twenty-five years from and after the date of the said decree before pronounced, such annualrent not exceeding the sum of L.7, 2s. for every L.100 of the foresaid sum of L.2123, 4s. 5½d., payable the said annualrents half-yearly, by equal moieties;" "all in terms of sections 14 and 16 of said Act 11 & 12 Vict. c. 37; or otherwise" to grant bonds and dispositions in security over said estates, or any portion thereof, other than the mansion-house, offices, and

This action had three conclusions.—1. For delivery of goods under a contract. 2. For damages. 3. Failing delivery, then for payment of a sum of money. An interlocutor disposing of the first conclusion in favour of the pursuers, and directing the case to be proceeded with as regards the remaining points, was taken to appeal and affirmed, with expenses. The pursuer now petitioned the Court for application of the judgment, to have the case put to the roll, "that the other conclusions of the action may be disposed of," and "to find the petitioners entitled to the expenses of this application."

The respondents did not resist any part of the prayer except that as to expenses, and contended that there was a fixed rule that the unsuccessful parties were not found liable in the expenses of a petition to apply a judgment of the House of Lords when the petition was not opposed.¹

The petitioners maintained that that rule applied only where the judgment of the House of Lords was one which exhausted the cause. This was a case where it would not do to put in an extract of that judgment. Farther procedure was necessary.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think this is a case where a petition was necessary. Although our interlocutor is affirmed there is an addition made to it, and the whole conclusions of the action are not yet disposed of. The petition might possibly have been rendered unnecessary by a letter of consent, but we have not that here.

The rest of the Court concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Apply the judgment of the House of Lords: Find the petitioners entitled to the expenses of this application: Allow an account, &c., and appoint the case to be farther proceeded in."

William Anderson, a farmer in Aberdeenshire, pursued Alexander Torrie, an Aberdeen advocate, for damages in the following circumstances.

In 1852 John Anderson, the pursuer's brother, raised an action of count and reckoning against him for his alleged share of funds intromitted with him. The pursuer alleged that the claims against him were groundless; that, when he was from home, and in absence of his agent, John Anderson obtained, on 5th January 1853, a decree in absence against him for a random sum of L.600. This decree was extracted, and a charge given, on 11th January, at the pursuer's residence, but he was not at home, and it was only two or three days afterwards that he learned that the decree had been pronounced. He immediately went to Aberdeen and waited upon the defender, and instructed him, as his agent, to get him reponed in common form against the decree in absence, and to defend the action, and he supplied him, at the same time, with funds to consign the expenses, and to prepare a petition for reponing. Notwithstanding this, on 4th February, the day after the expiry of the charge, the pursuer was surprised by the arrival of a messenger-at-arms, who proceeded to poind the whole crop and stocking of every description in virtue of the decree. He immediately went to Aberdeen, where he ascertained that, though the defender had presented the usual petition for reponing on 1st January (which commenced by praying the Court "to sist execution of the said decree," he had not lodged defences to the action, as he should have done, and the Sheriff, consequently, did not repon, but pronounced this perlocutor:—"In respect of the consignment, meantime sists execution, and allows the petition to be seen till 3d February next." But this sist was not intimated by the defender till after the poinding had been executed, and the consequence was, that, when the petition came to be considered, it was resisted by John Anderson, on the double ground that the defences had not been lodged, and that the decree obtained had now been implemented by the poinding, and the Sheriff dismissed the petition, with expenses. The pursuer advocated this process to the Court of Session, but the judgment of the Sheriff was adhered to (6th June 1855.) John Anderson having thereafter taken steps to carry out the poinding by sale, the pursuer has been obliged to advocate the process of poinding also; and, with a view to open up the whole proceedings, he has brought a reduction of the decree in absence, with diligence, and he intimated to the defender all these proceedings, and that he held himself liable for them all. He frequently represented to him the hardship he was exposed to from the subsisting of the poinding, while he had his rent to pay, and his lease expired at Whitsunday 1853; and he alleged that Torrie "advised him to dispose of his stock just as if it had not been poinded, and, both verbally and in writing, offered to guarantee him against the consequences of so doing." The written guarantee referred to was a letter in the following terms:—"Aberdeen, 10 Feb. 1853.—Sir,—I wrote you yesterday, and I have received no answer; it is ridiculous for you to speak of not taking your cattle to the market for sale. I told you that I was ready and willing, and still am, and I hereby judicially offer to guarantee you against any loss or trouble for carrying on the business of the farm, that had not been poinded. You know, or ought to know, that an illegal poinding may be disregarded, and the more especially when I offered, and I offer to guarantee you agt. any loss or trouble. Go to market and sell at the highest price, and buy in the cheapest market.—Your obdt. (Signed) TORRIE."

 Anderson v.
 Torrie.

The pursuer, after delaying as long as he could, at last, trusting to the guarantee, and Torrie's assurances that the poinding was illegal, disposed of part of the stock, whereupon his brother charged him with breach of poinding, and he was apprehended and carried to prison in Aberdeen, and was only liberated conditionally after some time. This process of breach of poinding was also in dependence, so that the pursuer had been involved in four litigations, all directly or indirectly through the conduct of Torrie.

The summons concluded for L.1000, "as the amount of the loss and damage sustained, in consequence of the defender's failure through gross and culpable, or wilful negligence, to get the pursuer reponed in the usual and ordinary form, against a decree in absence pronounced in an action at the instance of John Anderson, and which loss, injury, and damage, has accrued and is accruing to the pursuer, by and through poindings of his goods, his apprehension for alleged breach thereof, expensive and tedious litigation, and in various other ways, against all which the defender is bound, both by law and by express agreement, to guarantee and relieve the pursuer," &c.

The defender pleaded;—1. The action is not relevant. 2. The defender having fulfilled all that he was employed, or which he was bound to perform, there are no grounds for a claim of damages against him. 3. The defender is not liable for non-intimation of the sist, in respect, (1), That the creditor, John Anderson, or his agent, knew of it; (2), Because the creditor was bound, in any view, to have become acquainted with the deliverance of the Sheriff, the same being merely a decree in the course of the process; and, (3), Because no intimation whatever had been ordered by the Sheriff upon the creditor.

Tentative issues were lodged by the pursuer.

The Lord Ordinary, after hearing a debate on the relevancy, reported the case to the Second Division, without a decision, but with the subjoined note. *

The pursuer argued;—That all the difficulties in which he had been placed had sprung from the defender's failure to intimate the sist, without which it had proved entirely nugatory, so that John Anderson had been able to proceed in bona fide to execute the poinding, and so, by having obtained part-implement of his decree, ultimately to defeat the petition for reponing.¹

In the Inner House the defender argued;—The action was laid in part upon fault as an agent, and in part on a contract of guarantee, but it was not relevant on either branch. The procedure for reponing took place

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary thinks this action clearly relevant as an action of reparation for the damage suffered by the pursuer, through the defender's alleged gross negligence, in not taking due steps to have the pursuer reponed against a decree in absence, pronounced in the Sheriff-court. But the pursuer further contends, that he has a separate claim upon a guarantee said to have been granted by the defender, and under which the pursuer was induced to violate a poinding executed of his goods, and was in consequence apprehended, and dealt with 'as a criminal.' The Lord Ordinary has doubts of the relevancy of such a demand in any circumstances, as founded on a mere obligation of guarantee. But further, he does not think that this is here libelled as a separate ground of action. The true medium concludendi seems to be that the pursuer has suffered injury, in various ways no doubt, but all through the defender's negligence. The attempt to make a separate claim and plea on the guarantee, apart from the reparation for negligence, seems an ex post facto thought; and on the whole, the Lord Ordinary thinks that there is really only one ground of action to go to issue, leaving to the pursuer to shew the damage of every kind thence arising.

"The point of relevancy, however, is so much mixed up with the adjustment of the issues which were ordered before answer, that the Lord Ordinary has reported the whole case without a decision."

under the authority of Act of Parliament, which never contemplated a sist without reponing, and the Sheriff did wrong in not at once giving decree of reponing,—instead of which he merely granted a sist. It was, moreover, imperative on the Sheriff to order intimation of a sist.¹ Here, however, that was not done, so the agent had not failed in his duty. But, even if it were the duty of an agent in the ordinary case to intimate a sist, it could not be so when the interlocutor granting it was wholly irregular and incompetent. So far as this action was laid on the guarantee, it could not be sustained. It amounted to a pactum illicitum. It was a guarantee, not against any injury arising from fault, but a guarantee against the consequences to follow from a direct violation of the law.

Anderson v.
Torrie.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—A decree in absence went out against the pursuer on 5th January. He was not aware of it, and it was extracted, and a charge given, of which he did not know till the 21st. He went off to Aberdeen—saw his agent, giving him instructions to get him reponed,—giving him full information as to the charge, and lodging with him money to enable him to consign the expenses, that he might apply to the Sheriff.

Of the character of the application to be made, the agent alone was the judge. He did apply on 31st January, and of same date an interlocutor was obtained thus: “in respect of the consignment, meantime sists execution.”

The prayer of the petition for reponing had been very properly framed to obtain a sist, because at the expiry of the charge, the party holding the decree was at liberty to poind. In the previous case (Anderson v. Anderson) there was discussion raised on the procedure in the Sheriff-court, as to whether or not the first duty of the Sheriff was not to have reponed before granting the sist. That discussion is out of place here. It is enough that execution was proceeding when the defender himself applied for a sist, and obtained it. The truth is, he seems to have thought that there was no hurry, and so let the time for intimation pass, and then the execution went on. But truly, as Lord Deas remarked in the earlier branch of the case in June 1855, a sist of execution which was not to be intimated, would have been nugatory. There seems great propriety in the sist being granted, and whether it was ordered to be intimated or not, it was clearly the agent's first duty to have intimated it.

Whether this was an irregular interlocutor that was pronounced is not the question before us, but it will not do for the agent who applied for it to say that it was wrong. That takes place which it was the agent's duty to prevent, and which he had the means of preventing, and I think he is clearly liable in the consequences.

Then comes the question as to the damages on the guarantee.

The pursuer tells the defender of his surprise at the poinding—that his rent is coming due, and his lease to an end, and that he requires to sell everything, but his hands are tied. He intimates to him his difficulties as holding him responsible, and his reply was, that the poinding was illegal, and he should proceed to manage as if it had never taken place, and he will guarantee him against the consequences. Is he not clearly responsible for such advice? It is said this was not done as a professional man, and not in the character of his agent, but I confess I think the action sufficiently includes reparation for the consequences of his breach of the poinding.]

I purposely abstain from entering into the question as to the form of the interlocutor in the Sheriff-court, because, whether it was right or wrong, the agent at least did obtain his first object—the means of stopping the diligence, and it was his duty to have used them.

LORD MURRAY.—I have no difficulty, except as to the letter of guarantee, and the extent to which it is to be insisted in. Anderson applies to Torrie in his difficulty, and he executes this ridiculous guarantee, and now he turns round and says “It is pactum illicitum, the opinions it contains are unsound, and I may give as much unsound advice as I please, and if any one follows it, and so commits breach of poinding, or does any other wrong, he alone is responsible.” That defence will not do.

No. 85. LORD COWAN.—I agree. There was a summons raised against this farmer—a decree was got in absence, and a charge given. He came down from his farm to Aberdeen to get the requisite legal steps taken to relieve him from the effect of this diligence. He tells his agent fully the position in which he stands, who then presents an application to the Sheriff, and asks a sist of execution. I think the Sheriff did right in pronouncing the interlocutor he did. If he did wrong, he was misled by the petition itself, but I do not think he was wrong. I do not read Lord Curriehill's opinion in the former branch of this case as implying a different view on the only point now before us; and, moreover, the rest of the Court did not concur with him, and disposed of the question then before them against his opinion. Now, the sist of diligence having been thus obtained by the agent, the circumstances certainly present a case of gross negligence. The defender's counsel assumed that after the petition was presented and a deliverance was obtained, the agency ceased. I do not think so. The defender, as I hold, continued to be agent for the pursuer until the object of the application was secured. After the sist was got, it was his duty to take care that an intimation of that sist should be sent immediately to the opposite party. I think he was bound to do everything necessary to place his client in a state of effective protection against the diligence. I do not hold that intimation required to be ordered by the interlocutor itself. Intimation is inherent in such an order, and it was the agent's duty to his client to have it made to the party doing diligence. In the circumstances set forth in the record, I have no hesitation in holding that a relevant case is stated by the pursuer for inferring this liability against the agent.

On the other point, I have nothing to add to the views stated from the Chair.

THE COURT sustained the action as relevant.

THE MONKLAND RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—D. F. Inglis—Mackenzie.

Process—Issues—Relevancy—Damages.—A foreman of a locomotive brought an action of damages against the Railway Company, his employers, on the ground that, while sitting on the pushing frame of his engine, in the execution of his duty, sprinkling sand on the rails, the engine came in contact with a quantity of rubbish on the line, whereby his leg was broken—that the accident occurred in a dark morning in February, when he could not see the obstruction, and in a cutting, where the line was unprotected by a ditch or dyke. The action held relevant, and issues adjusted to try the question.

Feb. 3, 1857.

Ld. Ardmillan

THE pursuer was in the service of the Monkland Railway Company, as fireman on one of their locomotive engines, and he brought this action of damages against the Company, for injuries sustained while in the performance of duty. His allegations were to this effect:—that on the morning of the 8th February 1856, while sitting on the pushing frame of his engine, sanding the rails, which were wet and slippery, it being part of the pursuer's duty to sand the rails when necessary, the engine came in contact with a large quantity of blaize or rubbish, composed partly of large stones, and partly of earth, which lay across the rails, and one of his legs, having struck the same, his leg was broken close above the ankle joint, and otherwise seriously injured. That the accident occurred in a cutting, one side of which rose almost perpendicularly, and was composed of materials easily loosened by rain or the ordinary action of the weather—that the line of rail was unprotected by ditch or dyke—that obstructions on the line, and danger to trains passing along, had been caused by the fall of rubbish at this place on previous occasions—that this was known to the defenders, but that they, notwithstanding, did not adopt proper means or ordinary precautions to prevent any part of the cutting from getting detached, or falling on the line of rails. He pleaded;—That the accident was occasioned by the fault, negligence, or want of precaution on the part of the defenders, or of those for whom they were responsible, and, therefore, that they were bound to make reparation. He proposed the following issues:—"1. Whether the pursuer was in the service of the defenders, as fireman on one of their locomotive engines, on the eighth of February 1856? 2. Whether, while the pursuer was employed as aforesaid on such locomotive, on the morning of that day, at a part of the defenders' line of railway, between Kerse Mains and the bridge which crosses the turnpike road to the west of a place known as the 'Snab,' one of the pursuer's legs was broken through the fault of the defenders, and to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at L.400 sterling.

No. 86.

Feb. 3, 1857.
*Morris v. The
 Railway Co.*

The defenders pleaded;—That there was no relevant statement to support the action, and, also, that the accident was occasioned by the pursuer's violation of the defenders' regulations, and by his own culpable and reckless conduct.

They proposed the following issues:—"Whether the pursuer was in the service of the defenders as fireman on one of their locomotive engines on the 8th of February 1856? 2. Whether, while the pursuer was employed on such locomotive on the morning of that day, and at a part of the defender's Borrowstounness line of railway, between Kerse Mains and the bridge which crosses the turnpike road to the west of a place known as the 'Snab,' one of the pursuer's legs was broken, through the fault of the defenders, by coming in contact with a quantity of blaise and other substance which had fallen on the line, and to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Or, Whether the pursuer's leg was broken by coming in contact with the said blaise or other substance, through his fault or carelessness in sitting on the frame or buffer or other part of the engine, with his legs, or one or other of them, hanging down towards the ground? Damages laid at L.400 sterling."

The Lord Ordinary, on 13th December 1856, pronounced an interlocutor sustaining the relevancy, and reporting the case for the adjustment of issues.

D. F. Inglis—The first issue must be matter of admission. The essence of the pursuer's averment is, that this rubbish had fallen on the line unexpectedly, and that the defenders ought to have prevented it. In specifying the cause of injury, the rule is that the injury must be connected with the immediate cause of the injury, and then that cause of injury must be connected with the negligence and fault of the defenders.¹ That rule had also been adopted in the Second Division. Applying that rule, the issue proposed by the pursuer was defective.

The following issues were approved of:—1. It being admitted that the pursuer was in the service of the defenders, as fireman on one of their locomotive engines, on the 8th of February 1856—

2. Whether, while the pursuer was employed as aforesaid on such locomotive, on the morning of that day, at a part of the defenders' line of railway, between Kerse Mains and the bridge which crosses the turnpike road to the west of a place known as the "Snab," one of the pursuer's legs was broken through the fault of the defenders, by coming in contact with a quantity of blaise or other substance which had fallen on the line, and to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

ROBERT FOULIS, Pursuer.—*Penney—Ross.*LADY FOULIS AND OTHERS (Sir David Foulis' Trustees), Defenders.—Pyper—Broun.

Feb. 3, 1857.

Foulis.

Trust—Vesting.—Trustees were directed to hold the truster's whole estate for payment of the liferent to his widow, and "on the termination of her liferent," to dispoise certain portions to each of the three sons of the truster nominatim, and to divide the residue among them equally, the share of any son predeceasing the truster and his spouse to go to his issue, or failing such issue, to the surviving son or sons equally, or their issue. The two eldest sons died unmarried;—Held (affirming judgment of Lord Handyside), that the provisions to the sons had vested a morte testatoris, and the trustees were bound, on the widow executing a renunciation of her liferent, to convey the whole estate to the surviving son.

Expenses.—Expenses incurred in an action as to construction of a trust-deed, allowed out of trust-funds.

2D DIVISION.
Ld Handyside.
I.

THE late Sir David Foulis executed a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he disposed to Lady Foulis and others, as trustees, his whole heritable and moveable property, under the reservation of his own liferent, for the following purposes:—1st. For payment of debts, &c. 2d, "Immediately on my decease," to make over to Lady Foulis, "for her absolute use and disposal," his whole furniture, and "for her liferent use during all the days of her life, while she shall survive me," the income derived from his whole heritable and moveable property. 3d, For providing a sum of L.400 for an outfit to his youngest son Robert Foulis, declaring that in event of the said sum having been paid by the truster himself during his life, then the interest thereof should go to Lady Foulis as part of her liferent provision, "and the said capital sum of L.400 shall be held and subsequently disposed of as part of my reversionary trust-funds." The 4th purpose of the trust was in these terms,—“On the termination of the liferent above appointed in favour of my said spouse, I direct and appoint my said trustees to convey and make over my heritable estate, and the reversion of my moveable estate, as follows, videlicet.”—Different portions of the heritable property were provided by the truster for each of his two eldest sons, and a sum of money to the youngest; and to the three, equally among them, the whole reversion of the estate, whether heritable or moveable, that should remain after fulfilling the purposes above mentioned. There then followed this clause,—“But providing always, that in event of my said sons predeceasing myself, my said spouse, their mother, and leaving lawful issue then the lands or others appointed to be made over to him or them who shall so predecease, shall be conveyed to his or their children respectively equally among them, my intention being that the lawful children of any of my sons who shall predecease myself and my spouse shall be entitled equally among them to the full provision intended for their father had he survived and also providing, that in the event of any of my said sons predeceasing myself and my said spouse, without leaving lawful issue, then the lands or others appointed to be made over to him or them who shall so predecease shall be conveyed by my said trustees to my son or sons equally who shall survive, or to their lawful issue.”

Sir David died in 1843. His trustees made up titles to his property, and were infeft. His two eldest sons died without leaving issue in 1853 and 1855. Dr Robert Foulis, the youngest and now only surviving son, having entered into an arrangement with his mother Lady Foulis, who had survived both her husband and her two eldest sons, by which she agreed to renounce the liferent of the trust-estate conferred upon her by the trust-deed, called upon the trustees, on such renunciation being executed, to convey the trust-estate to him, in terms of the provisions of the trust-deed, in the same way as if her liferent had been terminated by her death. The trustees not being of opinion that their duty permitted them to comply with this demand, Dr Foulis raised this action, concluding for declarator that the trustees were bound, on Lady Foulis executing a renunciation, to convey the estate to him. He pleaded, that the liferent in favour of Lady Foulis did not suspend the vesting of the provisions in favour of the truster's sons, but only the payment of these provisions; and their provisions having vested at Sir David's death, and they having died without issue, the pursuer, on expeding a general service to them, was entitled to the whole succession, in respect of his mother's renunciation.

The defenders pleaded;—The rights of the pursuer had not vested, and were contingent on his survivance of the liferentrix.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that, on the sound construction of the trust-deed, the liferent constituted in favour of Lady Foulis did not suspend vesting in favour of the truster's three sons, but that their rights under the deed vested a morte testatoris: Finds that, by the predecease of the pursuer's two elder brothers without issue, the pursuer is entitled to succeed to their shares, and to vest the same in his person by service to them: Finds that, on expeding services vesting their shares in him, the pursuer will be entitled to the fee of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, of the truster, and that, on his mother Lady Foulis executing and delivering a renunciation of her liferent, whereby the same will be terminated, the pursuer is entitled to demand, and the defenders, the trustees, are bound to grant, a disposition and conveyance in favour of the pursuer, and his heirs and assignees, of the whole trust-estate of the late Sir David Foulis; therefore, under the qualification of expeding and producing said services, finds and declares, and decerns and ordains, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the defenders entitled to retain their expenses out of the trust-estate, and decerns." *

* NOTE.—(After the statements and quotations in the text.)—"The question raised is whether there is a suspension of vesting in the three sons till the death of Lady Foulis.

"The defenders read the words, 'predeceasing myself and my said spouse,' as signifying the survivance by the beneficiaries of both and each, while the pursuer held that by their survivance respectively of one the grammatical force of the expression was satisfied. The Lord Ordinary notices this point, but doubts if, by the pursuer's gloss, the testator's meaning is satisfied. He rather thinks that the words need imply the beneficiaries outliving also the testator's surviving spouse, at the termination of whose liferent the trustees were appointed to convey. Nevertheless, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that vesting took place on the death of the truster, and that the period only of conveyance or payment was suspended. He has formed this opinion on a consideration of the presumed purpose of the truster in making his settlement, on the general character of his deed, and on his apparent intentions towards his three sons individually, as the direct objects of his parental regard, exhibited by the bestowal on each of them of separate properties. It is thought that the clause regarding the sons leaving lawful issue, was intended by the truster to guard against any doubt of the succession being carried forward to issue in case of predecease, just expressing by words of explanation of his meaning and wishes what the law would supply under the principle si sine liberis, and not to constitute a conditional institution suspensive of vesting.

"The Lord Ordinary has kept in view the later decided cases on the subject of vesting, and in particular attended to those cited at the debate. But the point being intention, to be gathered from the special character of the deed of settlement, in each case, he deems it sufficient to say that in his judgment the preponderating weight in this case is in favour of the beneficiaries having taken a vested interest, a morte testatoris.

"The Lord Ordinary has found the defenders entitled to their expenses out of the trust funds, as he thinks they were entitled, before disposing, to ask to have the construction of the trust-disposition judicially determined."

Foulis v.
Foulis.

No. 87.
 Feb. 3, 1857.
 Foulis v.
 Foulis.

The defenders reclaimed, and pleaded;—On a fair construction of the trust-deed there could not be held to be any vesting of the fee of the trust-estate prior to the decease of the liferentrix. The truster had made a manifest distinction between the provisions to his widow, which were to take effect “immediately on his decease,” and those to his sons, which were not to come into operation till “the termination of her liferent.” The estate was absolutely conveyed to the trustees, who were to hold it for fulfilment of the purposes of the trust till Lady Foulis’s death. Until that event the estate was expressly “vested” in the trustees alone, who were appointed then to convey it to the three sons or their children, or such of them as might survive. No one of the sons predeceasing Lady Foulis could have alienated his portion so as to disappoint his brothers.¹ The terms of the deed plainly shewed there could be no vesting till the death of Lady Foulis, there was not only a condition of survivorship, but also an ulterior destination, both of which grounds had been held to militate against the vesting of provisions.² The provision with reference to the subsequent disposal of the L.400 also shewed that no vesting was intended. The decision of the Court in the case of Pretty conclusively fixed that, unless vesting took place under the deed, the period of conveyance could not be anticipated by the device of renouncing the liferent.³

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a very clear case indeed, and one in which I have no difficulty. I agree with the Lord Ordinary, though I am not prepared to adopt all the views expressed in the interlocutor.

I begin with the preliminary question. Is there a liferent to be maintained necessarily against the will and interest of this lady? It is not alleged that any undue practices have been resorted to to procure her renunciation. By that renunciation her liferent is terminated. The deed directs the trustees,—“Quarto, on the termination of the liferent above appointed in favour of my said spouse,”—“to convey and make over” the truster’s heritable estate, in the manner then set forth. There is nothing in the deed compelling the widow to accept the liferent, or forbidding that the fee should be given to the parties entitled to it. I look at this provision as in favour of the widow, securing to her her liferent; but if she does not wish to retain it, what is to prevent her renouncing her liferent? I hold, that unless it can be shewn that there is something to compel the trustees to hold the trust-estate for some unknown parties, the object of the truster is very clear in the provisions of this deed. In relation to issue of a deceasing son it is not to suspend the fee, but to prevent the rights of the issue of any of his sons, who might predecease his widow, from being defeated; or, if one of them should predecease the widow, that the rights of the one survivor should not injure the other. There is nothing in them giving an interest to the issue of the children as against the children themselves.

By the decease of both of his elder brothers, the pursuer in this action is the only party entitled to claim the fee of the estate on the termination of the liferent, which may be terminated by her renunciation as well as by her death; and if Lady Foulis does not wish to retain the liferent, and renounces, is it to be held that he is not entitled to the fee which vested in him a morte testatoris? No. 87.

While substantially adhering to the view of the Lord Ordinary, I am not inclined to affirm all the propositions of his interlocutor; particularly, I do not consider that service as heir to the brothers is necessary. Feb. 3, 1857.
Foulis v. Foulis.

LORD MURRAY.—I am of the same opinion with your Lordship as to there being no necessity for a service here. I hold that the leaning is in favour of vesting, and all rights of fee are held to vest unless there be something that operates directly to prevent them. It is contended by one of the parties, that in the clause in this deed we may for “and” read “or,” but that is always a painful thing to do, and I would rather decide the case upon other grounds, if there are other such good grounds. I am inclined to throw this clause out of view altogether; and, on the whole matter, I am of your Lordship’s opinion, which goes upon a general principle that is quite clear.

LORD COWAN.—I would have had no difficulty, if I could have held, as Lord Murray did in the case of Pretty, that the renunciation of the liferent was equivalent to the death of the liferentrix. On that general question I was of a different opinion in that case, holding, along with the majority of the Court, that renunciation of the liferent had no effect on the vesting. I have seen no cause to depart from that view. This case cannot therefore be resolved on that ground. Its solution depends entirely on the question argued by the defenders, whether the fee of the trust-estate vested in Sir David’s sons at the date of his death?

On that point there is considerable difficulty, but I think this deed peculiarly constructed. At the date of the deed, and on Sir David’s death, all his sons were grown up, and two of them were in India. This appears from their designation in the deed itself. Now, in considering the father’s intention, it is not immaterial to keep this fact in view. For unless the estate should have vested in them, they had a power, in the event of marriage, to make it available in order to secure a provision for their wives or children during their mother’s lifetime. Then there is no provision over in favour of other parties, and the subjects conveyed to the sons are generally are distinct specific properties. Farther, the fourth purpose of the trust is very peculiar. It provides, that “on the termination of the liferent,” the whole estate is to be transferred to the sons of the truster. A special estate is transferred to each of the three sons nominatim; and there are provisions for disposing of the estate of each on his death prior to that of his father and mother, “on predeceasing me and my said spouse.” The share of a deceiver is to go to his children; but if he leaves no children, it is destined in a particular way. The provision, therefore, may be considered as a provision in favour of each son who should survive the granters, which vested in each of the sons at the father’s decease.

On these grounds, although not without hesitation, I think the interlocutor may with safety affirmed.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; but of new, find that Lady Foulis is entitled to renounce and bring to an end the liferent of the trust-funds provided in her favour by the trust-settlement of her deceased husband; and that the liferent being so terminated, the pursuer, in the admitted circumstances of the case, is entitled to claim the whole of the trust-property and funds held by the reclaimers as trust-dispensees of the deceased: Therefore, declare and decern in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Of new, find the trustees entitled to retain their expenses out of the trust-funds, and decern.”

MR MACONOCHIE was in 1851 appointed curator bonis to Mr Graham of Airth, and had since then managed the estate. He now presented a note to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills for special powers to burden the estate, producing along with it the following opinion by the Accountant of Court, to whom he had reported the matter, under section 7 of the "Pupils Protection Act :"—

"The estate of Airth, belonging to the ward Mr William Graham, was burdened by his father, the late Thomas Graham Stirling of Airth, with a provision in favour of his youngest son, Mr C. J. H. Graham, the ward's youngest brother, to the extent of L.4999. Under the management of the curator, there has been a considerable surplus revenue from the estate, and the curator intimated to Mr C. J. H. Graham his desire to pay off a part of that claim, but Mr C. Graham objecting to receive a partial payment, has called up the whole amount.

"In these circumstances, the curator proposes to meet the demand by applying the sum of L.1000 which he is able to spare from his bank account towards the extinction of the debt, and under the sanction of the Court to borrow from another party, and burden the estate with the sum of L.4000, and in doing which he proposes to reserve power to pay off hereafter by instalments.

"The Accountant is of opinion that powers may be granted to the curator in the terms craved by him."

The Lord Ordinary reported the matter to the Second Division of the Court, when the following interlocutor was pronounced :—"Having heard counsel in support of the application by Mr Blair Maconochie, curator bonis to Mr Graham of Airth, now confined in a lunatic asylum by order of the Sheriff, and having regard to the origin, nature, and character of such appointments of curator bonis, and the grounds on which its competency has been sustained, and to the fact that such appointment does not necessarily supersede the individual's capacity in point of law, if he chose to act and his sanity should afterwards be proved, and to the objection stated by some of the Judges of this Division to the competency of the Court to authorise and empower such an officer to grant heritable securities over the fee of the estate, vested by habile titles in the person of an individual not cognosced, or divested, or found incapable to act by any appropriate or competent judicial proceeding; and further, considering that it appears that the Divisions of the Court have been gradually led on, step by step, to grant powers which it may be found were not contemplated or in use to be given in former times, and that if such powers as those here prayed for are to be hereafter granted on the ground of expediency; and if creditors are not to be left to resort to their proper remedies, if their debts are not paid, it is proper that the competency of the Court to grant the power to burden or convey the fee of the heritable estate of the person under curatory, should be deliberately considered, and decided by the whole Court, the Lords direct this application to be argued before the whole Court."

In the argument it was submitted for the curator, that if the debt were not paid in the manner suggested, the creditor would be left to take his own remedy—the debt might be assigned, and the estate finally carried off by adjudication; or the debtor might enter by a process of mails and duties.

and arrest the entire rents for the debt, interest, and expenss. To permit which, when there was a free income from the estate which would make it possible gradually to clear it, would, to say the least, be highly inexpedient. There could thus be no question to consider, but the one of the competency of the Court to grant the powers craved. Under the former practice of suing out a brief of lunacy, the difficulty did not arise; but the relatives could not be compelled to adopt that course of procedure, and so the Court came to interfere by the appointment of a special officer. The competency of so proceeding without cognition was very anxiously discussed and settled in the case of Bryce v. Graham.¹

The case was parallel to that of a tutor being appointed, where the tutor-at-law has declined. The position and duties of these officers were nearly identical—the office was temporary, and the powers limited to the preservation and ordinary administration of the estate; but whenever extraordinary circumstances arose, it had always been the practice for them to apply to the Court for powers to enable them to meet them;² and there was a long series of decisions in which every variety of power had been granted, where necessary, for the estate. Thus Somerville's factor (6th February 1836, Sh. vol. xiv. p. 451) was authorised to do what is here sought—viz. to borrow money, and grant heritable security over his pupil's estate; and so high are the powers of a curator bonis held to be, that without any feudal title being made up in his own person, he can validly convey the estate under his charge, and, when necessary, will be authorised to do so.³ There were many cases in the books showing what was considered to amount to a necessity, such as to justify granting of bonds or selling,⁴ and to warrant the Court in granting authority to curators to exercise other extraordinary powers of management; and the Court were in the habit of interponing, not only in cases of necessity, but also in cases of expediency, and in aid even of a tutor-nominate.⁵ It would be necessary to go back on the whole practice of the Court for the last century, to hold that there was any incompetency to grant the authority sought. Moreover, the usage which was thus unbroken had been imported into the Pupils Protection Act, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 51, sect. 7.*

LORD PRESIDENT.—The competency of the Court under any circumstances, however urgent, to grant to a curator bonis of a person in Mr Graham Stirling's condition, power to burden the fee of the heritable estate of the person under curatory, is the point on which our opinion is desired, and to which the argument from the bar was directed. If it be not competent for the Court to grant such power under any circumstances, however urgent, then it follows that the present application must be dismissed on that broad ground alone, irrespective of the particular circumstances of this case, and that any inquiry into the circumstances is not only unnecessary, but is legally excluded. If, on the other hand, it be competent for the Court to take into consideration the circumstances under which such an application is made, and to grant the power where the interests of the person under curatory, and of his estate, manifestly require the aid of such power to protect them against imminent loss or injury, then it will be necessary to consider whether the circumstances under which the present application is made are such as to bring it within the competency. That, however, is a point on which the opinion of the whole Court is not asked. It is an ulterior question that will not arise until the larger question of competency is disposed of, and will not arise at all if that larger question shall be decided in the negative.

Having given attention to the considerations suggested in the interlocutor of the Second Division, as well as to those urged from the bar, and having reviewed all the authorities and cases I know of bearing on the point, and having in view the provisions of the Pupils' Protection Act (1849), I am of opinion that it is competent for the Court to grant power to a curator bonis to borrow money on the real security of the heritable estate of the person under curatory, where it is made clear to the Court that the interests of the person under curatory, or of his estate, will be exposed to serious loss or injury which cannot otherwise be averted, but from which they may be protected by the intervention of such aid. But while I am of opinion that it is competent for the Court to protect these interests, and that it has been in use to do so by granting such power when necessary for that purpose, I am not of opinion that it is competent for the Court to grant such power for the mere purpose of avoiding inconvenience or of facilitating operations from which sistent with due regard to the amount of the estate at the time, may sanction the measure, and the decision of the Court shall be final, and not subject to appeal; and if the estate be held under entail, it shall be lawful to the Court to authorise the factor to take proceedings for constituting as a charge against the future heirs of entail, or otherwise recovering, the money expended in making any improvement upon the estate, under and in terms of an Act passed in the tenth year of the reign of his Majesty King George the Third, intituled 'An Act to encourage the improvement of lands, tenements, and hereditaments in that part of Great Britain called Scotland held under settlements of strict entail,' and under and in terms of an Act passed in the session of Parliament holden in the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled 'An Act for the amendment of the law relating to entail in Scotland;' but nothing herein contained shall be held as conferring power on the Court to authorise the factor to build or enlarge a mansion-house upon the estate, or to charge the estate and future heirs of entail to a greater extent than one-half the amount with which the heir in possession, if under no incapacity to do so, could have charged the estate under the said Acts, or either of them; and if a factor having charge of the estate of any lunatic or other person incapable of managing his own affairs shall deem it proper for the comfort or welfare of such person that the whole or a part of such estate should be sunk on annuity, he shall report the matter to the accountant, who shall state his opinion thereon in writing, and such report and opinion shall be submitted by the factor, with a note as aforesaid, to the Lord Ordinary, who shall report the matter to the Court, and it shall be in the power of the Court to sanction the measure, and the decision of the Court shall be final, and not subject to appeal; and in all other matters in which special powers are, according to the existing practice, in use to be granted by the Court, the Court shall have power to grant the same in like manner and form as is above provided."

gain or profit may be expected. There may be mixed cases in which protection from impending loss or injury, and promoting of positive gain or profit might be blended, and might both result from the one act of granting power to burden or convey. I need scarcely say that in such a case the presence of the latter element or expectation would not militate against the competency of the Court to grant the power shown to be necessary for the purpose of protection.

The grounds on which I rest the opinion I have thus expressed affirming the competency of the Court to grant the power under certain circumstances, are substantially the same as those set forth in the detailed opinions of Lord Curriehill and Lord Neaves. To restate grounds already so fully stated, would be superfluous. I therefore refer to these opinions as containing a sufficient exposition of my views on this general question of competency,—expressing no opinion,—none being asked on the effect of the application of them to the circumstances of this particular case.

LORD DEAS.—My views of the present question are substantially expressed in the opinion of the Lord President, to which, therefore, it is sufficient to refer.

The term competency is used in reference to such applications in a peculiar and, perhaps, not very logical sense;—embracing not the mere abstract nature of the application, but the circumstances in which it is presented. These circumstances may, and generally do require to be ascertained, by inquiry, before the competency can be decided. This has not been done in the present case; and, consequently, our opinion is asked, as I understand it, not upon the competency of this particular application, but upon the general question whether, in any case, a power to borrow, such as is here prayed for, can competently be granted to the curator bonis of a lunatic who has not been cognosed?

I am of opinion that, in certain circumstances, such a power may competently be granted. To a description of these circumstances I can approximate no nearer than by saying that they must amount to a legal necessity;—words which, I am very sensible, may, in themselves, require definition; but which it would not be easy, and is not here necessary to define more precisely than by giving instances both ways, as has been done in the opinion of the Lord President, to which I have already referred.

LORD CURRIEHILL returned the following opinion, which was concurred in by Lords Handyside, Benholme, and Mackenzie:—The question on which our opinion is sought is, Whether or not this Court can competently empower a curator bonis of a person in Mr Graham Stirling's state to borrow money on the real security of the ward's heritable estate, for the purpose of paying his personal debts?

This question is of great importance retrospectively. In many cases, this Court has granted such special powers, and the powers so granted have been acted upon to a great extent; and if it should now be found that such powers were not lawfully granted, and that the grants and the securities following upon them must be dealt with as nullities, many persons may be ruined by having trusted to the validity of the powers granted by this Court.

The question is of still greater importance prospectively. A curator bonis, in virtue merely of the usual powers implied in his office, cannot validly create a real burden on the heritable estate; and if it be not competent for this Court to authorise him to execute such power, the debts of the unfortunate wards, when, as in the present case, the estates consist only of heritage, could be satisfied only by the creditors resorting to adjudications, processes of mails and duties, and other steps of legal execution. And the consequences would be—1. That much of the estates would be wasted in defraying the expense of such proceedings. 2. That by the creditors entering into possession on decrees of mails and duties, or otherways, a very detrimental as well as expensive course of management would supersede that of the guardians; and during its continuance the unfortunate wards might be deprived of the means of subsistence. 4. That if the debts should not be paid during the currency of the legal, the estates might be evicted by means of decrees of declarator of its expiry; and, 5. That in cases where the debts owing to the creditors insisting for payment were incurred by an ancestor of the ward, from whom he has by succession derived his right to the estate (and the present case is an example of this), that estate might be sequestrated, and judicially sold.

If it be not within the jurisdiction of this Court to save such incapacitated persons from such disastrous proceedings, by empowering their guardians to borrow funds for payment of their debts on the security of their estates, it does not appear that any tribunal in Scotland has authority to do so. Although it is part of the Royal prerogative, with the advice of the Judges of Exchequer, to appoint tutors in such cases by gifts of tutory, proceeding upon services, when the next agnates apply for the office, and upon signatures, when the tutors are selected by the Crown itself, yet such gifts confer only the usual powers; and neither the Crown, through any of its functionaries, nor the Court of Exchequer, nor any tribunal other than the Court of Session, has ever since the Union, when the Scottish Privy Council became extinct, exercised such authority.

But this Court has been in use to exercise its jurisdiction in such cases from time immemorial, and at all events during the century and a half which has elapsed since the Union. And such inveterate usage, being the best exponent of the constitution of the Court, is sufficient to establish that the jurisdiction which it has so exercised does truly belong to it. The very ground, indeed, upon which the jurisdiction of this Court to make appointments of curators bonis to insane persons, without a previous cognition, is held to rest, is inveterate usage, as appears from the report of the case of Bryce, dated 25th January 1828. In that case the House of Lords ultimately affirmed the judgment sustaining this jurisdiction. Inveterate usage is as effectual to establish the jurisdiction of the Court to grant special powers, when it appears to be proper to do so, as it is to establish the jurisdiction to confer the office with the usual powers. And accordingly it was found, in conformity with the unanimous opinion of all the consulted Judges, in the case of Somerville, 6th Feb. 1836, F. C., 1st, That, in point of fact, this Court has been in use, from time immemorial, to grant such special powers to curators bonis or judicial factors; and, 2dly, That this usage was sufficient to establish the competency of the Court to grant special powers to such a functionary to borrow money on the security of the ward's heritable estate for the payment of his personal debts. The report of that case states, that the Second Division of the Court directed the opinions of the other Judges to be obtained on this question, "with a view to settle more authoritatively the nature and extent of its powers." And the nature and extent of its powers having accordingly been thus settled in conformity with the unanimous opinion of all the consulted Judges, I hold that settlement of the question to have been conclusive. I could not assent to that question being now unsettled, after the country has been transacting for twenty years on the faith of that decision, even if I could see any grounds for doubting its soundness, which, however, is not the case.

But this is not all. It is certain that the usage upon which that judgment in 1836 proceeded, continued in observance until the passing of the Pupils Protection Act (12 & 13 Vic. c. 51) in 1849. In proof of this usage, reference may be made to four reported cases, which were decided during the two years immediately preceding the passing of that Act. In the case of Dunbar, 7th July 1847, a curator bonis applied for special power, inter alia, to sell two pieces of ground with houses thereon, belonging to his ward, and to apply the price in payment of his debts and towards his maintenance. What took place is thus stated in the report Lord President: "This case deserves attention. The curator prays for authority to do that which will sweep away the whole property of this lunatic. Let the creditors do what they please, can we agree to such a prayer as this?" Deas "Unless the authority is granted, the creditors will adjudge the property, and swallow up in expenses, that fund which might otherways be saved for the lunatic." Lord President: "We must at least have a report from the Lord Ordinary on the matter." The case was remitted to the Lord Ordinary. On a future day, the Lord Ordinary reported that it was necessary that the sale should be authorised whereupon the Court authorised a sale by public roup as prayed for. Thus the Court exercised its jurisdiction by granting, not merely a power to burden the ward's estate, but even to dispose of it entirely, in order to save it from being wasted by the expense of legal diligence. And in each of the cases of Thrieplan 7th June 1848, and Mackenzie, 18th July 1848, power was given to a curator bonis of a lunatic, who was proprietor of an estate, to borrow money on the security thereof, to pay off debts of the lunatic. And in the case of Stott, 20th July 1848, a curator bonis petitioned alternatively for such a power to borrow on the security of the estate, or to sell it; and the Court authorised him to borrow as prayed for but declined, as matters then stood, to grant power to sell. And thus the Court continued in the practice of granting special powers of borrowing, in such cases, down till the 20th July 1849. And eight days afterwards, viz., on the 28th July 1849, the Pupils Protection Act was passed, the 7th section of which, besides authorising the Court to grant special powers in several cases therein enumerated, in a more simple and economical form than that formerly in use, proceeds thus: "And in all other matters in which special powers are, according to the existing practice, in use to be granted by the Court, the Court shall have power to grant the same, in like manner and form as is above provided for."

I am of opinion, that this enactment had the effect of a statutory confirmation of the jurisdiction which this Court had previously been in the practice of exercising in this class of cases; and of an authority to exercise it thereafter, in the new form which was thereby introduced, being the form in which the present application is made.

That enactment mentions only the case of factors; but the interpretation clause, section 1, explains, that the expression "judicial factor" or "factor," shall mean "factor loco tutoris, factor loco absentis, and curator bonis."

I am therefore of opinion, that the competency of the Court to grant such a power as that under consideration is established by inveterate usage,—and by clear precedent,—and confirmed by statute. This being the case, I do not think it is necessary to inquire, whether or not, if the question had not been already so settled, there would have been sufficient grounds, on abstract principle, for sustaining the competency of the Court to grant such a power. I shall only say on that subject that, in my opinion, it is necessary for the welfare of persons, in the helpless state in which the petitioner's ward is stated to be, that some tribunal should have authority to grant such powers to their guardians, where this is shewn to be requisite for the protection of the estate; that the supreme civil court of the country is the fitting tribunal to be intrusted with such authority; and that this is in harmony with the nature and the extent of the jurisdiction which it exercises in other respects for the protection of persons, who, from nonage or mental disease, are incapable of taking due care of their persons or their property. Thus, when the welfare of parties in that helpless state requires it, this Court can competently afford them the requisite protection by even removing their tutors, however appointed, from their office, and appointing judicial factors or curators bonis to manage their property; or by requiring such tutors to find caution for their intrusions and management; or by authorising to be done voluntarily by guardians what would be done only at great expense and loss to the wards, by judicial proceedings; or even by the Court taking the persons of the wards under its own care,—that is to say, by placing their persons under the charge of parties selected by itself. It has exercised its jurisdiction, in this respect, by removing the custody of children in pupillarity from their tutors, and even from their fathers and their mothers, when circumstances rendered such steps proper. And in the case of Miss Mercer Elphingstone, 31st May 1814, this Court, while it held that a factor loco tutoris had not, virtute officii, the charge of the ward's person, also held it to be within its own competency and duty to see that her person was properly cared for, and accordingly took that matter into its own hands. On the same principle on which it is competent for this Supreme Court to interfere for the protection of such helpless parties in these different matters, I think it is also competent for it to interfere to authorise the guardians of such parties to pay their debts without the estates being wasted by legal executions. At all events, the usage, which has long existed (and the continuance of which has now been expressly authorised by statute), of this Court in certain circumstances authorising loans to be obtained on the security of the heritable estates of such persons, appears to me to have been,—not inconsistent with principle,—but in full accordance with the jurisdiction which belongs to this Court, for protecting from impending loss or detriment the interests of persons in such a helpless state.

The interplevisor of the Second Division suggests several points, to which we should have regard in forming our opinions on this question; and as the discussion at the bar has been ~~as parts~~ in this case, it is very satisfactory to us to have the points of difficulty thus brought under notice, and I shall state my views regarding them.

1. ~~As to the nature, and character of such appointment of~~ curator bonis, and the grounds on which its competency has been sustained." I find these explained in the proceedings in this Court, and in the House of Lords, in the reports of the case of Bryce, already referred to. I there find that it was inveterate usage which was held to be sufficient to shew that the Court has jurisdiction to appoint curators bonis, with the usual powers, to persons incapacitated by mental disease from managing their own affairs, and that too without any previous cognition. And I think that inveterate usage was also, in the case of Somerville, properly held to be sufficient to shew that the Court has jurisdiction to confer upon these functionaries such special powers as are now under consideration, and that all question as to the Court having such jurisdiction is now excluded by the recent statute.

2. "The fact that such appointment does not necessarily supersede the individual's capacity in point of law, if he chose to act, and his sanity should afterwards be proved." In any case where the incapacity of the individual to be a party to such a transaction admits of doubt, the special power should not be granted without either his concurrence being obtained to the transaction, or his incapacity to concur being satisfactorily ascertained. But such a consideration, however it may be held to influence the Court in the exercise of the jurisdiction in particular cases, does not appear to me to affect the general question of competency. This consideration, as it does not affect the competency of this Court to make the appointment with all the usual powers, some of which are of great importance, should not affect its competency to grant such special power in cases where the interests of the ward require it. Even tutors-dative are appointed by gifts from the Crown to persons affected with mental disease without any previous cognition (vide, Stair i. 6, 25, and the cases there referred to of Colquhoun, 22d Feb. 1628, Mor. p. 6276; and Stewart, 21st Jan. 1663, p. 6279); and yet I cannot doubt that at all times it was as competent for this Court to grant such special powers to tutors of that class as well as to tutors-at-law, the gifts of tutory to whom are preceded by cognition. And, at all events, here again the inveterate usage of grants of special power of borrowing on the security of the estates, in cases such as the present, is sufficient, according to precedent and to statute, to sustain the jurisdiction of the Court.

3. "The competency of the Court to authorise and empower such an officer to grant heritable securities over the fee of the estate, vested by habile titles in the person of an individual not cognosced or divested, or found incapable to act by any appropriate or competent judicial proceeding." Here two things are set forth for consideration as affecting the question of competency. Having already stated my views as to the latter of these, viz. the want of a cognition or other judicial proceeding establishing the ward's incapacity, I need not say more on that subject. And with regard to the other consideration, viz. that the fee of the estate remains vested in the ward himself, this does not render it incompetent to grant to the curator bonis the special power of borrowing on the security of the estate. A guardian of any kind, whether or not his appointment be preceded by a cognition, is not as such vested with the dominium of the ward's estate, and he does not act quo owner thereof. He acts for the owner, and as his representative. The maxim, qui facit per alium facit per se, applies to such cases. Although the authority of a guardian is derived from a different source from that of a mandatory, yet, as a mandatory, although not vested with the real right or ownership of the subject of his mandate, exercises, on behalf of his principal, the powers of ownership belonging to the latter, so far as these are within his delegated authority; so such a guardian, although not vested with the real right or ownership of his ward's estate, exercises on behalf of the ward the powers of ownership belonging to him, so far as these are within the authority delegated to him either by law or by special grant. This is the case as to his actings in matters falling under his usual powers; and it is also the case in matters falling under any additional or special power which may be conferred upon him. And accordingly, in such cases, where the title of the ward is not made up, the practice is that the guardians pray for and obtain special powers, first to make up titles in the person of the ward, and then to sell or burden the property so to be vested in the ward's person, in order to raise funds for paying his debts. The case is different as to a judicial factor, appointed on a trust-estate in consequence of the non-acceptance or death of testamentary trustees, because in such a case there is no existing dominus of the estate, and the judicial factor, qua such merely, is not in the position of being either a fiduciary owner, or representative of an existing owner, of the subjects. And hence, if in the performance of his factorial duties as to the trust-estate which is in abeyance, it becomes necessary to exercise such powers of ownership as selling, burdening, or entailing the estate, or disposing it to the beneficiaries, the factor must obtain the fiduciary fee of the estate vested habili modo in his person; and in such cases the Court is in use to authorise him to do so. But this is not necessary or proper in a case like the present, where the fee is not in abeyance, but is vested in its proper owner; and where his guardian, in the due exercise of his powers, whether they be the usual powers of his office, or additional powers specially conferred upon him, acts merely in place of that owner. And accordingly, in the long practice which has established the jurisdiction of the Court in this matter, the guardian has never, in such a case, been required or empowered to obtain the fee of the estate transferred from his ward to himself, and vested in his own person.

4. "The Divisions of the Court have been gradually led on step by step to grant powers, which it may be found were not contemplated or in use to be given in former times." I am not aware that such a special power as that under consideration was ever of this character. But even if it had been so at some former period in the history of our jurisprudence, this would now be of no consequence; as the usage has now been so inveterate as, according both to express decision and statute, to establish the competency of a special grant of such power.

5. "If such powers as those here prayed for are to be hereafter granted on the ground of expediency, and if creditors are not to be left to resort to their proper remedies if their debts are not paid," it is proper that the competency of the Court to grant such powers should be decided by the whole Court. Views of expediency are not always sufficient grounds for the Court granting the power. The distinction is now always taken between cases where the power is sought to enable the guardian to enter into a speculation, however tempting it may be, with the view of making profit for the ward; and a proceeding which appears to be necessary to avoid or prevent serious impending loss or detriment to him. In the present case, the power is sought for the latter purpose; and the competency of granting it for such a purpose is established. The case of Dale, in which a feuing speculation, entered into in virtue of a grant of such a power, was afterwards reduced, is a strong authority against granting such a power for a purpose of the former kind; and accordingly the practice of the Court has been to refuse special powers to sell or to borrow for such a purpose. And although in the Pupils' Protection Act the Court is authorised to grant powers even of this kind in certain cases therein specified, yet, excepting in these specified cases, the former practice will probably be continued.

With reference to the last quoted passage of the interlocutor of the Second Division, it is proper to explain that, in my opinion, the creditors of a person in Mr Graham Stirling's state, while they are left at full liberty to resort to their legal remedies in order to obtain payment of debts owing to them, if the guardians do not otherwise provide funds for that purpose, are not entitled to have any additional special powers conferred upon themselves. Such special powers are granted, —not as a privilege to the creditors of the ward,—but only in order to save the ward himself from the loss which is impending over him, by these creditors resorting to their legal remedies. And I am of opinion that it is competent to the Court to grant this power; reserving to it, of course, to determine whether or not, in the actual circumstances of each case, they should exercise this discretionary jurisdiction.

LORD NEAVES. — The interlocutor of the Second Division, which directs the application by Mr Graham's curator bonis to be argued before the whole Court, seems to indicate that the opinion of the Court is not required on that individual application, but rather on the nature and extent generally of the special powers which ought to be granted to judicial managers for alienating or burdening the heritable property of parties under their care.

Upon this subject, I can only answer the question raised by taking a distinction. I think it competent for the Court to authorise the alienation of such property, or the imposition of a burden upon it, only when and in so far as it is necessary to do so. I think it incompetent for the Court to deal with the property in that way, when there is not a necessity for such a course.

By the necessity, referred to, I mean the necessity of preserving the life, health, or welfare of the party under curatory, or of preserving from destruction or serious injury, the property which is under management.

I have no doubt that the limits between what is necessary and what is not, may often be difficult to define; and in drawing the line, the Court must use its discretion. But I am of opinion that the Court ought not to grant the powers asked except where they are prepared to say that the necessity exists.

It is quite fixed that the Supreme Court can interfere by the appointment of a factor or curator to manage the property of incapable persons who are otherwise unprotected. But confessedly, the foundation of that interference is necessity, and it appears to me that necessity should also be the measure of the interference. If it were necessary to sell the whole property of a person so situated for his subsistence, or for the preservation or recovery of his health, I think it would be competent to do so. In like manner, if it were necessary to sell or burden the property to any partial extent in order to avert the forfeiture or eviction of the property, as where an action of tinsel of feu was brought ob non solutum canonem, or where an expiry of the legal was sought to be declared under an adjudication subsisting for a small balance of debt, I think it would be competent to protect and preserve the property by raising the necessary funds in the way suggested. These are clear cases of necessity. There may be other cases more doubtful in their character; but wherever the Court thinks there is a necessity, I think there is jurisdiction. It is a known principle in the law that necessity creates powers of administration which do not otherwise exist. Thus a shipmaster who is only an institor as to the ship, and who has no administration at all as to the cargo, may sell or hypothecate both, where the owners are absent, and where a case of necessity arises, though without such necessity he could not do so.

On the principles now indicated, it seems clear that no case of mere eligibility or expediency, no desire to make profit, and even, I think, no wish to avoid considerable loss, will justify or give jurisdiction to the Court in such a matter. For illustration, I would refer here to the case of Colt (Mor. Tutor, Curator, and Pupil; Appendix 1), where, in an analogous question as to the powers of a tutor at law, "the Lords, in respect that the contract libelled is an act, not of necessary administration, but of discretionary power exercised on the part of the tutor, in the view of ultimately promoting the benefit of his pupil, found the action incompetent, and dismissed the same." And again to the recent case of Muller v. Dixon, 11th Feb. 1854, 16 Dunlop, p. 536, where the Court at first had authorised the sale of a pupil's property, in certain special circumstances, upon a report that it was an eligible transaction; but upon objection by the purchaser as to the sufficiency of this authority as a title, a further inquiry was ordered, and the transaction was confirmed upon its appearing that it was not merely eligible but necessary.

With regard to the payment of personal debt, I think it may be competent for that purpose to authorise a sale or security affecting the heritage in certain circumstances. There may be such a pressure of diligence, such a prospect of accumulated expense and probable loss, as may threaten ruin to the party interested, and may make it necessary to interfere. But, on the other hand, if there is no urgency—if there is no serious risk of great detriment, there will not be a case of necessity, and it will not, therefore, in my opinion, be competent to give the powers. If, for instance, it may be merely wished to pay a personal debt, or convert it into an heritable one, in order to obtain an abatement in the rate of interest, where the estate can well afford the difference, I think there would be no competency in such an interference; and generally, I may say, that I think a very special case needs to be made out before sanctioning the conversion of personal into heritable debt, under which there is still a personal creditor entitled to demand payment, and to adopt all legal diligence, with the advantage of having a real security over the estate in addition. An heritable security may be more easily transferable than a personal debt. But this will depend on circumstances, and particularly upon the power which the heritable security confers on the creditor, as to which I shall afterwards make some observations.

It may be that, in the present case, there is no possibility of effecting an assignation to the personal debt in favour of a more accommodating creditor, and that it is necessary to pay this debt in order to avert serious loss and confusion in the party's affairs, which might for a time interfere with the due support of himself and family, or involve other impending disasters. Of this, the Court before whom the application depends will judge, and a case of necessity of that nature may be made out, which, in my opinion, would justify them in granting the application. I give no opinion whether the statement at present before the Court shows the existence of such a modus as will give competency to the interference.

I do not believe that the principles now stated are substantially different from those to which the Court have generally looked in their past decisions. They may sometimes have stretched or misapplied them, and it was natural, when the cases were ex parte, that there should sometimes be a want of precision or strict attention to distinctions in the judgments pronounced. The case of Muller, already referred to, is an example of such an oversight. But when the question is deliberately raised, I cannot help thinking it in perfect accordance with past decisions, as well as with correct principles, that the essential difference between necessity and expediency, in respect of the power of interference, should be explicitly put forward in the Court's deliverances.

I shall conclude by adverting to a point suggested by a remark in the opinion of Lord Curriehill. Even in cases where I consider it competent to authorise an heritable security, I doubt the competency, and I have no doubt of the expediency, of granting to the heritable creditor a power of sale, especially if that power is to extend over a much larger portion of property than will be sufficient to pay the debt. I think it would be better for the Court themselves to sell in such a case, when they would have an opportunity of determining how much, and what part of the estate should be sold. To delegate this power to a heritable creditor seems extremely questionable, and more than questionable, if the security and power of sale are to embrace the whole or a large part of the estate. Possibly the want of such a power of sale may make the security less marketable, and not much more eligible in some circumstances, than a personal ground of debt. But I regard this consideration as one of very inferior importance.

LORD IVORY.—On the question of abstract competency, I concur in the opinion of Lord Curriehill; as illustrated in those of the Lord President and Lord Neaves.

As to another question, viz.—What is the form, in which the Court should be approached, in an application for their judicial interposition—whether, as here, by way of summary petition,—or in the shape of an ordinary action of cognition or the like, formally calling as defenders all parties interested,—I might have entertained doubts, how far the more recent practice, of proceeding in the former course, has yet acquired such a degree of consistency and strength, as to overcome the older authorities, which are wholly in favour of the latter. But this is a matter which does not seem to have been in the view either of the parties, or of the consulting Judges,—and therefore I do not enter into it.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The only question on which our opinions are desired is the question of the competency of granting the special powers for which Mr Maconochie has applied as a curator bonis. In considering this question, I think that it must be disposed of, on the assumption, on the one hand, that Mr Maconochie was properly appointed curator bonis to a lunatic, and, on the other hand, that the circumstances of the case are such as to justify the application for special powers to borrow money on the security of the estate, if it be competent for the Court to grant such powers. The abstract point of competency can only be fairly raised on the assumption of this state of the facts. The ultimate disposal of the merits of this particular application remains with the Second Division of the Court, if the competency is ascertained.

I am of opinion that, looking to the long established practice of the Court in a great variety of cases, which it is unnecessary to mention, but many of which are similar to the present, the competency of granting the special powers here craved to a curator bonis is so settled that it would be highly inexpedient to disturb it; and I am by no means satisfied that, even if the question were open, there is any sufficient ground for arriving at the conclusion that the granting of such powers is absolutely incompetent. It may be, that the incapacity of parties to whom curators bonis are appointed has been occasionally acknowledged on slight inquiry or inconclusive evidence, and it may also be, that special powers have been occasionally granted where a case of necessity has not been adequately established. But in a case of undoubted lunacy on the one hand, and of clear necessity on the other hand, I am unable to perceive any solid ground of objection to the competency of the Court's conferring on the curator bonis judicially appointed, a power necessary for the right management of the lunatic's estate. I rather think that the right to grant such power to meet a case of necessity is reasonably implied in the jurisdiction exercised in the appointment of the curator bonis. It is part of the duty of the curator so to manage the estate as to protect it from loss; and if the borrowing of money on the security of that estate is really necessary as an act of management in the discharge of the office of curator, but is not within his ordinary powers, then the conferring of special power to borrow in such a case flows naturally and equitably from the jurisdiction in the exercise of which the appointment was made. In the abstract question of competency, there are no degrees of necessity. These may enter into the merits of each separate application; but the clearest possible necessity must be assumed to raise the pure question of competency. If it is incompetent to grant such powers in a case of necessity, then the urgency of that necessity cannot create a competency; and it must be incompetent even to save the lunatic from starvation, or to protect the estate from utter ruin. To this conclusion I cannot come. I should be very unwilling to arrive at it, if there had been no practice and no authority on the subject; but having regard to the numerous decisions, and to the settled practice for many years, I am of opinion that the granting of the special powers craved in this case is within the competency of the Court, if the necessity shall be satisfactorily instructed.

In so far as the Pupils Protection Act has any bearing upon this question, it appears to me to confirm the view now taken. It is plain, from the 7th section of that statute, that the practice prior to its date of granting special powers to curators bonis, and other judicial factors, was in the view of the legislature, and was left as it then stood, without disturbance or restriction. Now, there can be no doubt, that for many years prior to the date of the Pupils Protection Act, the Court had been in the practice of granting such special powers, or of refusing them on the merits of the particular case,—a procedure as conclusive of the competency as the granting of the power would have been; for if it was incompetent to grant it, all discretion was excluded, and it was unnecessary to inquire into the merits.

On the whole matter, I am therefore of opinion that such power as is here craved may be competently granted, if a clear case of necessity is made out.

When the case came to be advised,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have considered the opinions of the consulted Judges with great anxiety, and with the utmost deference. They have failed to bring conviction to my mind that it is competent for the Court to do what is asked in this case—that of a curator bonis to a person confined in an asylum on certificates. I do not think adequate attention has been bestowed on the state of the facts. There has been no procedure of any sort which declares Mr Graham's incapacity, or puts him under any disability to act as proprietor of his estate.

A petition was presented to the Court by Mr Graham's wife, setting forth that he was afflicted with insanity, and had been placed in the asylum at Dumfries, on the opinions of medical men, and praying, in these circumstances, for the appointment of a curator bonis—that is, to manage and take charge of his affairs. In the view that the Court took, and ultimately the House of Lords, this course of procedure for a curator bonis was sustained as competent, and rested, not on much practice, but still on some practice. Precedents were much wanted in that case. I believe a case, in 1730, which I found had more weight with the House of Lords than any other fact.

But still, while such procedure is clearly competent, it is to be kept in view that it falls altogether short of any kind of cognition or judicial declaration of insanity. The Court proceed entirely on the certificates of the medical men on which the individual has been received into the asylum by the Sheriff, for safety and proper treatment. When a factor loco tutoris is appointed, law has declared a pupil incapable of acting. The pupil has no capacity by law to act, and the Court then are to supply that defect—that is, of legal incapacity, and the factor loco tutoris may competently receive from the Court all the powers of a regular tutor; for, in the condition of the pupil, there is nothing to object against such powers being granted, while that very condition requires such powers, if necessary to be granted

(if there is no regular tutor), in order to fulfil and carry out the object of that guardianship which the Court is bound to undertake and execute. No. 88.

But in such a case as the present no man of full age is superseded in his position and rights, and laid aside as incapable, except by certain legal procedure, ending Feb. 4, 1857. Maconochie.

in the trial of his insanity, and cognoscing that fact by judicial determination. That while shown prima facie to be insane, he should be protected, if no one comes forward with a cognition, and to constitute the proper legal guardian, is quite true, especially if he himself does not oppose that interposition of the Court—and a curator bonis is a very proper proceeding. But still that procedure in no respect whatever approaches to the character or object of a cognition. The Court actually did and declare nothing as to the condition and state of the individual. They simply appoint (there being no opposition, and the person having been previously put into confinement by the Sheriff), a curator to manage his affairs—an appointment solely for protection. The individual remains unaffected in point of legal capacity to act by any declaration or cognition; and no one can doubt that any act or disposition granted by him, in reference to his heritable property, would be perfectly habile and competent, although it might be challengeable; and if a lucid interval or recovery was made out to the satisfaction of the Court such act would be effectual. There is no bar or impediment to it. The individual is still vested in the possession of the lands, and his capacity to act is unaffected by any legal procedure.

I am not able to comprehend how the Court, in such circumstances, can de plano authorise the curator bonis to grant heritable securities in such a state of things in such a party's lands. Curator bonis, observe—that is, an officer appointed simply to protect his property. To this view of the question I do not think that sufficient attention has been paid.

I am not moved by the previous practice. What was done under special authority of the Court is safe from challenge, unless at the instance of the person himself, who recovers, and his right of challenge cannot be excluded. No previous proceedings then would be disturbed. The cases, so far as they are in point, are, in number not numerous. And so far has the point been held not to be settled, that, in the case of Watt in 1855, the other Division ordered a minute of debate to be given on the question now under consideration, and again, in the subsequent year, ordered a minute of debate on the very same point in the case of Nesbitt, showing that little the matter was understood to be settled.

I do not feel myself, then, constrained, by course of authorities, to hold this as a settled point. And while it is very satisfactory to find that, generally speaking, other Judges desire to put great restraint on the propriety of granting such unusual powers as are here asked, yet the considerations they urge on that matter do only to strengthen the objections to the competency of the Court authorising a curator bonis to burden the fee of the property of the individual whose affairs he is appointed to manage.

In the view I take of the case, I proceed entirely on the broad distinction between the case of a curator bonis appointed to take charge of the affairs of a person in confinement on the ground of insanity, but not cognosced, and the cases of factors and tutors to pupils. If I had entertained any doubt upon this important point, the terms of the 7th section of the Pupils Protection Act would have satisfied me that no such powers as those now held to be within the competency of the Court are sanctioned by the Legislature.

It will be observed, that in this section there is introduced one provision as to encumbrance on the capital of the property of an insane person under the management of a factor, and in very special terms. And then by special enactment it is provided that the Court shall have the power to sanction such a measure. But that power had been previously exercised in some cases by the Court. Yet, nevertheless, obviously making the matter to be beyond the competency of the Court, power is specially vested on the Court to authorise this the most necessary authority, which could be asked for, viz., the actual maintenance of the lunatic. Now, for what purpose was this most limited and special power bestowed on the Court?—for such is the character of the provision, if the Court had of itself authority not to sanction this singular act, but, in truth, powers extending far beyond any such limited procedure. It is, as the legitimate and only warrantable conclusion from this provision, that the Court had no such powers as those now ascribed to it, and that the Legislature, having the care of insane persons under the curatory de bonis, thought it necessary for their maintenance to bestow on the Court this special power, and no other, which could affect fee or capital of such insane person's means and estate.

No. 88.

I own I was not prepared for the view taken of the concluding paragraph of this section, in which it is said, that "in all other matters in which special powers are, according to the existing practice, in use to be granted by the Court, the Court shall have power to grant the same in like manner and form as is above provided."

This clause is plainly a mere general declaration, added as a sort of afterthought, to direct that in all cases where special powers are given, the same form of procedure for due inquiry shall be followed. But it would be a most strained construction to hold, that in this indirect manner it was intended to sanction everything that ever was done by the Court, or that, in particular, it was intended, in regard to persons under a curatory de bonis, to give authority to the Court to a different and greater extent than the power specially bestowed in the preceding and separate part of the section. It is contrary to a very general and salutary rule of construction, to hold that any such general clause can be held, on any view of its meaning, to extend to larger and greater powers than that which was previously bestowed. But, in truth, the object of this concluding addition to the section is not intended to make any general declaration as to the powers of the Court, and much less in regard to insane persons under curatory, but simply to provide that, where special powers are to be given, the course of procedure introduced in the opening part of the section is to be followed.

Having, then, expressed my opinion on the general question, the propriety of considering this special application is now for this Division. I do not like this rule about necessity; but still we must now take it a wise and safe rule to be applied, and what is the case here? There is an ample estate here, and a large saving every year. By the direction of the deed there is a provision of L.5000 to the younger son. I do not see anything said that he is about to set agoing legal proceedings against the estate; and even though he did, why it is his father's will that he should have this interest in the estate, and an adjudication might be a very good security with which this curator might deal.

LORD MURRAY.—The opinion of the majority of the Judges goes no further than this, that the powers craved can be granted in cases of necessity. Now, I do not see that a very strong case of necessity occurs here. One of this family has right to and demands payment of L.5000: it is said the curator cannot borrow this at any legal rate. Now, an adjudication would be a very good security, and I cannot see the necessity of this application. Why should there be a power granted by this Court? The report of the Accountant here is perfectly general. He just says that he has no objection to the granting of this heritable security. I dare say he has not; but the question is, is there no other way of raising the money than this? I see there are able men of business employed here, and I think they could devise a way of doing it without coming to the Court. I think there are various ways of doing it; and all the Judges being united upon this, that there must be a necessity, I hold that this application is unnecessary.

LORD COWAN.—On the general question of competency it is certainly expedient that no doubt should be entertained; and it is satisfactory to find that it is the unanimous opinion of the consulted Judges that it is within the power of the Court in certain cases, to give such powers in relation to the heritable estate as are here sought by this curator bonis. The form of the application is immaterial. Whether by action or petition or application under the Pupils Protection Act, the exercise of the powers sought must be shown to be a proper and necessary act of administration, calculated to avert serious loss from the estate.

The case of Muller v. Dixon, 11th February 1854, referred to in Lord Neave's opinion, is exceedingly instructive, as explanatory of the general grounds on which the Court have been in use to proceed in granting powers to interfere, either by loan or sale, with a pupil's or ward's heritage. On a review of the previous case the views ultimately sanctioned by the Court were in perfect consistency with the rule explained in the second paragraph of the opinion of the Lord President. The principle, which will serve as a rule in future in all similar cases, is there clearly and succinctly stated. In that opinion I quite acquiesce. It appears to me to express, in guarded language, the principles which ought hereafter to guide us and the consulted Judges have given it their entire acquiescence. There is, no doubt, a difference between a curator bonis and a factor loco tutoris; but, as regards this matter of granting extraordinary powers to affect heritage, no distinction has been taken in the practice of the Court. This has been fully explained by Lord Curriehill in his opinion. In addition to the case of Somerville and other cases to which his Lordship refers, I may mention that of Eaton v. Murdoch, 4th July 1825. In that case the curator of a lunatic got power to sell his ward's heritage, and became bankrupt with the price in his hands. This led to a claim against his cautioners, who had been no parties to the application; and they resisted the action on the precise ground of its having been incompetent for the Court to grant the powers they did. This plea was overruled both by this Court and by the House of Lords. The case affords a strong illustration of the practice that has prevailed of granting these powers to such officers.

Feb 4, 1857.
Maconochie.

There remains the question, whether, taking the principle to be as stated, it permits us to grant the powers here sought by the curator. Do the facts brought before the Court in this case make out one of mere convenience, from which gain or profit may arise; or is it a case of necessary administration and urgency to avoid serious loss? Owing to the difficulties expressed by your Lordship in the chair, the general question alone was argued before us prior to the remit to the consulted Judges. We expressed no opinion at the time, on the point whether this was a case in which the powers sought should be granted. I have now looked into the whole circumstances of the case, and I do not think there is any such necessity made as ought to induce the Court to grant the application. There is no evidence laid before us but the opinion of the Accountant of Court; and according to that, the whole matter originated with the curator himself. The creditor was contented to let matters alone. As I read the report, the accountant states that the curator wished to pay up a part of the money, but that Mr Graham, the creditor, refused to take partial payment, and called up the whole. The application thus appears to have arisen from a desire on the curator's part to save paying interest, which was very praiseworthy in him. I therefore think, in the first place, it does not appear there is any necessity which would make it competent for us to interfere; for there is nothing to show, that if the curator had let matters alone, Mr Graham would not have done so too. But, secondly, it has not been shewn that there may not be an assignation of this security to some party willing to advance so much of the L.5000 as it is proposed to have a burden on the lands. There is no evidence that this is not a marketable security. A very different case would present itself were the estate of the pupil or ward exposed to diligence of creditors. A case of necessity to justify the interference of the Court might be made out, were the estate exposed to be seriously injured and burdened with expenses by creditors leading adjudications. Then the Court might interfere. Suppose Mr Graham here were to adjudge, and bring a ranking and sale, I will not say there might not be an application to the Court to avoid serious loss and injury; but we have no case of that kind to entitle us to grant the powers sought by this curator.

Lord Wood absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, having considered the opinions of the consulted Judges, Find and declare, in terms of the opinions of the majority of the whole Judges, that it is competent for the Court to grant the power to burden the fee of the heritable estate of the person under curatory, when that shall be thought proper; and the Lords of this Division, having considered the application before them for the special powers therein asked, Find that no case has been made out to the satisfaction of the Court for granting the prayer of the note, and refuse the same, and decern; but allow the expenses to be charged against the estate."

IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

No. 89.

JOHN WATSON, Plaintiff.—Sol.-Gen. Maitland—Fraser.
JAMES SIMPSON AND OTHERS, Defendants.

Feb. 4, 1857.†

Watson v.
Simpson and
Others.

Proof.—Held (ex parte), that in a prosecution before the Justices of the Peace for contravention of an excise statute, where the offence was punishable by a penalty or forfeiture, the offender was not a competent witness in his own favour, under the Act 16 Vict. cap. 20, sect. 3.

EXCHEQUER.
Lords Benholme and
Mackenzie.

THE plaintiff, an officer of excise, prosecuted the defendants, James Simpson, David Saunders, and James Stewart, brewers in Perth, for having in their brewery a quantity of raw and unmalted corn and grain ground and bruised, the same being corn or grain not ground or bruised in premises entered for the purpose of making malt, and not being oats or beans bona fide intended to be used for the purpose of feeding horses, and kept in premises entered as a place for the deposit of horse corn, in contravention of the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 94, sect. 36.* The case was tried before two Justices of the Peace for the county of Perth. The defendants “denied the complaint.” Evidence was led; and after the plaintiff’s proof was concluded, the defendants tendered themselves as witnesses for their defence. The Justices, “in respect the offence charged was punishable on summary conviction, and of the decision in the case Attorney-General v. Otto Radliff, 14th June 1854 (English Court of Exchequer, 23 L. L. Ex. 240), sustained the objection to their reception, and refused to receive them as witnesses.” Other witnesses were examined for the defendants. The Justices pronounced this judgment:—“Find the complaint proved; and therefore find that the defendants have incurred the penalty under the Act, which the Justices modify to one-fourth being L.50 sterling, with the recommendation to the Board to farther mitigate to the sum of L 20 sterling.”

The defendants appealed to the Quarter Sessions against this judgment and pleaded that it should be reversed, on the ground that their testimony was competent, and had been erroneously excluded. After hearing parties the Court of Quarter Sessions thought it expedient to state the facts of the case for the opinion and direction of the Court of Exchequer, in virtue of the powers conferred by the Act 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 53, sect. 84; and, on receiving such direction, they would hear and dispose of the appeal.

The case now came on for discussion in the Court of Exchequer. It was

* It is in the following terms:—“And for preventing fraud and evasion of the duty of excise on malt, by the use of raw or unmalted corn or grain in the brewing of beer for sale, be it enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any brewer of beer for sale to have in his brewery, or in any premises belonging or adjacent thereto, whether the same shall be entered by him or not, any raw or unmalted corn or grain whatsoever, either whole or unground, or ground or bruised, except corn or grain not ground or bruised being in premises entered by such brewer for the purpose of making malt; and all raw or unmalted corn or grain which shall be found in such brewery or other premises (except as aforesaid), and also all malted corn or grain whether whole or unground, or ground or bruised, with which such raw or unmalted corn or grain may be mixed, shall be forfeited, and may be seized by any officer of excise, together with all sacks, casks, vessels, or packages in which such raw or unmalted corn or grain may be contained, and the brewer for every such offence shall forfeit the sum of L.200: Provided always that no such penalty or forfeiture shall be incurred in respect of any oats or beans bona fide intended to be used and consumed as food for horses, and oats or beans being in premises of which such brewer shall specially make entry as places for the deposit of horse corn, and which shall be so far distant from his entered brewery premises as not to have any internal communication to or with the same.”

† Decided 19th June 1856.

intimated that the defendants did not intend to appear, and left the case in the hands of the Court. No. 89.

Pleaded for the plaintiff;—The defendants can only be competent witnesses in their own favour, in virtue of the provision in the 3d section of 16 Vict. cap. 20, which allows a party to any action to be a witness therein; but this provision is qualified with the enactment, “that nothing herein contained shall render any person, or the husband or wife of any person, who in any criminal proceeding is charged with the commission of any indictable offence, or any offence punishable on summary conviction, competent or compellable to give evidence.” The present case falls within this qualification, and the evidence of the defendants is incompetent. The defendants were prosecuted under the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 94, sect. 36, which provides, that “for preventing fraud and evasion of the duty of excise on malt by the use of raw or unmalted corn in brewing beer for sale,” brewers are not to keep raw or unmalted corn, unless in premises entered for the purpose; and any such raw grain, and the bags or vessels containing it, may be seized by any officer of excise, &c.; “and the brewer for every such offence shall forfeit the sum of two hundred pounds.” Such language was never used but in reference to criminal proceedings. The matter was clearly out of the category of civil proceedings; for the prosecution might be either at the instance of the Advocate-General, or of a common informer. Feb. 4, 1857.
Watson v.
Simpson and
Others.

The thing complained of is called an “offence.” The object of the statute was “to prevent fraud.” The thing prohibited is declared not “to be lawful.” The offence is punished by a “penalty,” or “forfeiture;” and the mode of prosecution is by “summary conviction,” under the general management and regulation Act, 7 & 8 Geo. IV. cap. 53. It is no doubt merely a malum prohibitum; but still there is in it such criminality as takes it out of the class of civil proceedings. The Justices exercise their jurisdiction as magistrates. The proof to be taken is proof by witnesses, or by confession—that is proof other than by the party; and confession is to be voluntary, and is a different kind of evidence from that got from the party on oath. A reference to oath would be incompetent in such a prosecution, just as the defendant could not competently defer to the oath of the prosecutor. In circumstances similar to the present, the Court have held cases like this to be criminal proceedings.¹ The case can no longer arise in England, as all doubt has been removed by a subsequent statute, with reference to prosecutions at the instance of the Board of Inland Revenue, 18 & 19 Vict. cap. 96, sect. 36.

The Court made avizandum with the case, and afterwards signed and delivered the following opinion:—

“Exchequer Chambers, Edinburgh, 19th June 1856.—We are of opinion that the judgment of the Justices sustaining the objection to the reception of the parties complained of, and refusing to receive them as witnesses, is right. * (Signed) “H. J. ROBERTSON.

* Note.—This case was not reported of the date it bears, because it was thought that the Court of Exchequer Act, which was at that time passing through Parliament, would have settled the question raised. By the 43d section of that Act, 19 & 20 Vict., cap. 56, it is provided, that “the 3d section of the Act of the 16th year of Her present Majesty, cap. 20, shall not be deemed to apply to any cause to be instituted under this Act, relating to the Customs or Inland Revenue.” As prosecutions before Justices are not instituted under the Court of Exchequer Act, it is obvious that the question is not set at rest by that statute; and, therefore, it has been considered expedient to report the above opinion of the Court of Exchequer, though delivered upon an ex parte discussion. Judicial factor—Special powers refused to a factor to carry out an agreement by the beneficiaries under a trust-deed, the terms of the agreement not being strictly in accordance with the directions in the trust-deed.—A trust-deed provided for the investment of capital for an annuity to the truster's sister, the capital, after her death, to be divided amongst certain legatees; and it directed the whole residue to be apportioned at once amongst certain legatees. It contained no power to sell. On the failure of trustees, a factor was appointed. Disputes arose under the settlement, and these were adjusted by a minute of agreement. Application was then made by the factor for special powers to sell various shares of Joint-Stock Companies, and, inter alia, retain L.150 to meet contingencies till the invested capital should be relieved from the liferent—Refused, and observed that the application was partly unnecessary and partly ultra vires of the Court.

THE petitioner was appointed judicial factor on the estate of Mrs Elizabeth Bisset or Miller, in consequence of the only trustee nominated by her having died two days after the truster. The purposes of the trust were, after payment of debts, &c., 1. To invest a sum sufficient to provide an annuity of L.15, to Mrs Fleet, the sister of the truster, stated in the petition to be the heir-at-law and next of kin of the deceased. 2. To deliver certain specific legacies of plate, furniture, &c. 3. For payment to a certain legatee of the sum of L. sterling. 4. To apportion the residue into four shares, and divide it among five persons named in the deed; and, 5. To divide at Mrs Fleet's death the capital sum invested to provide her annuity amongst four persons named in the deed.

The testamentary paper left by the truster had not been prepared in the usual style; and although purporting to be a "trust-disposition and settlement," it contained no proper dispositive clause. It contained (at the close of the testing clause) however, a nomination of an executor, and was deemed sufficient as a paper of bequests. It contained no power to sell.

Disputes arose between Mrs Fleet and the beneficiaries under the testamentary paper as to its validity; and there were likewise disputes amongst the legatees as to its meaning. All these disputes, however, were arranged; and a minute of agreement was now produced, by which all the beneficiaries under the settlement of Mrs Miller homologated her settlement with two unimportant alterations, the one relating to the division of the silver plate, and the other to the division of certain articles of furniture.

The value of the truster's estate was estimated at L.1165, of which about L.830 consisted of shares in three Edinburgh Cemetery Companies, and in the Dundee Water Company. The rest of the estate consisted mainly of about L.250, being the value of the household furniture and silver plate.

The object of the present application was to obtain authority,

1. To make up a title to the Cemetery and Water Company shares. 2. To sell these shares by public roup or private bargain, to convey them, and to receive the proceeds. 3. To empower the factor to invest L.450, to yield an annuity of L.15 a-year to Mrs Fleet. 4. To retain L.150 to meet contingencies, until the capital of L.450 should be relieved from Mrs Fleet's liferent. 5. To empower the factor to implement the special legacies, as altered by the minute of agreement; and, 6. To divide the residue among the residuary legatees.

The Lord Ordinary remitted to Mr Duncan, W.S., who reported that in his opinion there was no absolute necessity for the special authority of the Court being granted to enable the judicial factor to exercise any of the powers for which he prayed. The first power to complete a title to the Cemetery and Water Company's shares, was within the ordinary powers of administration of a judicial factor, and in practice commissaries were accustomed to do so.

tomed to decern judicial factors as executors-dative, on production simply of the Act and warrant of their appointment, without any special power authorising them to confirm as executor being first granted by the Court. "Indeed, the Act of Sederunt of 1730¹ not only authorises, but requires a judicial factor to make up a title 'in his own name as executor-dative,' where this is necessary. At the sametime it is believed that the Court does not yet in practice refuse to authorise specially a factor to confirm as executor, where this is asked."²

The second power to sell the shares, he likewise believed to be within the ordinary powers of administration of a judicial factor.³

With regard to the other special powers prayed for, the reporter had not been able to find any precedent where such powers were granted; and it did not appear to him to be necessary that the factor should obtain special powers for these purposes.

"There is a single circumstance which of itself seems to make it inexpedient for the factor to ask the Court to interpose their authority to the proposed mode of division of the trust-funds;—it is, that the conclusive nature of the minute of agreement in question depends entirely upon the fact, whether Mrs Fleet be, as is stated in the petition, the only next of kin of the deceased. Although the reporter believes that there is no reason to doubt that this is the fact, still the Court have no legal evidence before them that such is the case. It may further be mentioned that two of the parties to the minute of agreement are minors, namely,—Archibald Glen and David Russell Glen, and their curators (if they any have), are not called in the present application. One of the residuary legatees also, Mr David Russell, has declined to subscribe the minute of agreement, although he has granted a letter, giving a quasi consent to the arrangement being carried out."

The Lord Ordinary reported the case.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—The direction of the trust-deed is, that these subjects shall be divided specifically. We are now asked to alter that direction, and appoint these subjects to be sold. There is great difficulty in doing that. This is asking us to authorise the curator to do what the trustee could not have done.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I see no reason for doing this.

LORD IVORY.—We are in a position to refuse this petition, partly as unnecessary and partly as ultra vires of the Court. Parties have arranged their differences by this deed of agreement, and it is in order to enable the factor not to follow out the settlement in its own sense, but according to the terms of the agreement, that these powers now prayed for are necessary. But, in the first place, one of the residuary legatees is not a party to the agreement; and, in the next place, two of the parties to the agreement are minors, and are not in a condition to agree to it. But, even if there was a proper consent by all parties, I do not think that, in a judicial factory for the execution of a trust, we ought to give powers to the factor to carry out the agreement, which is not carrying out the purposes of the trust. If the factor wishes to carry out the agreement, he must take the whole responsibility on himself, so far as it is extrajudicial.

LORD DEAS.—I am also quite satisfied that there is no case for the interference of the Court.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In respect that no case is presented hoc statu for the interference of the Court, Refuse the petition, and decern."

THE CARRON COMPANY, Pursuers.—Mackenzie.
RITCHIE, WATSON, AND COMPANY, Defenders.—Millar.

Process — Jury trial—13 & 14 Vict., cap. 46, sect. 40—Right of pursuer to fix time and place of trial.—Issues were adjusted for a jury trial on 17th January. The defender gave notice on 2d February for the March sittings. The pursuer moved the Lord Ordinary on 3d February to fix a day for trial before himself during session. The defender was willing to waive his right of countermand. Held that the defender's notice did not render the pursuer's motion incompetent; and, there being no sound reason given why the trial should not proceed before the Lord Ordinary, a day was fixed for so proceeding with it.

SEE supra, p. 281.

In this case issues were adjusted on 17th January. Notice of trial had been given on 2d February by the defenders for the March sittings. On 3d February the pursuers enrolled the case, and moved the Lord Ordinary, under section 40 of the Court of Session Act, to appoint a day for the trial before himself before the rising of the Court.

His Lordship now reported the point.

Mackenzie, for the pursuers.—Notice having been given by the defenders, it is open for them to countermand. The pursuers wish to prevent that, being anxious to get on with the case.

Millar, for the defenders.—We do not wish to countermand, and are willing that the time for which we have given notice shall now be fixed so as to prevent any possibility of doubt as to a countermand. But, if that is not agreed to, cause must be shewn why our notice should be disturbed.¹

Mackenzie.—It is not necessary to shew any further cause than that the party is pursuer of the action, and wishes to have it proceeded with.²

After consultation,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—We are very clearly of opinion that the circumstance of the defenders having given notice for the sittings does not make it incompetent for the pursuers to move before the Lord Ordinary, and for him to consider the objection to the trial being fixed for the sittings. We are of opinion that there is no sound reason why the cause should not be proceeded with before the Lord Ordinary, which is the most expeditious way of trying it, and especially when desired by the pursuers, whose interest it is to proceed with it, and who say that there has been a piracy of their rights. Even if witnesses must be brought from England, that is of no consequence, for the trial will not take place for several weeks.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, on the report of Lord Benholme, Ordinary, and having heard the counsel for the parties, Appoint the trial of the issues in the cause to proceed before the said Lord Ordinary at Edinburgh, within the Parliament House, on Tuesday, the twenty-fourth day of February current, at ten o'clock forenoon."

MRS HELEN HERDMAN or Scoon, before her marriage with William Scoon, acquired right by assignation to a bond and disposition in security for L.1500. The assignation was dated 28th December 1849. It was registered 31st January 1850. The destination which it contained of the bond was simply in favour of "Miss Helen Herdman." It contained no exclusion of her husband's jus mariti or right of administration.

In July 1850, Miss Helen Herdman married William Scoon. On 2d October 1850, she and her husband, "for his own right and interest," assigned the bond to the pursuer Smith for behoof of the Western Bank. The assignation was ex facie absolute as for a price paid of L.1500. It was recorded upon 15th March 1851. On 13th March 1851, being two days before the date of registration, Scoon was sequestrated: The pursuer Frier was appointed his trustee. Prior and subsequent to the date of the assignation, the Western Bank had advanced large sums to the bankrupt Scoon, and at the date of the bankruptcy, they alleged that he was indebted to them L.1538, 17s. 8d. They averred, that the assignation was granted in security of all these advances. The trustee, on the other hand, alleged that the assignation was intended to be in security only of advances subsequent to its date. But both parties were agreed that the assignation was not absolute, but only in security of the husband's debt, whatever that might be.

In May 1851, the debtor in the bond having intimated that he wished to pay up the same, the Western Bank and Scoon's trustee concurred in granting the requisite discharge, and they at the same time entered into an agreement by which the amount of the bond was deposited in the Western Bank in their joint names, till their competing claims should be decided.

The Bank then raised the present action of multiplepounding, in which the Bank and the bankrupt's trustee were the sole claimants. The Bank claimed the fund in medio in virtue of their security. The trustee claimed to the extent of the right and interest in the bankrupt jure mariti, being the whole annualrents or interests arising during the marriage. He also objected to many of the vouchers for the Bank, as not falling within the exemption of the Acts 55 Geo. III. cap. 184, and 9 Geo. IV. cap. 49, but these objections did not now form the subject of discussion, which was limited entirely to the preference claimed by the trustee in virtue of his alleged adjudication of the jus mariti. He pleaded;—"I. The right acquired by the bankrupt Scoon, jure mariti, to the annualrent or interest accruing on the said bond and disposition in security, being separable from, and independent of, that pertaining to his wife, quoad the principal sum, was adjudgeable, and has been by force of the sequestration adjudged from Scoon for behoof of his creditors. II. In this view, and in respect that the assignation or conveyance by the bankrupt Scoon, in favour of the Western Bank of Scotland, had not been completed by being duly recorded, or by other valid intimation or registration prior to the sequestration, this bond was, to the extent of the bankrupt's interest as comprehended by his jus mariti, vested in, and has now accrued to the present claimant, as Scoon's trustee, for the creditors under his sequestration. III. The claim of the said Western Bank of Scotland is ill-founded, and cannot be maintained in competition with that of the present claimant, in respect, — (1.) That the drafts, orders, or cheques before referred to in Articles 11 & 12 of the present revised condescendence and claim, are liable to the objections therein stated; and, therefore, in terms of the statutes 55 Geo. III. cap. 184, particularly section 13 thereof; and 9 Geo. IV. cap. 49, particularly section 15 thereof, the sums of money alleged to have been advanced or paid in virtue of these drafts, orders, or cheques, cannot be allowed in account between the said Bank and the bankrupt Scoon, or his creditors, or the present claimant, as representing them; and, (2.) That the said drafts, orders, or cheques are also liable to the objections before stated, in Articles 13 & 14 of this revised condescendence and claim; and, therefore, that the sums represented by such drafts, orders, or cheques, cannot form articles of debit against Scoon in the Bank's accounts in question."

Smith and Buchanan, representing the Western Bank, pleaded;—1. That in respect of the writs condescended on, they were entitled to be preferred on the fund in medio, in terms of their claim. 2. As the assignation in question related to a security which was the property of Mrs Helen Herdman or Scoon, and not that of the bankrupt, and was now duly vested in the claimants in virtue of the assignation, the claimant, Scoon's trustee, had no title to challenge the assignation as regards either the principal sum, or interest thereon.

The Lord Ordinary, on 14th March 1855, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the bankrupt jure mariti had, during the subsistence of the marriage, right to the annualrents or interest due and payable under the bond and disposition in security vested in the person of his wife, and that his right thereto was an adjudgeable subject; and therefore sustains the title and interest of the claimant, trustee on his sequestrated estate, to challenge in this process the validity of the assignation founded on by the Western Bank, and also to dispute the fact of any debt being due by the bankrupt to the Western Bank, in security or for payment of which they obtained and hold said assignation, in so far as said assignation conveys or affects the right to said annualrents belonging jure mariti to the bankrupt; and to this extent repels the second plea in law for the claimants Smith and Buchanan: Finds that the said assignation was sufficiently registered in the Register of Sasine on the 15th day of March 1851, and repels the objections to the formality of the registration: Finds that the assignation, so registered of that date, constituted a valid security to the Western Bank for monies advanced to the bankrupt previous to the date of his sequestration, and which shall be legally vouched or proved in terms of law, notwithstanding the sequestration was awarded on the 13th day of March 1851, previous to the date of the aforesaid registration; and to that extent repels the second plea in law for the claimant, the trustee; and with these findings orders the cause to the result that the third plea in law for the claimant, the trustee, may be disposed of." *

* "NOTE.—Three points raised at the debate before the Lord Ordinary are disposed of by the preceding interlocutor. A fourth point is reserved, not having been fully argued, and which it seems expedient to waive deciding until the findings on the other points shall become final.

"The prejudicial question is, whether the right of the husband jure mariti in the annualrents of the wife's heritable estate during the subsistence of the marriage, is an adjudgeable subject so to be attached by his creditors. In the present case, the wife of the bankrupt was assignee of a bond and disposition in security over certain heritable property acquired by her previous to her marriage, without any excluof the jus mariti of her future husband. Some time after their marriage, the wife, with consent of her husband, and he for himself, and as taking burden upon him for his spouse, and for his own right and interest, executed an ex facie absolute assignation of the bond and disposition in security to the manager and secretary of the Western Bank of Scotland, in trust for the bank ; the consideration for which is stated in the assignation to have been the sum of L.1500 sterling, paid to the cedents, and which was the precise amount of the sum in the bond and disposition itself. The assignation, however, was truly in security of advances made and to be made by the bank. The bankrupt, at the period of sequestration, was indebted to the Western Bank in the full sum for which the assignation bore to be granted. The trustees for the Bank claim the benefit of the security so obtained to meet the balance due, and the fund in medio consists of the principal sum in the bond and disposition in security, which the debtor insisted on paying off, and which, under an arrangement between the parties to this process, was discharged, and the money consigned. The other claimant, the trustee on the sequestrated estate, has disputed the validity of the assignation obtained by the bank ; and while admitting that the creditors under the sequestration can claim no right to the principal sum in the security, as being heritable estate belonging to the wife, the trustee maintains the right of the creditors to claim the life-interest of the bankrupt, during the subsistence of the marriage, in the annual rents of the security, and the interest of the principal sum now paid, contending the same to be an adjudgeable subject, and carried to the trustee by the sequestration. The title of the trustee to appear as a claimant in this process to object to the validity of the assignation to the Bank, or, if unsuccessful in that, to cut down or extinguish the balance due to the Bank, so as to relieve the bankrupt's life-interest in the sum in the bond from the burden of the security held by the Bank, is thus dependent on the determination of the point, whether that life-interest belonged to the bankrupt jure mariti, so as to be adjudgeable by his creditors. The opposing claimants maintain the contrary, which is involved in their second plea in law, but, as humbly appears to the Lord Ordinary, on insufficient grounds. Whatever may be the precise legal character or definition of the right in the husband in the wife's heritable estate, and the rents or produce of it, it appears at least to be settled by adjudged cases, that his interest, while the marriage subsists, in the future rents and profits, is so vested in him as to be attachable by creditors under the diligence of adjudication. It is thought sufficient to refer to the cases of Calder v. Steel, Nov. 19, 1818, and Borthwick v. Macfarlane, July 16, 1844, 6 D. 1290, confirming the earlier case of Menzies v. Gillespie, Dec. 8, 1761, Mor. 5974. Proceeding on these authorities, the Lord Ordinary has had no difficulty in holding that the trustee on the bankrupt's estate has a sufficient title and interest to challenge the validity of the Bank's security, so far as affecting the interest of the sum in the bond assigned.

"The first of the objections to the Bank's assignation is, that it has not been recorded in the Register of Sasines in the formal manner which is said to be required. The usual certificate of registration did not bear the signature of the registering officer or clerk, when the assignation was first produced and founded on by the Bank, subsequent to the sequestration. The registration of the assignation had been made under the Heritable Securities Act, 8 & 9 Victoria, cap. 31, sect. 5, which, after enacting that the writs shall forthwith be shortly registered in the minute-books of the Registers of Sasines in common form, and with all due despatch be fully registered in the Register Books, goes on to direct that they shall thereafter be redelivered to the parties with certificates of due registration thereon, which shall be probative of such registration ; such certificates specifying the date of presentation, and the book and folio in which the engrossment has been made, and being subscribed by the keeper of the Register. This subscription was not attached when the assignation was redelivered ; and upon this omission at the time, although once supplied, the objection is rested. But the section goes on to enact, that the date of entry in the minute-book shall be held to be the date of registration. As the fact of the entry in the minute-book, of date the 15th of March, is not contested, and the assignation was thereafter duly engrossed in the Register, it is conceived was neither heritable nor moveable. It was a right of an anomalous description, and must be dealt with as a right by itself, and not as a pure heritable or moveable right. It was a right which belonged to the husband as a separate estate so long as the marriage endured, but no longer. It was rather of the nature of a limited liferent, but still not of such a nature as re-that the deed was thereby sufficiently registered, and that the certificate, which is to be held probative of the registration, is no part of the act of registration, but merely evidence of it, and may be attached ex intervallo.

“The second of the objections is of a more serious character. The assignation was delivered for registration two days after the sequestration was awarded. The trustee, referring to the 7th section of the Heritable Securities Act, which, reciting the Act 1696 and the two sequestration statutes, enacts, that in all questions under these Acts, the date of the registration of all assignations, &c., granted or taken in pursuance of this Act, shall be held to be the date of such assignations, &c., without prejudice to their validity or invalidity in other respects—contends that the security of the Bank under the assignation is invalid and ineffectual in competition with the adjudication in favour of the trustee under the sequestration. The view taken by the trustee is, that this enactment makes the execution of the assignation identical with the date of its registration, so as to give it a postponed date, bringing it down to a period subsequent to the sequestration. On the other hand, the Bank contend that this section of the Heritable Securities Act neither was intended to make, nor has made, any change on the position of creditors holders of uncompleted securities, not otherwise challengeable, granted before sequestration, though not rendered by the creditor complete until after the bankruptcy. The Lord Ordinary is of that opinion. The object of the Heritable Securities Act was to simplify and render less expensive the transmission of securities, by dispensing with the instrument of sasine and its registration, and substituting the registration of the assignation itself as an equivalent. By the Bankrupt Statutes, 54 Geo. III. cap. 137, sect. 12, and 2d and 3d Vict., cap. 41, sect. 25, it was enacted, that dispositions, heritable bonds, or other heritable rights whereupon infestment may follow, shall be reckoned to be of the date of the registration of the sasine taken thereon in all questions under the Bankrupt Acts, but without prejudice to the validity or invalidity of the said heritable rights in all other respects. But it has been held, under these statutes, that a party holding a security of a prior date, validly granted at the time, but remaining uncompleted till within the sixty days of bankruptcy, or even subsequent to the awarding of sequestration, may, notwithstanding, proceed to complete it by taking and registering infestment, and the security becomes unchallengeable and preferable to the trustee under the adjudication in the sequestration.—Cormack v. Anderson and Others, July 8, 1829, 7 S. 868. The question in the present case appears, therefore, to be brought to this narrow point, whether the Heritable Securities Act has effected an alteration upon the law according to the construction which has been put upon the Bankrupt Acts. It is humbly thought that it has not. The terms of the enactment in section 7 are precisely the same with those in the sections above referred to of the two Bankrupt Statutes, with the difference of applying the enactment to the assignations of securities under the new form, as was necessary for the working of the Act. It was a conveyancing statute, and nothing else. It would be unwarrantable so to construe it as to infer that it contained an incapacitating enactment directed against the holders of securities completing them, from which they have been held not to be prohibited by the Bankrupt Statutes, which are specially referred to in the section itself.

“On these grounds the Lord Ordinary has, on the one hand, sustained the title of the trustee, and, on the other, has overruled the objections taken to the assignation. There remains, however, for future consideration the objection of the trustee to the debt on which the Bank claims, founded on the alleged advances made to the bankrupt being vouched by cheques, which are pleaded to be null under the Stamp Acts.”¹ quired to be feudalised. It was established that this right might be carried by adjudication. It could not be carried by arrestment. The fruits of the wife's estate might be arrested, but the right itself could not be so taken from the husband. It might, however, be voluntarily transferred by him. But if this right could be adjudged, there was a good vested right in the adjudger so long as the fee of the estate remained in the wife. Here the disposition to the Bank by the wife did not altogether divest her of her estate. A radical right still remained in her. The fee was hers. The right to the estate was hers. It was only disposed in security. She could at any time redeem it; and, therefore, her husband's sequestration operated an adjudication for behoof of his creditors of his jus mariti. Now adjudication of the jus mariti at once completed the trustee's title; sasine was unnecessary on an adjudication of jus mariti; the interlocutor awarding the sequestration operated at once as a valid transference; while the title of the Bank (which did require sasine) was not completed till two days after the sequestration, and so could not compete with the trustee's title. No doubt that sasine carried the fee of the wife's estate; but it could give no right to the jus mariti of the husband, which was at that moment vested by the sequestration in the trustee.¹

Frier.

Pleaded for the Western Bank;—Admittedly the jus mariti might be carried by adjudication; but, of course, that could not create a higher right than it attached, and could not confer on the adjudger a right which was not in the husband. Possession of the heritable estate by the wife was indispensable to the jus mariti. The continuance of the marriage was also indispensable to it, and the continuance of the right in the wife to her estate. But the existence of the jus mariti and its application to the rents of the real estate of the wife, gave the husband no right to require that that estate should always remain in her. No doubt, his concurrence in a sale was necessary, but the jus mariti gave him no right to insist that the estate should remain in his wife, and, therefore, the right resulted from a state of things which the husband could not, of his own power, bring about or force a continuance of. It depended on something else, on the interest and will of the wife, and the moment she, in the exercise of an independent right of property and the jus disponendi, did, with the curatorial concurrence of her husband, sell her estate, the husband's right eo ipso came to an end. Therefore, the right which existed in the husband to uplift the rents of his wife's real estate was defeasible by the act of another, and, if so, the adjudger could make no better of it. He could only take and exercise the right subject to that defeasibility, and the adjudger had no control over the wife. He had no claim over her. There was no contract or relation between her and him whatever. She remained as free and uncontrolled as owner of her real estate after adjudication as before. She could sell the estate, and notwithstanding the adjudication of the jus mariti, at any time, and the moment it was sold, it was followed by the necessary legal consequence that the husband's right to the rents came to an end.

A difficulty arose from the combination in the husband of his right to exercise the jus mariti, and also of his rights and duties as curator of his wife. But he would not be allowed to abuse his curatorial right for the purpose of keeping up and maintaining his right to the rents of his wife's estate, if it were for the interest of the wife that he should not do so. If so, how could adjudication impose on the husband any obligation inconsistent with his curatorial office? The bankruptcy of the husband and the confirmation of the trustee could not interfere with the jus disponendi of the wife, and all its legitimate consequences; and, therefore, if she should sell the estate with the consent of the husband, as her legal guardian, the infestment of the purchaser would oust the husband, the trustee, and every other person having interest. Applying this principle to the present case—the wife had already, with consent of her husband, conveyed away her estate—there was nothing, therefore, in the bankrupt at the date of the sequestration that could be carried, and therefore nothing that could avail the trustee.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The fund in medio in this competition is a sum of L.1500 contained in an heritable bond and disposition in security, to which Mrs Scoon is stated to have acquired right prior to her marriage. It is not stated that there was a marriage-contract which could in any way affect her right on the occasion of her marriage. This bond was afterwards conveyed by her and her husband to the Western Bank. The conveyance, although absolute, was truly intended as a conveyance in security for money advanced and to be advanced by the Bank, and the Bank now say that a large balance is due to them. That is a question for future accounting between the parties.

On 15th March 1851, two days before the conveyance to the Bank was recorded, Scoon, the lady's husband, was sequestrated, and the trustee on his estate claims the interest on the bond, in respect of his jus mariti. The trustee contends, that as sequestration had been awarded on 13th March, and the assignation had not been completed or published till 15th March, the assignation could not have the effect of establishing a preferable right to his own right as trustee in the sequestration. In the meantime, it appears that the debtor in the bond has paid up the principal sum. By arrangement the amount has been consigned, and that sum, with interest, forms the fund in medio in this competition. The trustee does not claim any part of the principal sum. He limits his claim to the interest that has accrued and that may accrue on that principal sum during the marriage. The Western Bank contend, that the trustee has no such right as he claims; that the interest belongs to them, and that the debt due to them exhausts the whole bond. This last is matter for subsequent inquiry. The competition, therefore, is truly in reference to the interest on the L.1500 that has accrued or may accrue during the bankrupt's marriage.

It appears to me, in the first place—and that is not the subject-matter of any question—that the principal sum in this bond and disposition in security was an heritable subject which belonged to the wife herself, and which of course was liable for her proper debts and obligations as at the date of her marriage. In the second place, it is not disputed that the interest of that sum accruing to the wife did fall under the jus mariti. The jus mariti, though it gives the husband a right only to the personal estate of the wife, is a species of right or interest over that estate which is attachable by adjudication. It is a peculiar kind of right. It is sometimes called a right of administration. But it is perhaps more substantial than a mere right of administration. It is a current right—I may so call it—during the subsistence of the marriage, and it applies to that which becomes or has already become the moveable property of the wife. It may be abridged or extended, according as the funds accrue during the subsistence of the marriage, and in proportion as the value of the subjects falling under it may vary during that period. But it attaches only to that which accrues to the wife in the form of moveable estate; and although the right of the husband is a right which in itself may be adjudged, yet its value—the things which fall under it either before or after being so attached—may be affected by circumstances. I have said that the right continues only during the subsistence of the marriage, and that it continues only in reference to the subjects which have accrued to the wife as moveable estate. After the dissolution of the marriage it is extinguished, but during the subsistence of the marriage it may also be extinguished, as regards the fruits or profits of the wife's heritable estate, by such heritable estate ceasing to belong to the wife. In such an event, there is no longer any interest or rent that accrues to the wife, and therefore there is nothing that falls under the jus mariti.

There is no contention here, on the part of the Western Bank, that sequestration has not carried the jus mariti of the husband, whatever it is. I do not think there is any competition here as to that which confessedly falls under the jus mariti. The question here, as it appears to me, is whether, in the circumstances, the interest of this heritable bond does or does not fall under the jus mariti.

Upon that question, the view that presents itself to me is that the bond, being the estate of the wife, was validly conveyed by that assignation, and that although infestment, or its equivalent, registration, was not effected till two days after the sequestration of the husband, still that the conveyance of the estate by the wife, with the concurrence of her husband, was a good conveyance, and that the proceedings being otherwise unobjectionable, that right has now been completed by the Bank. Now, in that view, I do not think that the interest of the bond belonged to the wife. The fruits and profits accrued to the assignee in the bond, and therefore did not fall under the jus mariti. It may be that at some future time they may again fall under it, if there is a reconveyance by the Bank, or extinction of the debt in respect of which this bond was originally conveyed. But in the meantime the question is whether, standing that assignation, the interest that has accrued after the date of infestment accrues to the wife, or to the party who is in right of the bond? It appears to me that the interest accrues to the assignee, and not to the wife, and therefore does not fall under the jus mariti; that, until an accounting with the Bank, the fruits and profits, so far as they have accrued and may yet accrue, belong to the Bank, and not to the wife. It must be so held at present, and therefore, in that short view of the matter, I think that the Lord Ordinary has done right in preferring the claim of the Bank to that of the trustee. It is not necessary, to go through all the grounds of his Lordship's judgment, nor the various views of the law on which he rests it, which are not precisely what I have now stated as those that press more strongly on my mind; nor is it necessary to analyse the cases. The case that has been most discussed is that of Borthwick, which appears to me not to touch this case. There is a great deal of discussion in the opinions in that case that tends to a principle that may affect this case; and I confess that the principles that are stated by some of the Judges in the minority appear to me to be sound as to the operation of the jus mariti. But these discussions were not necessary to the decision, for the whole question related to the valuation of the right under the Bankrupt Act. Looking to the discussion that took place on the bench, I think that even those of the Judges in favour of the judgment—some of them at least—did not say anything hostile to the principle which I think should regulate this case, and therefore I propose to sustain the preference of the Bank here, being of opinion that substantially the Lord Ordinary has arrived at a right conclusion in the competition as to the bond.

LORD IVORY.—I am of the same opinion, and though it may not be necessary to concur in all the grounds of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, yet substantially his result is perfectly correct. There is no competition here between two transmissions of the jus mariti. The competition arises, and it is necessary to keep that in view, between the transmission of the jus mariti competing with a conveyance of the wife's estate. The trustee, by force of the adjudication in the sequestration, says he has carried the jus mariti. The Bank say that they have a right ex facie absolute to the real estate of the bankrupt's wife under their assignation and sasine. I shall in the first place deal with it as an ex facie absolute conveyance to the real estate of the bankrupt's wife.

I have no doubt at all as to the right of the trustee to the jus mariti. Nor have I any doubt that the jus mariti is an adjudgeable interest. Originally there has been a question as to the principle of that, for it is an interest of so peculiar a character, attaching to the moveable estate as it arises in the person of the wife, that Lord Stair, in his Commentaries, p. 61, has some remarks as to whether adjudication of it should be considered a proper diligence; but in practice and in the books that is a settled question, and it cannot be doubted now, therefore, that the trustee has carried the jus mariti. This, however, goes a small way to solve the real question between the parties. It follows that the right of the trustee, such as it is, was legally completed to the jus mariti by adjudication as a jus incorporale. It follows, farther, that no subsequent acquisition of right to the jus mariti or such could compete with him. In so far, therefore, as there are termini habiles to the operation of the jus mariti, the right of the trustee would have been available; for example, if the estate had remained in the wife. It would also be available, if the estate, once conveyed, were to return to the wife: for example, if the Bank's right were found to be bad, or if the debt were extinguished aliunde: and the conveyance by the wife of the bond, which was a satisfactory security for the debt would be superseded, the title would be changed, the estate would again return to her, the rents would be hers, and fall under the jus mariti, and the legal title to the jus mariti being in the trustee, he would supplant the husband in regard to the rents of the estate. But in all such cases the question still remains,—How is it that the jus mariti operates, and what is the nature and character of the right as regards any particular term's rents? The jus mariti is a legal assignation of the wife's moveable estate. It does not touch directly or indirectly her real estate. In reaching the rents of the real estate, it is only as they fall into and become part of the wife's moveable estate that the jus mariti attaches them; and thus it is necessary towards vesting of any actual right of property, that the rents, as the wife's rents, have first fallen due. So far as regards future rents, the right of the husband carries nothing but the right to levy them should they ever come into the condition of rents belonging to the wife.

Such being the case as to the jus mariti, I observe, next, the nature of the Bank's right. It is not a competing right over the jus mariti. If it were, it might raise a question,—which of the two rights, the trustee's or the Bank's, had been first completed? and in such a question, if the right of the Bank had depended on their infestment, the trustee must have been preferred, his right having been completed as at the date of the sequestration, by the mere force of his adjudication as trustee. It required no infestment. It was of itself a legal assignation of the right. But the right of the Bank does not arise in this way, but as purchasers of the estate belonging to the wife; and here there is no such question as in the case of Cormack, which regarded sasine in the bankrupt's estate. The Bank here acquired the estate by disposition and assignation from the wife, ex facie absolute. Perhaps the terms of the right may in some points of view be material to be attended to. But it was necessary that it should be more or less in the character of an absolute right, because, in a transaction with the wife, if it had been in the shape of a personal obligation or security, it would be null, that being a form of obligation which she is not entitled to grant. But if the husband's right of administration and the jus mariti had both been excluded, the wife's conveyance might have been good, without the actual consent of the husband. But if this were not so, the husband's curatorial concurrence became necessary; but why? not as an act of conveyance by himself but as completing and validating the act of conveyance by the wife of the estate belonging exclusively to her, and not to him. It was a curatorial act, and nothing more. The conveyance to the Bank, therefore, was essentially a conveyance of the wife's estate, and, as such, it was good and perfectly complete, as a personal conveyance, from the moment of its execution. Nothing farther was required or possible on the part of the husband. Nothing was competent to him against it. So long as by the infestment of the disponent the estate was not taken out of the wife there might be situations in which questions with third parties might in certain views arise as to the jus mariti. But to exclude these, not even infestment was necessary. If the Bank had entered to possession, or had intimated their right to the debtor's tenants at or before sasine, at least assignation to mails and duties,—in other words, if they had done anything that took the rents out of the person of the wife, that would have been sufficient to exclude, with all and sundry, the operation of the jus mariti. Their right was completed by sasine: It is objected that this was two days after the husband's sequestration. But that was of no consequence in the present question. The wife was thereby divested of her estate by sasine in favour of the Bank, and consequently of all right to its rents. So, the jus mariti had thenceforth nothing to which it could attach, and therefore, although the trustee's right under his adjudication still remained to all other effects, and as regards all the other estates which continued to be in the wife, was, as regarded the subject here in competition, for the time excluded from practical operation. Should circumstances vary so as to reinstate the wife, the state of things may vary in a corresponding manner. But until the Bank be paid such must continue to be the result. There are various illustrations which might be given. The case is the same as if the wife, having been indebted in her own right, her estate, whether before or after the husband's sequestration, had been adjudged by her creditor. The trustee's adjudication of the jus mariti would be complete, as it now is. But he could not by force of that right have stood in the way of the wife's proper creditor carrying off her estate by adjudication,—a once carried off, there would have remained nothing to which the jus mariti carried by the trustee had the possibility of attaching. No. 92.

All this, it is said, rests on the absolute divestiture of the wife, and a distinction was attempted to be made in this case from the right conveyed, although ex facie absolute, not being in substance an absolute divestiture of the wife, but in reality a security, being so qualified by the nature of the transaction. But it seems to me very little to the purpose whether you consider the wife's interest in the one case or the other. The conveyance was absolute to the extent of paying the Bank's debt, and the Bank could not have been ousted till that debt was paid. But though a mere security, it would still, if complete, have operated as a complete conveyance of the rents of the estate to the Bank, the right to which is the matter now in question. That it is a reversionary right may be of importance even in a question between these parties, for if it can be shewn that there is no debt to the Bank, or if there be a balance over, then such reversionary right will be available. But in no other way can it operate. I entirely concur in the judgment proposed by your Lordship.

Smith v.
Frier.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I concur in the findings in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor as to the sufficiency of the registration of the assignation, and as to the validity of the security to the Western Bank for such monies as shall be legally vouched or proved to have been advanced by it to the bankrupt prior to the date of the sequestration. But I think that the objection to the competing claim of the trustee on the sequestrated estate goes deeper than is contemplated in the note to the interlocutor.

There is no doubt that the jus mariti of a husband may be attached by adjudication, and that a sequestration of his estate operates as such an adjudication. But to what does the trustee acquire right in virtue of such an adjudication? He acquires right to those moveable funds which either belong to the wife at the date of the sequestration, or which shall afterwards belong to her, during the subsistence of the marriage, and the currency of the sequestration. But, on the other hand, he does not thereby acquire right to any funds which have never belonged to the wife herself at the date of the sequestration. The jus mariti, as it is equivalent to a general assignation from a wife to her husband of all her moveable funds, can transmit to the latter nothing but what first of all belongs to herself. Nothing, which does not belong to the wife, can thus be transmitted by or from her to her husband. And hence, although when the wife is the absolute owner of an heritable subject, her right to each instalment of its accruing annual produce, whether it consists of rents or of interests, is from the legal term when it becomes due to her, a moveable fund belonging to her, and instantly passes from her to the husband jure mariti; yet from the time, when the heritable subject itself ceases to belong to her, the annual produce of it never thenceforth becomes hers, and, consequently, is never transmitted by or from her to her husband jure mariti. In this case there is wanting an essential condition, which is necessary to bring the right to such annual produce under the operation of the jus mariti, or any adjudication thereof.

The question here in dispute is, whether the interest falling due subsequent to 13th March 1851, the date of Mr Scoon's sequestration, on an heritable bond to which Mrs Scoon had acquired right on 28th December 1849, fell under the operation of the bankrupt's jus mariti, and of the adjudication thereof implied in the sequestration of his estate? The answer is, that this could not be the case, because prior to that date, viz. on 2d October 1850, she, with the requisite concurrence of her husband, had divested herself of the bond itself to the Western Bank of Scotland. That bond not having been hers at, or after, the date of the sequestration, the annual interest which became due thereon subsequent to that date never was hers, and never could pass from or through her to her husband jure mariti, or from or through him to the trustee upon his estate.

It is true that that conveyance, although in the form of an absolute disposition, was in effect only a right in security, and that Mrs Scoon still retained a reversionary right to the bond. And if, in virtue of that reversionary right, any of the yearly instalments of the interest shall be shewn, in the accounting, to have become hers by the collection of the debt, in security of which the conveyance to the Bank was granted, such instalments may have fallen under the jus mariti, and the husband's sequestration would, under the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, it remains open to the trustee to shew that such is truly the state of the case. But, if there be no such reversion, and the whole amount of the bond be required to pay the debt owing to the Bank, then, of course, none of the future interest upon that bond, or of the money which was thereby secured, can ever belong to Mrs Scoon in virtue of her reversionary right, or be transmitted from or through her to her husband, or to the trustee on his estate.

The trustee deals with the question as if it were only whether Mr Scoon had, before his bankruptcy, conveyed away an existing right in the future income of his wife's heritage; whereas the first question is, whether Mrs Scoon had not previously, with her husband's authority, divested herself of the right to that heritage, and thereby precluded the future income thereof from becoming hers? I think that this is the true state of this case: that the deed in question was a conveyance by Mrs Scoon of her own property, to which her husband merely interposed his curatorial authority: and that for this reason, as well as for the separate reason stated in the note to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, the enactment in the Heritable Securities Act is inapplicable to this case.

This view of the case is quite consistent with the authorities founded upon by the trustee. In the case of Menzies v. Gillespie, 8th December 1761, the wife had not divested herself of her heritable property, and, consequently, the annual income arising therefrom fell under the jus mariti of her husband, and was attachable by the diligence of his creditors. In like manner, in the case of Calder v. Steel, 19th November 1818, the wife remained vested with her heritable estate, and there was no doubt that the yearly produce of the estate fell under her husband's jus mariti, and the only question was, whether one of his creditors who had adjudged the estate, or another of them who had by arrestment attached a certain term's rent thereof, had the preferable right to that rent; and the Court found that, owing to defects in the adjudication, the arrestment was preferable.

In the case of Borthwick, 16th July 1844, the question was merely whether or not, in a ranking upon the sequestrated estate of the husband, a creditor who held a security over the wife's estate was bound to value and deduct the value of that security in so far as it might include the husband's jus mariti. But it appears from the report of that case that, according to the true construction of the peculiar terms of the deed of conveyance by which the security was granted, it imported, in the opinion of a majority of the Judges, a conveyance of that jus mariti as being part of the husband's estate; and that this being the case, it was indispensable, in conformity with the express requirements of the Bankrupt Statute, that the creditor who had taken such a security should in his oath value that security. It does not follow that the security was truly worth anything, or that the statute would not have been satisfied if the creditor in his oath had deposed that the security was worth only a nominal sum, or even nothing at all. But such having been the nature of the security, according to what was held to be the true construction thereof, the creditor could not be allowed to rank on the general estate without so satisfying the requirement of the Bankrupt Statute. In the present case, no such question occurs. In the assignation granted to the Bank, the bankrupt, although he granted his concurrence in the usual terms as his wife's administrator, never mentioned his jus mariti, nor made any such reference to it as in Borthwick's case was construed into a conveyance of it. On the contrary, the general words in which he expressed his concurrence in his wife's deed, viz. "I, the said William Scoon, for myself, and as taking burden upon me for my said spouse, and for my own right and interest," did not admit of that construction, according to the principle of the other case of Calder v. Steel above mentioned; for, in that case, an adjudication led against a husband of his wife's estate, "with all right, title, and interest he has or can claim thereto," was held not to admit of being construed as an adjudication of the jus mariti, in respect it was of a right of quite a different kind from the right of property.

I therefore think that in no view of the case has the trustee right to the interests in dispute.

LORD DEAS.—This is a question of great subtlety. The facts are these:—Mrs Scoon, before her marriage to the bankrupt, had obtained an assignation to an heritable security for L.1500, duly feudalised in the persons of her cedents, which placed her precisely in the same situation as if she had been the original lender. The security constituted, of course, in her person, an heritable estate, subject to the same rules, as respects the form of title, mode of divestiture and attachment, and likewise as regards the beneficial interests of herself and her heirs, and of any husband she might marry, as any landed estate belonging to her absolutely would have been. It was, in truth, the money which became heritable; the effect of the security being to give it that heritable character. The termly interests, payable by the debtor, were carried to the husband by the legal and completed assignation implied in the marriage (in the absence of any exclusion by marriage-contract or otherwise), precisely in the same way, and to the same effect, as the rents would have been of lands or houses of which she was absolute proprietrix. Had the L.1500 been uplifted pending the marriage, it would have fallen to be reinvested for behoof of the wife, subject to the husband's right as formerly while not renounced by him; and, while it remained uninvested, the sum would have formed a surrogatum for the heritable security, unless given over to the husband, or mingled with his funds, or otherwise dealt with in such a manner as to shew the wife's intention to convert it from heritable to moveable; and, while retained for reinvestment as a surrogatum, the fee would have been in the wife, and the interest would have gone to the husband precisely as before. All this, which is matter of trite law, is not immaterial to be kept in view in dealing with the question we have now to decide.

No. 92.

Smith v.
Frier.

So standing the rights of parties, the wife with consent of the husband, and the husband as taking burden for the wife, and "for his own right and interest," granted an assignation of the L.1500 security in favour of the Western Bank. This assignation is absolute, upon the face of it, as for a price paid of L.1500. But in article 4 of the condescendence for the Bank, it is expressly stated that the assignation "was granted by Mrs Scoon in payment and security of advances made and to be made to her husband." The trustee under the husband's sequestration (which had been awarded between the date of granting and the date of registering the assignation to the Bank), denies this statement. But, in article 8 of his own condescendence, he states, "The foresaid assignation in favour of the Bank, though ex facie absolute, was, in reality, granted by the bankrupt, Scoon, to the Bank, in security of advances to be made to him after its date;" and he quotes a letter from the Bank agent to this effect. The parties thus differ as to whether the assignation was a security for past and future advances to the husband, or for future advances only;—a point on which they rather seem to me to take sides opposite to their own interests, if there were room for any question as to whether this was a novum debitum. But they are both agreed that the assignation was not absolute for a price paid, as its terms would import, but a security merely for the husband's debt, the amount of which requires to be aliunde instructed, precisely as if there had been a formal back bond to that effect.

The consequence of this is, that the reversionary right to the heritable estate (which consists here of an heritable security) remains in the wife, and will be less or more valuable to her, according to the greater or smaller amount which may be found legally due by the husband to the Bank. If there be no such debt, the whole will come back to her; and, if the debt be short of L.1500, her reversionary right will be of the value of the difference. If she, or anybody on her behalf, shall pay the debt, or if the husband's estate should prove sufficient to pay it, her right will remain entire, precisely as it stood before she granted the assignation, and subject to the jus mariti of her husband as before. The case which occurs is, in this respect, not the same as the case of an absolute sale and divestiture by the wife, with the husband's consent, of her heritable estate; although I am not prepared to say that, even in that case, the jus mariti could be said to be extinguished, so long as the price fell to be dealt with as a surrogatum for the debt, in which the husband and wife had each precisely the same rights and interests as before.

Nor, for the same reason, do I think that the fact of the debtor having consigned the L.1500, with a view to paying off the security, makes any substantial difference upon the rights of parties. The sum consigned is just a surrogatum, in which the husband and wife are, respectively, interested, precisely as they were in the heritable security. It depends entirely upon there being a debt due to the Bank, and on the amount of that debt, whether, and to what extent, the wife's right of fee in the surrogatum shall be of value to her, and whether, and to what extent, the jus mariti shall be of value to the husband, if he comes to be in a situation to pay off his debt.

Smith v.
Frier.

But supposing it were ascertained—which it has not yet been—that the reversionary right of the wife will be of no value whatever, because the debt of the husband to the Bank exceeds the value of the L.1500 security,—I am not prepared to say that even this would solve the present question favourably for the Bank. Much ingenuity has frequently been shown in attempting to describe what the jus mariti is, and then drawing conclusions from self-made definitions. But it is only necessary to look into any one of our institutional writers, to see how entirely at a loss they all were to define, or even to describe, this somewhat anomalous right, otherwise than by saying that it is of the nature of one thing—such as a right of administration,—and yet that is more of the nature of another thing—such as a right of property. So far as it is a right of administration, it is obviously not a right to administer for the proper behoof of the wife, as is shown by the case of Robb (M. 9500), in which the wife was found not entitled, as in a question with the husband's creditors, to an aliment out of the rents of her own heritable estate. So far as it is a right of property, this, of course, is favourable to the supposition that it may be dealt with, to certain effects at least, as a separate estate belonging to the husband; and, accordingly, it has been held,—and it was admitted in the argument to have been rightly held,—that it is adjudgeable by the husband's creditors. Mr Bell doubted the principle of such adjudication when he wrote his Commentaries (i. 61.) But, when he came to write his Principles (vide, sec. 1561), he laid it down, unqualifiedly, that the right is adjudgeable. The fact that the right is adjudgeable, seems to me more important and safer to proceed upon than any attempted definition, which may be calculated to mislead by being imperfect, of a right so entirely sui generis as the jus mariti. The consequence of its being adjudgeable is, I think, that the right, so far as applicable to the annual proceeds of the heritable security then vested in the wife, has been carried to the trustee by his general adjudication implied in the sequestration, unless it can be shown to have been previously extinguished, or a completed title to it to have been conferred on the Bank. Now, at the date of the sequestration, I find, no divestiture of the wife by which the jus mariti, as applicable to the particular heritable estate in dispute, can be said to have been extinguished, and no completed title to it in favour of the Bank, by which it can be said to have been transferred to them. That the right of the husband and of the wife were, so far, of the nature of separate estates as to require a conveyance by both, and to admit of having been separately conveyed seems to me to be settled by the fact that the husband's right might have been adjudged while the wife's right remained precisely as before. Accordingly, if the husband had merely concurred in the assignation to the Bank, as administrator-in-law, or curator, for his wife, without conveying any right of his own, his right to the interest or annual proceeds would not have passed; and, on the other hand, if the assignation had been of his own rights only, such assignation, supposing it to have been completed in an appropriate manner, would, of course, have carried nothing but his own rights, and would have left his wife's right of fee entire. But it is not pretended that, prior to the sequestration, the right and title of the Bank had been completed in any way. The Bank had not registered the assignation (now equivalent to infeftment), so as to divest the wife, and raise the plea, whatever might have been its force, that the jus mariti, as respected this particular estate, had been extinguished. Nor had they done anything to complete the assignation, as an assignation to them of the jus mariti as a subsisting right. If they are founding upon it to this last effect,—just as they might have done had nothing been conveyed to them by the wife at all,—I am of opinion that no act necessary to complete the assignation of the jus mariti could be effectually done after the sequestration, because, by that time, the trustee had a completed right and title in virtue of his adjudication. And, if they are founding upon their assignation as extinguishing the jus mariti, quoad this estate, because the estate of the wife was thereby conveyed to them, I am equally of opinion that the act of registration coming in place of infeftment, could just as little have this effect, for precisely the same reason, viz., that the right and title of the trustee, in virtue of his adjudication, were, before this time, complete.

If the Lord Ordinary means, in the concluding part of his note, to state the doctrine that rights, generally, although requiring no feudal investiture, may be availably completed, after sequestration, as rights which do require such investiture

Smith v.
Frier.

I cannot concur in that doctrine, because I do not hold the rule to be applicable to cases where the trustee's adjudication, as in the case of the jus mariti, completes both his right and title; but only to cases in which some farther step requires to be taken by him for this purpose, as where the question comes to be whether he or the competing party has obtained the first recorded infestment.

Here the trustee's right and title were complete by the adjudication implied in the very act of awarding sequestration; and, unless it can be held that, even after that adjudication, a conveyance, such as was granted here, would render the adjudication worthless, by extinguishing the jus mariti applicable to the estate in dispute, I do not see how it can, consistently, be held that the jus mariti has been extinguished here. Lord Fullerton, who alone dissented from the judgment in the case of Borthwick (6 D. 1290), did not hold this. His Lordship said,—“It has been held that the right of the husband may be adjudged and assigned. It may follow from this, that if the wife had remained proprietor of the estate, subject to no incumbrance, the husband's right would have been adjudged to the trustee in the sequestration, and that then the husband would not have been entitled, after that, by any act of his, to impair the right of the trustee. But it does not follow, from the circumstance of the right being adjudgeable, that, where the right of the wife has been alienated before the husband's bankruptcy, the husband's right remains part of his estate.” Lord Fullerton was addressing himself to a case in which infestment had passed and been recorded prior to the sequestration, upon a conveyance by the husband and wife, and where, consequently, before the sequestration, the wife's right, as he expressed it, had been “changed.” I see nothing to shew that he would have taken the same view had there been no such infestment before sequestration, in which case the wife's right would not have been changed till after the date of the trustee's adjudication. His opinion, clearly enough, indicates, at all events, that, if both conveyance and infestment had been after sequestration, he would not have so held. Now, if a conveyance by the husband and wife, after the sequestration, would not have had the effect here contended for by the Bank, I do not see how registration (equivalent to infestment) of the wife's conveyance can have that effect. True it perfects the conveyance of the fee, just as it would have done although the date of the wife's conveyance, as well as its registration, had been subsequent to the sequestration. But it does not follow that, either in the one case or the other, what is done after sequestration can cut down the completed adjudication of the trustee which carried the husband's right to the rents of this particular estate. In dissenting from the judgment in that case, it humbly appears to me that Lord Fullerton did not give sufficient weight to the fact, distinctly pointed out by Lord Jeffrey, that the wife was not there divested of her estate, as in a case of sale—the deed being a mere bond and disposition in security; and the judgment pronounced I cannot but regard as having a most important bearing on the present case,—a bearing which, as regards the opinions delivered, even Lord Fullerton's grounds of dissent, were they well-founded, would not go materially to diminish.

I am not at all moved by observations made, as to the nature of the jus mariti, in such cases as those of Stevenson (1 D. 181), and the Duchess of Buckingham (3 D. 1129), where there were conflicting interests between the husband and wife. The present case arises upon a joint deed of the spouses, where there are no conflicting interests, and where, in so far as the wife is concerned, her interest rather to increase the sequestrated estate of her husband, against which she, probably, has no claim of relief.

Upon the whole, therefore, I am for recalling that part of the interlocutor which is in favour of the Bank, and sustaining, in such qualified terms as may be deemed appropriate, the claim of the trustee.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, in so far as it sustains the title and interest of the trustee on Scoon's estate; and refuse the reclaiming note for the claimants Smith and Buchanan, for the Western Bank: Quoad ultra recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary submitted to review: Find that the heritable bond referred to, which belonged to the wife of the bankrupt, William Scoon, was conveyed by her to the Western Bank by assignation ex facie absolute, and bearing to be for an onerous consideration, of date 2d October 1850, to which assignation her husband was a consenting party, as curator of his wife, and for his own right and interest in the premises, and which conveyance was of the same date duly ratified by her, and was on the 15th of March thereafter recorded in the Register of Sasines: Find that, on the 13th of the said month of March, the said William Scoon was sequestrated, and that the right and interest belonging to him in the estates of his wife, by virtue of his jus mariti, were carried to the trustee on his estate by the adjudication obtained in the sequestration: Find that the sum which forms the subject of the present competition between the Western Bank and the trustee on Scoon's estate, consists of interest on the said heritable bond accruing after Martinmas 1850: Find that the said interests accrued to the Western Bank as the holders by assignation of the said heritable bond, and not to Mrs Scoon, their cedent; and consequently did not fall under the jus mariti of her husband, which could not extend to anything that was not personal property belonging or accruing to the wife, and forming part of her personal estate: Therefore, and to that extent, and subject to the qualification after-mentioned, repel the second plea in law for the claimant Frier, trustee on Scoon's estate; but in respect it is admitted that the assignation to the Western Bank, though ex facie absolute, was truly intended for payment and security for advances made, and to be made, by the Bank to Scoon the bankrupt; and in respect the amount of these advances is disputed, and the extent to which the claim of the Bank should be sustained, as regards either the principal sum in the bond or the interest thereof cannot be known till the extent of the debts due to the Bank is ascertained: Remit to the said Lord Ordinary to proceed further in the cause as shall be just, reserving all questions of expenses; and granting power to the Lord Ordinary to dispose thereof."

THIS case was reported by the Lord Ordinary on the adjustment of issues. The late Adam Cook was a miner, and having been killed when engaged removing one of the stoops of a level, and he had put up the work which had been supplied to him by the defender for the purpose of supporting the roof as the work proceeded, upwards of fifteen feet square of the roof fell upon him and killed him. Art. 11 of the pursuers' condescension was as follows:—"The said occurrence, by which the life of the said Adam Cook was lost, took place by and through the fault or culpable negligence of the defender, or of those in his employment, for whom he is responsible, consequence of the materials supplied by the defender, for supporting the part of the roof of the said pit in which the deceased wrought, being altogether insufficient and unsuited for that purpose, and also in consequence of the defender not having daily examined the said pit, and stoops or c pillars, before the miners commenced their operations, and in not having taken the proper precautions before the deceased began to work at the stoops in question, by instructing him either to pass it altogether, or warning him of the 'hitch' at the top of it, or of the danger attending its removal." The following issue was adjusted:—"It being admitted that the defender is proprietor or lessee of the pit situated at Wishaw, called or known by the name of the Meadowhead Pit: It being also admitted that the pursuer, Mrs Elizabeth Megget or Cook, is the widow of the said Adam Cook, and that the other pursuers are the lawful children of the said Adam Cook and Mrs Elizabeth Megget or Cook:—Whether, on or about the 9th day of May 1855, the said Adam Cook, while engaged in the service and employment of the defender in removing stoops in the said pit, was killed by a portion of the roof of the said pit falling upon him, through the fault of the defender, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers? Damages to the widow laid at L.300. To each of the other pursuers, L.150."

Process—Relevancy—Action of damages—Liability of a master for injury to a workman caused by another workman.—An action of damages by a labourer against his employer for injury received by the falling of a scaffolding, was laid on the allegation that the scaffolding was insufficient, and that the insufficiency had been pointed out to the defender's manager, who neglected to remedy it. The defence was, that the accident was caused by the fault of a fellow-workman, for which the master was not responsible;—Held (affirming judgment of Lord Ardmillan), that the action was relevant.

THE pursuer's averments in this case were to the following effect:—The pursuer, Lynch, was a labourer, and had been for sometime prior to 6th August 1855, in the employment of the defender Haggart, who was a master builder in Dundee. Upon that day he had been employed on a hanging scaffolding at the front of a new house, 35 feet high, the scaffolding being composed of one plank about a foot broad, and four inches in thickness. It was supported by three ropes attached, one at each end, and one in the middle. The pursuer, in his condescendence, explained how these ropes were fastened, and how the scaffolding was raised and lowered. He stated that there were two guy ropes attached to it, one at each end of the scaffold plank, intended to steady the scaffolding and bring it close to the wall, and as an additional security in case of accident to the supporting ropes. He detailed the mode of fastening these ropes. He then averred, that there was only one ground plank seven inches broad, and about two inches thick, in place of two, as ought to have been the case. The stones placed upon it were quite insufficient to sustain the weight of the scaffolding with the men working on it, and the ropes used, at least the guy ropes, were rotten. The scaffolding was further defective, in respect it wanted an outward railing,—that is, a rope breast high, passing along and attached to each of the supporting ropes, and which railing was supplied immediately after the accident labelled on took place. These deficiencies were pointed out to David Matthew, the defender's manager, upon Saturday the 4th of August last, when the ropes were fastened to the ground plank, after the men had ceased working for the day, but he culpably and recklessly failed to take any steps to remedy the same. Previous to that day, the ropes supporting the scaffold were carried into the lower flat of the building by the windows, and securely fastened to the joists built in for supporting the floor. "On the morning of the day already mentioned, being Monday the 6th day of August 1855,

In addition to the weight of the three men, there were only two pails of water on the scaffold. Shortly after commencing work, the ground plank suddenly started up, the stones fell off, and it ascended to the first cornice, the guy ropes, being rotten, gave way, and the scaffold plank descended with great rapidity, till it had reached the first cornice, where it stuck. The descending scaffold plank was passed by the ascending ground plank, the latter of which struck the pursuer on the back of the head, knocked him off the scaffold against the wall, from which he rebounded and fell to the ground, sustaining thereby severe bodily injuries, both external and internal. David Matthew, who was on the scaffold with the pursuer, was killed on the spot. The falling of the scaffolding, and the consequent injuries received by the pursuer, took place in consequence of the fault and dereliction of duty on the part of the defender, or those for whom he is responsible.

Wemyss v.
Australian Co.
of Edinburgh.

Upon these averments the pursuer concluded against his employer Haggart for damages for the injuries he had sustained.

The defender pleaded;—That the pursuer's allegations were irrelevant; that the only fault or negligence alleged was that of fellow-servants of the pursuer, engaged in a common employment with him, for whose negligence the defender was not responsible, and therefore for which he could not be liable in damages.

The Lord Ordinary, on 14th January 1857, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has stated relevant matter on record to entitle him to go to issue with the defender; and appoints parties' procurators to attend a first meeting, for the adjustment and settlement of the proposed issues," &c. *

The defender reclaimed. The pursuer's counsel were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is issuable matter here. The record states that this man was on a scaffolding on the 6th of August 1855—that the scaffolding was insufficient—that the attention of the defender's manager was called to its insufficiency, but that he failed or neglected to remedy it. That averment is relevant. There is another question raised as to the liability of the master for a colabateur, but this is not the time for considering it.

was inclined to think that the latter was the proper course.

being at same time a mercantile question, and that is a strong consideration Fraser v.
for having a jury trial. Farther, the leading witness necessarily is the pursuer. Brebner.
and it is therefore of importance to have his examination taken before a jury, who shall have the opportunity of judging how far his evidence is to be credited. The evidence will consist chiefly of parole evidence of parties connected with the administration of the affairs of the Company; and a great deal will depend on the accuracy of their recollection and credibility. It is proper, therefore, that they too should be examined before a jury. There is no evidence to be taken abroad.

Sol.-General, for the defenders;—The only object is to arrive at the truth of this matter. The defenders will have little or no parole evidence at all; and a proof on commission will afford the pursuer himself a sufficient safe-ground for speaking the truth.

LORD PRESIDENT.—When the case was before us, nothing was said about the proof, whether it was to be by jury trial or commission. I rather think, that as the pursuer insists on a jury trial, there is not sufficient reason for preventing it. If there had been a necessity for taking a great deal of evidence abroad, thus rendering a commission necessary at any rate, that would have been a good ground for allowing the whole proof to be so taken; but as that is not the case, there must be a jury trial in the usual way.

LORDS IVORY and CURRIEHILL concurred.

LORD DEAS.—I would rather have been guided by the suggestion of the Lord Ordinary in this case, but it is better not to raise questions in regard to it; and, as your Lordships think otherwise, I concur.

THE COURT then pronounced an interlocutor, appointing the issues to be tried before a jury in common form.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Consensus in idem placitum—Rei interventus—Interdict—A party made offer in August for a farm, by letter addressed to the landlord, “on conditions explained by you.” The landlord’s agents sent a draft lease to the offerer, with a note stating that the rent in the lease was less than was agreed on, but the reason of this the landlord would explain when they met. The offerer’s agents, in October, and sometime after a renewed application by the landlord’s agents requesting the lease to be returned, did return it to be extended, but the landlord’s agent then proposed to insert farther conditions, and reduce to writing certain matters which had been verbally agreed upon. In the meantime the offerer had made purchases at the displensing sale, and ordered implements for the farm; and having taken possession of the farm, the landlord applied for interdict against him.  Fraser v.
 Brebner.

On 5th October Fraser's agent wrote to Brebner as follows :—" I sometime ago sent you a draft of a lease between you and Mr Fraser of Heathcot for your revisal, along with a note calling your attention to the fact that I have stated the rent on the draft at L.10 less than your offer, for reasons and on conditions which would be explained to you by Mr Fraser personally.

" I have been expecting to hear from you every day since, but not having done so, I have to request that you will return the draft of the lease that it may be extended, after being revised by Mr Fraser."

On 17th October Brebner's agents returned the lease to be extended, stating that they were satisfied with it; but of same date Fraser's agent replied that he had omitted to mention a certain condition which must be inserted in the lease, and that a variety of matters verbally agreed on should form the subject of a written memorandum, to be signed by the parties at the time the lease was executed, and he concluded as follows :—" Although you do not mention it in your note, I have no doubt you are aware that Mr Fraser has found it necessary to apply to the Sheriff for a warrant to restrain Mr Brebner from taking possession of the farm or cropping the ground till the terms of agreement are adjusted, and unless these terms are adjusted to his (Mr F.'s) satisfaction, and the tenant agrees to drive the stone and other materials for building his offices, the rent must be L.240, as in Mr Brebner's offer."

The litigation which was then commenced before the Sheriff resulted in this advocacy. In the proceedings before the Sheriff the landlord averred that " the draft lease had not been completed or adjusted between the parties, and possession under it had not been given to him by the respondent, but that the respondent nevertheless, without the sanction or authority of the petitioner, or of any one entitled to give such sanction or authority, on or about the 8th day of October last, illegally entered upon the said portion of said home farm of Heathcot, and commenced certain ploughing operations, and threatened to exercise all the usual powers of a tenant of the possession or subjects referred to in said draft lease."

The landlord therefore craved interdict against Brebner entering upon the farm, " until such time as a regular lease shall be concluded and executed between the petitioner and respondent, on the terms set forth in said draft lease (subject always to its revisal by the petitioner, and to adjustment between him and the respondent), or absolutely and in all time coming, in the event of such lease not being entered into and executed" within reasonable period.

The respondent pleaded rei interventus, in respect of purchases made by him of wheat and fodder, &c., at the displesh sale of the way-going tenar on 15th August, to the amount of L.87; and, on 16th August, ordering two carts to be made by a plough-wright, which cost L.25. The Sheriff-substitute (Gordon Robertson) granted the interdict as craved, holding that there had been no final mutual understanding as to the conditions of the proposed lease, nor a completed bargain between them,—and, on appeal, the Sheriff (J. Montgomerie Bell) adhered.*

* " NOTE.—Though this case is attended with some difficulty, it would appear that the parties never got the full length of a concluded contract, and therefore that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute is well founded.

" In the present position of the case there is a specialty (which it is pari jure to notice), in consequence of there being no stamped agreement or missive on which the appellant can found; but as this could still be obviated by getting the proper stamp affixed, the process would have been merely sisted for a sufficient time to allow this to be done, if it had appeared that the appellant's defence would have been thereby validated, but it would not have been so..

" It is a lease of nineteen years which is in question, and the appellant must either found on a formal and probative lease, or upon an informal lease, supported by rei interventus. There is no formal lease in the question, and as to the other alternative, it is apparent from the correspondence of parties that the letter of the landlord's agents of 5th September must have certiorated the appellant beyond any doubt that the landlord at least understood the contract of lease to be still entirely unfinished. The appellant must therefore shew that, prior to 5th September, there was an informal contract already validated by rei interventus. Any subsequent acts of alleged rei interventus after 5th September may be laid aside.

Fraser v.
Brebner.

"Now, it is of the essence of the appellant's case that however informal the contract between the parties might have been, there was at least an actual contract or true consensus in idem placitum, a full mutual agreement on both sides, and not merely a close approximation to such agreement. But the appellant fails to do this. He had written to the landlord on 10th August an offer in very general terms of L.240 of yearly rental for Mains of Heathcot, 'according to conditions explained by you.' Next day the landlord's agents wrote the appellant with a draft lease for his revisal, stating, no doubt, that the landlord was satisfied with it, but also notifying that the rent was reduced by L.10 (viz., L.230), the reason of which the landlord was to explain when they met.

"It does not appear that the appellant was entitled to assume that he had got the land at a sum of rent spontaneously reduced by the landlord below his own offer, without something remaining to be still explained and adjusted between them in the course of the revisal of the draft lease, and the words of the letter draw his special attention to this subject. But the parties were living near each other, and the appellant could easily have cleared this matter up by inquiring what subject of explanation still remained to be adjusted between his landlord and himself, and what was the contemplated equivalent or other cause for the abatement of the rent. Though the point is narrow, it does appear that the appellant was not entitled to assume, without farther explanation or communication of any kind, that the agreement of parties was fully adjusted between them, and merely remained to be extended as a probative writ.

"In place, however, of asking for any explanation after having got the draft for revisal, the appellant proceeded at once to perform two acts, which are founded on making a rei interventus, viz., buying wheat and fodder, &c., at the displeasure of the way-going tenant on 15th August, to the amount of L.87, and on 16th August, ordering two carts to be made by a ploughwright, which cost L.25. The overments on these points are, hoc statu, assumed to be true.

"No other acts were done by the appellant prior to 5th October, on which day the landlord's agents wrote him to expedite the adjustment of the lease, and in which expressly intimated that the landlord had all along understood the agreement to be still unfinished. To this the appellant makes no immediate answer. He does not instantly write that he holds the agreement to be concluded, and that he has been acting on the faith of this. On the contrary, he makes no answer at all till 17th October, when his agent sent back the draft lease, desiring it to be extended precisely as it stood. In these circumstances, it would appear that the only basis to which acts of rei interventus can effectually attach (viz., actually completed bargain), is wanting.

"It is not hujus loci to determine what would have been the effect of the two acts specified as making a proper case of rei interventus, if these acts had followed an actual but informal contract. It is enough, in the present instance, that such contract seems to be wanting.

"There are various circumstances in the proceedings of the landlord which are unsatisfactory, and it is very difficult to make the language of the letter of 10th August cohere with the material variation which it was afterwards proposed to make on the 16th. But this would seem only to go to the modification of the rei interventus litigation which might probably at first have been altogether precluded by a more correct procedure on the part of the landlord. It is material, at least in this litigation, on this subject, the offer made by the landlord in his communication of the 10th, Art. 11."

Process—Title to Sue—Infestment cum processu.—In an action of declarator of right to a stream, and against encroachments, the defenders disputed the pursuer's right to ground adjoining the stream, and pleaded, that this being a real action the pursuer had no title to sue, in respect neither he nor his predecessors were infest in these grounds. Subsequent to the date of the action, the pursuer completed his title by infestment in the disputed ground under a title which had not been previously feudalised;—Held (affirming judgment of Lord Ardmillan), that the pursuer's infestment cum processu, and the possession alleged by him, was sufficient to sustain his title, and it did not require a prescriptive title to enable him to sue.

Feb. 11, 1857. THE pursuer was heritable proprietor of certain lands in Inverness-shire, part of which adjoined a stream called Mill-burn, and he brought this action against the defenders, who were ex adverso proprietors, containing declaratory conclusions of his right to the use of the stream, and of the illegality of certain operations by the defenders, and concluding to have the stream restored to its natural channel ex adverso of his lands. He averred that he and his predecessors and authors had for time immemorial the free uninterrupted and continuous use of the stream adjoining his lands. The pursuer's sasine was only taken after the action was in Court. None of his predecessors were validly infest in the subjects. He had therefore no prescriptive title. The defenders produced no title at all, but merely stood on the defensive, and pleaded the invalidity of the pursuer's title.
 1ST DIVISION.
 Feb. 11, 1857. —
 Ld. Ardmillan C.

The defenders averred that, in point of fact, the pursuer had no ground touching the stream—the property of the defender Robertson intervening; and they averred that the pursuer's titles were defective—his infestment in part of his lands being subsequent to the raising of this action. They therefore pleaded, in limine,—"1. The pursuer had not, at the date of the summons, and does not even yet possess, a title valid and sufficient to support his right to insist in the present action. 2. The conclusions of the action are groundless, in respect that the pursuer has not relevantly set forth, and cannot instruct, any right or interest in the matters therein referred to sufficient to support said conclusions; more especially as the pursuer or his predecessors never had any title or right as proprietors to land bounded by the burn."

The Lord Ordinary, on 20th January 1857, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Reserves the first and second pleas in law stated for the defenders to be discussed with the merits, when the state of the facts in dispute has been ascertained; and appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that the mode of procedure in investigating the facts may be adjusted ; and reserves the question of expenses." * No. 97.

The defenders reclaimed. They only pressed the first plea, and only the first part of it. They pleaded, that the action was essentially of the nature of a real action ; and, from the titles produced, it appeared that none of the pursuer's authors had been infeft in the lands. There was no case in which a party who could not connect himself with a previous infeftment could insist in a real action.¹ Feb. 11, 1857.

LORD PRESIDENT.—None of the cases referred to touch this case. The title of the pursuer is merely sufficient to prevent the encroachments complained of.

LORD IVORY.—The defenders may at present be no better than squatters on this land, which they aver is not the pursuer's, but to which they themselves have produced no title.

part of Burnet and Smart was deduced, was as follows:—"The said apprehension, proceedings, pretended conviction, and sentence and imprisonment, took place and proceeded by directions, and at the instance of the defender James O'Neil, and were obtained and insisted in, and carried into force by him, he being joint procurator-fiscal of court, along with the defender John Burnet, and assistant-superintendent of police to and under the said James Smart."

In defence to the action, it was pleaded for Burnet and Smart;—"It not having been alleged in the summons as libelled, or made ground of action in due and legal form, that the acts complained of were done by the defenders, Mr Burnet and Mr Smart, or by their instructions, or under their authority, or even with their knowledge, and no relevant or sufficient statement of any kind having been made against them in the summons, and no amendment thereof allowed, the action, quoad Mr Burnet and Mr Smart, ought to be at once dismissed."

To meet this plea the pursuer, in his revised paper, amplified the statement quoted above as follows:—"The defender James O'Neil is joint procurator-fiscal along with the defender John Burnet, and the defender John Burnet is joint procurator-fiscal with the said defender O'Neil, and participates in the profits, emoluments, and benefits of that office so far as exercised by O'Neil, and of the proceedings conducted by the said defender O'Neil, as joint procurator-fiscal foresaid. The defender James Smart is principal superintendent of police of the city of Glasgow, and has the appointment of, and did appoint, the said James O'Neil as assistant-superintendent to and under him, and is, under and by virtue of the statute 9 & 10 Vic. cap. 289 (27th July 1846), responsible for him and his actings as such. The said apprehension, proceedings, pretended conviction, and sentence and imprisonment of the pursuer, originated, took place, and proceeded, under authority of, and by instructions derived or emanating from the defender Burnet, Smart, and O'Neil. The apprehension, complaint, conviction, sentence, imprisonment, and others proceeded and were obtained, insisted in, and carried into force, in name, and at the instance of, and by, the defender James O'Neil, as joint procurator-fiscal of court, along with the defender John Burnet, and as assistant-superintendent of police to and under the said James Smart."

It was contended that, even as thus altered, the allegations were not relevant.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds, regards the defenders Burnet and Smart, that the pursuer's averments are not sufficient to import a case of personal fault or wrong on the part of the said defenders in the matters libelled: Finds that the pursuer's averments are not relevant to infer a liability on the part of the said defenders for the acts of the other defenders, or any of them: Therefore sustains the defence for the said defenders Burnet and Smart, dismisses the action as against them, and decerns: Finds them entitled to expenses, and allows an account to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the Auditor to tax and report. Finds that the pursuer has averred relevant grounds of action against the other defenders, and repels the defences stated by them respectively, so far as directed against the relevancy of the action, but reserving all their other pleas, and all questions as to the extent of their liability for the several matters complained of; and appoints parties respectively, within eight days to prepare and lodge draft of such issues and counter issues, as they propose for the trial of the cause." *

* "NOTE.—The nature of this action must be determined by the original statements in the summons; but, indeed, these do not appear to be materially extended in the revised condescendence.

An attempt was made on the part of the pursuer to have the matter thus refused as a revisal added to the record by way of an amendment to the summons, but this the Lord Ordinary refused to allow.

Bain v.
Burnet.

When the case came before the Inner-House, after hearing parties, the following interlocutor was pronounced:—

“HAVING considered the amendment of the summons proposed before closing the record, and the final interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary refusing to allow the same, and his Lordship’s note to that interlocutor, and heard counsel, find that the grounds of action now stated in the revised condescendence against the defenders Burnet and Smart

“The Lord Ordinary thinks that, neither in the summons nor record is there any clear, consistent, or sufficient statement that Burnet and Smart were actual parties to the proceedings complained of, so as to make them liable on the ground of personal fault or delinquency. He understood that this was not the ground of action meant to be relied on as against them.

“The pursuer, however, maintains that Burnet, who is procurator-fiscal of the burgh and city of Glasgow, is liable for the fault or wrong of the defender O’Neil, in his character of joint fiscal with Burnet, for a certain district of the town; and that Smart, who is superintendent of police, is liable for O’Neil’s acts, in his character of assistant-superintendent, to which office he was appointed by Smart. There is no attempt to separate in their results the acts of O’Neil as assistant-superintendents from his acts as joint procurator-fiscal, but perhaps this was not necessary at this stage of the cause.

“The Lord Ordinary does not think that the pursuer’s pleas now referred to are well-founded, either on general grounds, or on any special circumstances that are set forth.

“As regards Burnet, it will be observed that the complaint, the only part of the proceedings with which the procurator-fiscal can be held connected, is presented in name of O’Neil alone, as joint procurator-fiscal. The Lord Ordinary cannot hold that another joint fiscal, not a party to the proceedings, can be answerable for their regularity. Even supposing, as the pursuer alleges in his revised condescendence, that Burnet participates in the emoluments of the office as exercised by O’Neil, it does not appear that this affords a legal ground for holding him liable to a third party, not his employer, for the misconduct of the prosecution here in question, in which O’Neil was the only prosecutor.

“As regards Smart, the case is somewhat different. O’Neil, the assistant-superintendent, is appointed by Smart, and the statute (9 & 10 Vict. c. 289, sect. 22), declares that the superintendent ‘shall have full power to appoint and dismiss, and shall also be responsible for the whole of the assistant-superintendents, lieutenants, patrol, and watchmen, in the several departments of the preventive and criminal police acting under him.’ But the Lord Ordinary cannot view this enactment as creating a pecuniary responsibility to third parties for the acts of the subordinate officers in the exercise of their official functions, nor does this mere power of appointment constitute the relation of master and servant, or even of employer and employed, between Smart and O’Neil. O’Neil is not Smart’s servant. They are fellow-servants of the magistrates, and of the community or public, and the Lord Ordinary cannot hold that a public officer or public servant is responsible in the way suggested for the inferior servants or officers whose assistance is necessary for the public service, even though the patronage or appointment may be left to him. He may be liable for making a bad appointment, but he does not seem to be liable for the personal faults of such inferior officers.

“The Lord Ordinary is aware that in the case of Melvin, 22d May 1847, 9 D. 1129, an opposite opinion is expressed by Lord Jeffrey. But his Lordship’s observations were obiter dicta, not entering into the proper or immediate question under consideration, and not given effect to, or adopted, by the rest of the Court. With every regard to the weight due to the opinion of that eminent judge, the Lord Ordinary cannot hold that his views on this point are supported either by legal principle or by authority, and he thinks that the adoption of them would be both unjust and injurious to the public interest.”

Fee or Liferent—Husband and Wife—Bankruptcy.—Two sisters, both married women, were pro indiviso proprietors of certain heritable subjects derived from their mother. A division was effected by two conveyances executed by them, with consent of their husbands. The destination in the conveyance to the eldest sister was "to and in favour of her and her husband, and longest liver of them two, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the child or children procreate or to be procreate betwixt them, which failing, to the said longest liver of them two, and the said longest liver her or his heirs and assignees whomsoever, in fee heritably and irredeemably." There were children of the marriage. The husband survived the wife, and was sequestered. After his death, in a competition between the trustee on his estate and the surviving children,—Held (affirming judgment of Lord Benholme), that the fee of the wife's estate did not vest in him, but in the wife herself, and therefore was not carried in the sequestration.

THE facts of this case were thus stated by the Lord Ordinary in his note:—"In 1804 two sisters, both married women, were proprietors of certain heritable subjects derived from their mother, who had conveyed these subjects to them pro indiviso. It was found convenient to divide these heritages into two portions, so that each of the two sisters might become exclusive proprietor of one of these portions. The share that fell to the lot of Mrs Calman (the eldest sister, whose maiden name was Ann Ritchie) consisted of house property in the burgh of Kilrenny.

"The division was effected by two conveyances executed by the pro indiviso proprietrixes, with consent of their respective husbands.

"The conveyance in favour of Mrs Calman proceeds upon a narrative which contains these expressions, and this conveyance,—'And Mary Black, our mother, having granted to us a disposition pro indiviso of her heritable property, we with one consent have agreed to make a division of the heritable property in communion betwixt us, and to allocate to each of us our particular share thereof. Therefore wit ye us to have made over, assigned and disposed, likeas we hereby make over, assign, and dispoone, to and in favour of the said Ann Ritchie and John Calman, and longest liver of them two, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the child or children procreate or to be procreate betwixt them, which failing, to the said longest liver of them two, and the said longest liver, her or his heirs and assignees whomsoever in fee, heritably and irredeemably, all and whole, &c.'

"The deed specially assigns the mother's conveyance, in so far as regards the subjects thus allocated, to Mrs Calman, 'that in virtue thereof, and of the procuratory of resignation or precept of sasine therein contained, and hitherto unexecuted, the said Ann Ritchie and John Calman may be infeft and seized in the whole subjects above disposed.'

"The marriage between John Calman and Ann Ritchie was dissolved about the year 1813 by the death of the latter, leaving several children of the marriage, of whom the survivors are the defenders in the present action.

In 1843 John Calman became bankrupt, and his estate was sequestrated. No. 99.
He himself died in 1848.

"The pursuer is the present trustee upon John Calman's sequestrated estate, and he has raised the present action of declarator in order to have it found that the foresaid subjects now form part of the sequestrated estate under his charge, as having been vested in fee in John Calman by the conveyance of 1804. This conclusion is resisted by the defenders." Feb. 12, 1857.
Myles v.
Calman.

They pleaded;—That according to the sound construction of the disposition by their mother, viewed as carrying out and implementing a family settlement of property belonging to her, the right of fee in the heritable subjects in question remained in her, and was not carried to her husband; and even if the effect of the disposition was to reduce the mother's right to a life interest, yet the fee was given to the children of the marriage, and now belonged to the defenders, as the surviving children, in equal proportions.

The Lord Ordinary, on 20th March 1855, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the fee of the subjects in dispute was not vested in the late John Calman: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the first declaratory conclusion of the summons, and decerns. Quoad ultra, appoints the case to be enrolled, with a view of disposing of the other conclusions." *

* "NOTE.—(After the above narrative)—At the debate, the main consideration urged by the pursuer in reference to the terms of the conveyance, was the survivance of the husband; whilst the defenders founded upon the fact that the property belonged to the wife.

"The conveyance upon which the question turns is somewhat peculiar, inasmuch as the children of the marriage are called to the succession by a clause which is interjected between the first part of the conveyance, which is in favour of the spouses and the survivor of them two, and the last part, which calls the said survivor and her or his heirs and assignees.

"This peculiarity of style has occasioned considerable embarrassment in the construction of the deed, and has, on the whole, induced the Lord Ordinary to prefer the defender's pleas.

"His views are these:—

"1. The only serious doubt in this case appears to be, whether the fee was in the husband or in the wife. It can hardly be maintained that by the conveyance the fee was in the children. For the spouses take not only a conjunct life interest, but the addition, 'for life interest use alienably,' but they also take a conjunct fee. The real question is, Which of the spouses was the fiar, and which the liferenter?

"2. The husband survived; and his sex, as well as survivance, are founded on the support of the pursuer's case.

"As to the survivance, this, in reference to some styles in conveyance, has been held very important, if not decisive.

"3. The survivor has been held to be the fiar in the following several instances:—

"(1.) Where the spouses only take a conjunct life interest, and the fee is specially reserved to the survivors, and their heirs and assignees.—Forrester v. Trustees of Gregor, 13th April 1835, House of Lords, Shaw and M'Lean, I. 441.

"(2.) Where the right is taken to the spouses and the survivor in conjunct fee and life interest, and their heirs.

"In such cases, their heirs are held by settled construction to mean the heirs of the survivor.—Ferguson v. M'Grigor, 22d June 1739 (4202); Elchies Fiar 5, own's Supp. v. 777; Lord Boyd v. King's Advocate, 22d November 1749 (405); Burrowes v. M'Farquhar's Trustees, 6th July 1842, ante, vol. iv. p. 1484.

"4. But where the right is taken to the spouses, and the survivor, and to the heirs, not of the survivor, but of the marriage, the construction of law is very different. Such a style of conveyance is not decisive in favour of the survivor, so as to vest the fee in him or her. Far less is it decisive in favour of the husband in respect of his sex, and without reference to his survivance. On the contrary, other circumstances will be looked to to cast the balance ; and in particular, the side of the house from which the property flowed will have a great, if not decisive, influence in determining whether the fee is in the husband or in the wife.

“ It is no doubt true, that under such a clause, the husband, cæteris paribus, will be held the fiar, from regard to his sex, even where he is not the survivor, especially if the property come from him, or if he gets it from his wife, nomine dotis. There are a variety of cases which demonstrate this bias of our practice.

“ But if the subject belongs to the wife, or comes from her relations, and has not the character of tocher, or dos, she will be held to be the fiar. And it is proper here to notice that Mr Bell, in the well known passage of his Commentaries, in which he lays down the rules of construction applicable to joint rights between husband and wife, has a little understated the effect of this circumstance in favour of the wife. He observes :—‘ 2. If the subject come from the wife, or her relations, and the expression is not such as clearly to intimate a preference in favour of the husband, the wife is fiar, the husband liferenter ; the husband’s creditors cannot attach the fee, while the wife can grant no conveyance, nor her creditors attach her right, otherwise than with a full reservation of the husband’s liferent. But it is a sufficient destination to give a fee to the husband, if the subject is taken in conjunct fee and liferent, and the heirs of the marriage in fee.’ The learned author here refers in a foot-note to the case of Watson against Johnstone, 22d July 1766. But that case does not warrant the doctrine contained in the last sentence of this quotation.

“ The report of that case, as given in the Faculty Collection, is imperfect, and calculated to mislead, leaving it to be inferred that the estate was entirely the wife’s.

“ But on consulting the reports by Monboddo (Brown’s Suppl. v. p. 927), and Hailes (i. 82), it will be found that the Court proceeded expressly on the footing that the subject belonged to the husband, nomine dotis. This case of Watson against Johnstone truly affords an illustration, not of the doctrine contained in this passage of Mr Bell, but of the rule which he lays down shortly afterwards, to the effect that ‘ the wife will be held as fiar, cæteris paribus, where the subject flows from her ; yet if it has come into the communion as tocher, it will require the strongest expressions of preference in her favour, to vest her with the fee.’

“ 5. It seems to be law, therefore, that where the heirs of the survivor are not immediately called to the fee, after mention of the spouses and the survivor, it remains to be determined by other circumstances, whether the survivor is to take a fee, or only a liferent. When the subject belonged to the wife, the presumption is that the husband, on survivance, takes merely a liferent. Such is the doctrine to be derived from the case of Blair v. Henderson, 16th June 1757, reported in Brown’s Supplement, v. p. 335. ‘ In this process the defender appeared, and pleaded that the subject sought to be adjudged was not in hereditate jacente of his father, but belonged to himself as heir of his mother, to whom his mother’s father had disposed the same in the following terms :—“ For the love, favour, and affection he had and bore to Anna Young, his eldest lawful daughter, and to George Henderson, merchant in Cupar, her husband,” and for certain other onerous causes and considerations giving, granting, and disposing, to and in favour of the said Anna Young and George Henderson, and longest liver of them two, and the heirs to be procreated betwixt them and their assignees whatsoever, all and hail,’ &c.

“ ‘ The defender therefore maintained that this subject could not be attached for his father’s debts.

“ ‘ It appeared that George Henderson had survived his wife.

“ ‘ March 5, 1757.—The Lord Ordinary found, “ That the subject disposed being from the wife’s father, and his name mentioned first, and being for love and favour, and not for tocher with the wife, which is previously secured by the contract of marriage, the wife was fiar, and that therefore the subject cannot be adjudged by the pursuer, a creditor of the husband, on the decree of cognition against the defender, the heir of the marriage.”

“ ‘ In a petition against this interlocutor, the pursuer referred to the following principle of construction by the decision in the House of Lords in the important case of Glendonwing v. Maxwell, 22d June 1854.¹ The destination itself contained a clear meaning, and any presumption of law was therefore superseded by it.²

Myles v.
Calman.

The respondents pleaded;—That the circumstance of the property flowing from the wife was a specialty in this case which was of importance. She was the original fiar, and had not denuded herself.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—The view which I have taken of this case is in accordance with the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived. In my view of the case, it is of great importance,—indeed, decisive,—that this property not only belonged to the wife herself at the time the deed in question was executed, but that the deed itself was executed, not for the purpose of divesting her of the property, but for the very purpose of giving to her her own separate share of it, instead of decisions in support of his argument, that the husband must be held to have been fiar:—Bartilmo v. Hasinting, 2d February 1632; Graham v. Park, 29th January 1739; Gardin v. Sandilands, 12th July 1671; Edgar v. Sinclair, 23d July 1713. The Court, however, adhered. Lord Kilkerran has the following note of the grounds of the judgment,—‘June 16, 1757.—The President Kilkerran, &c. declared for the interlocutor, only Kaimes stated a doubt upon the clause, “and the longest liver of them,” to which the answer made was, that the fee was originally settled in somebody, and in respect of the circumstances in the interlocutor mentioned, particularly that it was a mere gratuity, not a contract of marriage, that could be no other than the wife. And on the question stated, see or refuse, the Lords refused the petition.’

“6. The Lord Ordinary cannot help considering this case of Blair v. Henderson as an important decision in reference to the present case.

“For here, as in the case of Blair v. Henderson, the clause to be interpreted occurs not in a marriage-contract, but in a deed of conveyance in favour of the wife—a conveyance, the declared object of which was, to divide between two sisters property held by them pro indiviso.

“It would be very strange, in these circumstances, to hold that Mrs Calman did not take a fee by the deed which was intended to allocate her share to her; or that the fee was vested in her husband, so as to cut out both herself and the children of the marriage altogether. The more reasonable construction is, that the surviving husband was to take merely a liferent.

“7. Nor does it appear that this conclusion drawn from the circumstances of the case, viewed in connection with the first part of the clause of conveyance, can be excluded by the latter part of the clause, in which, after calling the children of the marriage, there is a substitution as follows:—‘Which failing, to the said longest liver of them two, and the said longest liver, her or his heirs or assignees whomsoever in fee heritably and irredeemably.’

“For, upon this clause it is obvious to remark, that the survivor is here called to the fee only upon the failure of children, which is inconsistent with the notion that the fee was vested in the survivor by the earlier part of the clause. According to the pursuer’s argument, the surviving husband takes the fee both as institute and afterwards as substituted to the children. Whereas, the sounder view seems to be, that in the earlier part of the clause, the survivor, qua survivor, takes merely a liferent; whilst in the latter part, where he is called along with his heirs and assignees, he takes a fee as substitute to the children. The children being thus in the destination preferred to the survivor (qua survivor), the primary fee must be held to remain with the mother, the true proprietrix, to whom the children are heirs of provision.

“Had the mother survived, the effect of this last clause must have been to bring her heirs and assignees, failing children of the marriage.”

No. 99. holding it, as formerly, pro indiviso : “ And Mary Black, our mother, having granted to us a disposition pro indiviso of her heritable property, we, with one consent, have
 Feb. 12, 1857. agreed to make a division of the heritable property in communion betwixt us, and Myles v. to allocate to each of us our particular share.” The object and purpose of the deed Calman. was to allocate to each sister her peculiar share of this property. That being so, it would certainly require something very clear and explicit to convince me that the true object of the destination, the nature of the provisions and structure of the whole deed, was such as to deprive that sister of the fee which originally belonged to her. There is nothing in the deed to lead to that conclusion. The destination is “ to and in favour of the said Anne Ritchie and John Calman, and longest liver of them two in conjunct fee and liferent.” That does not necessarily, and in all cases, vest the fee in the husband. If the property belonged to the wife in her own right—still more, if it appears that the object of the deed was only to make an arrangement between this lady and her sister—the effect of these words is not necessarily to vest the fee of the wife’s property in the husband. These words are intended to give the fee and a co-existing liferent, but they leave the right of fee in the wife, and only confer a liferent in the surviving husband. If the wife survives, she is to have both liferent and fee. That is the fair construction of these words where the property belongs to the wife herself, and still more, where the object of the deed is such as, I think, is clearly pointed out in the whole tenor of this deed.

The destination proceeds:—“ To the child or children procreate or to be procreate betwixt them, which failing—to the said longest liver of them two, and the said longest liver, her, or his heirs and assignees whomsoever in fee, heritably and irredeemably.” These words do not destroy the construction I have explained. They do not indicate any favour for the children as the children of the husband any more than of the wife. When it is the husband who is settling the estate that is a different thing. But here the words of this destination do not afford ground for supposing that it was intended to vest the fee in the husband. The words were appealed to by both parties as indicating a purpose to vest the fee in the party for whose benefit each construed the words, and, certainly, the words admit of being construed both ways. There appeared also to the Lord Ordinary some confusion and inconsistency in them, and in one view they might be read as making a substitution to the husband after his heirs,—he thus getting the fee after his own death. It is difficult to conceive that the deed could be made with any such purpose. But there really is not much confusion in the words after all. The fee is given, in the first place, to the wife. There is a liferent to the husband if he survives her. The fee then goes to the children, and what follows is intended to provide for the event of there being no children born or having been born—failing them, then the previous condition of matters arises, and which, it is provided, is to take effect on the dissolution of the marriage. Reading the deed in that light, the fee goes to the longest liver of them two, her, or his heirs and assignees whomsoever. It may be contended, in that case, that if the husband had survived, and there had been no children of the marriage, the fee would have gone to him as the longest liver, and to his heirs and assignees whomsoever. In the same way, if the dissolution of the marriage had taken place by the predecease of the husband, the fee would have gone to the wife, and her heirs and assignees. But this part of the deed is only intended to apply to the failure of children before the dissolution of the marriage—which did not happen. Reading the destination by the light of the source of the property and the evident purpose of the deed itself, I am satisfied that the fee is given to the wife, and not to the husband, although, under the last branch of this destination, it might have been maintained that if there had been no children of the marriage, the husband surviving might have got the fee. But that contingency is not such an indication of purpose and preference of the husband as to control the previous part of the deed, and, upon that ground, I am for adhering.

LORD IVORY.—I agree ; and, being satisfied with the grounds of the Lord Ordinary’s note as supplemented by your Lordship, I have nothing to add.

LORD CURRIEHILL.—I have come to the same conclusion. The case is not without some difficulty, and is different, I think, from almost any former one ; but, on applying to it the established principles of construction, the destination admits of no other reading than your Lordship has put on it. The only question before us is, whether or not the right of fee vested in John Calman? Now, one thing is quite clear, that if he was fiar, he acquired the fee only under the disposition of 1804. The original right of fee belonged not to him but to his wife. So far, therefore, as regards the destination, I look upon the granter of it as being Mrs Calman, and I deal with her as a party making a settlement of her own property.

Myles v.
Calman.

Now, where two parties are not related to each other as spouses or as parent and child, a conveyance to them of property in conjunct fee makes each of them proprietor of one-half; but when there is introduced into such a conveyance a liferent as well as fee, that alters the effect of the destination so far, that each is fiar of one-half; and the survivor, besides being fiar of one-half, is also liferenter of the other half. When the parties are related to each other, as husband and wife, such a destination is construed differently. The one is exclusive fiar, and the other exclusive liferenter, and the question has always been, which is in the one position and which in the other? The solution of that question has always been according to the circumstances of each case. At same time, there are certain canons of interpretation which have been well established, and which are sufficient for the solution of this case.

The contention here is, that the husband was fiar under the first branch of this destination, which is in favour of the husband and wife, and longest liver of them two, in conjunct fee and liferent. If the husband was fiar, he was so from the date of this deed in 1804, and the wife only liferenter. But could this deed have been so read at that date consistently with these established rules of construction? It could not; for, in the first place, this property proceeds from the wife, and she is dealing with it as her own property. She is the granter of the deed, and testatrix of the destination; and the presumption of law is very strong, that the owner of the property does not intend, by a destination of this kind, to divest himself, in his own lifetime, of his right of ownership, unless the words of the destination will not admit of any other reading. There is an exception to this rule in the case where the husband's right is onerous, for example, in a marriage-contract, where he gets the property in nomine dotis. Here his right is absolutely gratuitous, so much so, that there is nothing to have prevented the wife at any time retracting that right, whatever it was—liferent or fee; and consequently the case does not fall under that exception.

There is another decisive view of the construction of this destination. The purpose of the deed was not to divest the wife of the fee, but to invest her with it. The narrative of the deed says that in so many words; so that there are here very strong rules of construction adverse to the plea that the fee was intended to be vested in the husband.

That plea is also at variance with the subsequent branch of the destination; because, if the husband was fiar under this conveyance, he was the owner as institute, from 1804 when this deed was executed and delivered. Now, undoubtedly, whatever may be the reading of this deed in other respects, you have him in the subsequent branch of the destination made a substitute heir of provision in the contingency of the failure of his wife and their children. Now that is totally irreconcilable with the fee having been in him from the date of the disposition. All these difficulties you have to contend with, in supposing that the husband was fiar.

But taking the wife to be fiar, there is no difficulty. She is dealing with her own property. She is disponent, and she begins by disponing to her husband and herself in conjunct fee and liferent. It is consistent with all the authorities, that that conveys a liferent of a peculiar kind—equivalent to a liferent by reservation, which carries more than a mere liferent does. Consistently with that construction, the wife retains the right of property which previously belonged to her, subject to the burden of such a liferent; and granting such a gratuitous deed, she makes a destination—a simple entail so far as it goes—in favour of her children; and failing them, to her husband and his heirs, in case he should be the survivor. It is said that, on the same principle, she herself could not be the institute or fiar under the first branch of the destination, because she makes herself, in the event of her being the survivor of the spouses, substitute under the second branch of the destination. It might be a sufficient answer, that even if the first branch of the

No. 99. destination displaced both husband and wife as fiars, the deed would still be a good deed; for in that case they would both be liferenters, and the children fiars—and still the fee would not be in the father. But I do not think that is the meaning of it. The fee, under the first branch of the destination, remains with the wife. She is executing a destination of her property, and concludes the destination in effect by saying, that failing all the other parties favoured by it, in her own lifetime, the right should remain with herself and her heirs and assignees.

LORD DEAS.—I also am for adhering to the interlocutor. I adopt so entirely the observations in the well considered note of the Lord Ordinary, that I deem it superfluous to add anything. The fact of the survivor being substituted as fiar to the children of the marriage, strikes at least equally against the supposition that the husband was fiar ab initio, as that the wife was so. This is the true remark to make upon the concluding part of the dispositive clause; and I do not think the Lord Ordinary, in the seventh head of his note, meant to go farther than this. He rests his conclusion upon the other grounds stated by him, and then observes that the concluding words of the clause are not sufficient to overturn it. I take quite the same view of the matter. The fee of one or other of the parties depended upon survivorship, and the question is, of which of them? I think that of the husband. The notion of a joint fee—one-half in each—as in the case of strangers, will not do. The creditors of the husband could no more have carried off one-half the subject in the wife's lifetime, than the whole of it. The Dean of Faculty's argument was that, the words being plain, all presumptions ought to be excluded. Yet he founded upon the presumption arising from the heirs of the survivor (in this case the husband) being most favoured. Now the moment this is founded on, must not other presumptions equally come in? True, it was said, this is a presumption drawn from what appears on the face of the deed. But so it is with many others. The fact that the parties are husband and wife,—or parent and child,—the object of the conveyance, whether it be a marriage provision, and, if so, whether it be antenuptial or postnuptial,—or whether (as here) it be a mere division of pro indiviso property,—who is the disponent,—who is narrated as having paid the price,—and so on. These things, and such as these, may and generally do all equally appear on the face of the deed as the fact whose heirs are most favoured. And it is settled law that the presumptions applicable to the construction of the destinations vary in these different cases. Proceeding upon this principle, I think the Lord Ordinary has rightly applied the legal rules and presumptions when he found that the fee was not in the husband, and consequently did not pass to his creditors to the prejudice of the children of the marriage.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find the pursuer liable to the defenders in expenses incurred by them since the date of the interlocutor reclaimed against," &c.

This was an action for the balance of an advance of L.800 made to James Leitch Laing, on the security of a policy of assurance on his life for L.1500, effected with the pursuers in 1849. This advance the pursuers alleged they had only agreed to make upon Hodges, Lang junior, and Macadam becoming sureties for it. An indenture or bond in the English form was accordingly drawn up, which narrated the policy, the agreement on the one hand to make the advance, and on the other that the parties should repay the L.800, and keep up the policy, and that nothing should be done whereby the policy should be forfeited or the premiums increased, and that interest should be paid regularly, as well as the capital repaid by stated instalments.

The pursuers' allegations as to the execution and adoption of this indenture were as follows :—"The deed of indenture was transmitted by the secretary of the pursuers to Robert Baird, writer in Glasgow, the agent for the pursuers; and the same was subscribed, sealed, and delivered by the said James Leitch Lang, George Hodges, John Lang, junior, and John Robert Bruce Macadam, respectively, in presence of witnesses who attest the said execution; and after the same had been so subscribed, sealed, and delivered, the said James Leitch Lang subscribed a receipt, appended to the said deed of indenture or bond, for the said sum of L.800."

The deed bore the signatures and seals of the two Langs, Hodges, and Macadam, with the following attestations and receipt by J. L. Lang :—

"Signed, sealed, and delivered, by the above named James Leitch Lang, in the presence of (Signed) Robert Baird, of the city of Glasgow, solicitor. (Signed) Gregor M'Gregor, of the city of Glasgow, accountant."

"Signed, sealed, and delivered, by the above named George Hodges, in the presence of (Signed) M. Mackay, of 44 George Square, Glasgow, clerk, (Signed) John Morton, of 90 South Portland Street, Glasgow, surveyor and collector, witness."

"Signed, sealed, and delivered, by the said John Lang, junior, in the presence of (Signed) Robert Baird, of the city of Glasgow, solicitor. (Signed) Gregor M'Gregor, of the city of Glasgow, accountant."

"Signed, sealed, and delivered, by the said John Robert Bruce Macadam, in the presence of (Signed) M. Mackay, 44 George Square, Glasgow, clerk, (Signed) John Macadam of Blairroer, farmer, witness."

"Received, the day and year first above written, of and from the trustees of the above mentioned institution, the sum of L.800, being the consideration money mentioned in the above written indenture to be paid by such institution to me. L.800.

(Signed) J. L. LANG.

(Signed) "M. Mackay, of 44 George Square, Glasgow, clerk, witness."

(Signed) "Gregor M'Gregor, of the city of Glasgow, accountant, witness."

On the bond and receipt reaching their secretary, the pursuers alleged that they transmitted and Lang received L.800, and that this was done "on the faith of, and in reliance upon, the agreement of the defenders to become sureties for repayment of the said sum of L.800 by the said James Leitch Lang, and of the cautionary obligation come under by them by subscribing the bond or indenture as parties thereto. It was known by the other defenders that the sum contained in the bond was paid to and received by the said James Leitch Lang on the faith and in respect of the deed of indenture or bond above narrated, and the obligation of repayment therein contained, undertaken by the defenders respectively. The defender Hodges

No. 100. signed the said bond for the defender Lang, in consideration of Lang becoming security for him in another obligation.”
 Feb. 12, 1857. For some time Lang paid duly the interest and instalments, but the pursuers received no payment after April 1855, when L.480 remained due; and Lang having become bankrupt, they now raised this action for the balance and interest, calling Lang, the trustee on his sequestrated estate, and the cautioners, and concluding for payment of L.480, “being the balance resting due, at and since the 27th of April 1855, of the principal sum of L.800 sterling advanced by the pursuers to the said James Leitch Lang, and that under and by virtue of a deed of indenture or bond, dated the 27th day of October 1852, made, granted, and executed by the said,” &c. “in favour of the pursuers, and which deed of indenture or bond is herewith produced, and held as repeated brevitatis causa : Item, Of the legal interest,” &c.
 Church of England Life and Fire Assurance Co. v. Hodges.

Neither of the Langs gave in defences.

Both Hodges and Macadam denied all knowledge of what had taken place under the deed, but admitted having subscribed it. They maintained, however, that as it bore to be executed by a Scotch debtor and Scotch sureties, all resident in and domiciled in Scotland, it was improbativ according to the law of Scotland—the name and designation of the writer and of the witnesses not being mentioned, nor the date or place of execution. They also objected to the deed, as vitiated in essentialibus, several words being written on erasures.

The pursuers pleaded;—That the advance having been made with the knowledge of all the defenders, on reliance upon the deed of indenture, their subscription of which was admitted, they were jointly and severally liable.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—“In respect that the defenders James Leitch Lang and John Lang, junior, have made no appearance in the action—Decerns against them in terms of the conclusions of the summons: And having heard parties’ procurators on the closed record between the pursuers and the other defenders George Hodges and John Robert Bruce Macadam, who have appeared, and having made avizandum, finds that the last named defenders have admitted on record their signatures subscribed to the bond or indenture libelled on; and in respect of material averments made on record by the pursuers, and which are either denied or not admitted by these defenders, and which it falls on the pursuers to establish by competent proof; and that it appears to the Lord Ordinary it is not advisable, before the facts shall be ascertained, to proceed to give judgment on the pleas in law for the parties—Therefore, before answer, and reserving specially the pleas of the defenders, allows a proof to the pursuers on the following points:—1st, Whether, after the defenders had subscribed the bond or indenture, James Leitch Lang subscribed the receipt appended thereto? 2d, Whether the sum of L.796, being in full, after deducting charges, of the sum of L.800 mentioned in said bond or indenture, was advanced and paid to James Leitch Lang by the pursuers, after they had received delivery of the said bond or indenture, with the subscriptions of the whole defenders thereto, and on the faith of the same? 3d, Of what date and how said advance and payment was made and received? and, 4th, Whether the advance and payment was known to the defenders George Hodges and John Robert Bruce Macadam, or either or which of them. And appoints these questions to be tried by the Lord Ordinary, without jury,” &c.*

* “NOTE.—The defenders peremptorily refused to make any admission whatever beyond what was made on the record, and that amounted only to an admission of their signatures being genuine. Nor would they acquiesce in a proof being allowed before answer. Had the defenders, on the one hand, admitted that the sum in the bond had been paid over to Lang after their signatures had been placed upon it

The defenders reclaimed, praying the Court to sustain the defences, and pronounce decree of absolvitor. From the conclusions of the summons, this action was clearly laid exclusively on a written instrument, and one of the most peculiar character, and not entitled to be regarded with any favour, for it concluded by renouncing all the usual equities recognised in favour of cautioners. A cautionary obligation was literarum obligatio, and could be constituted only by a writing probative in terms of law, or holograph. Subscription of an improbative document would not suffice to bind the party unless rei interventus followed. There had been some variation in the earlier decisions, but subsequent discussions had settled the law,¹—the only doubt which remained resting upon a dictum of Mr Bell (Pr. 249, 3), that acknowledgment of subscription was good evidence of cautionary. This dictum was founded on the cases of Brown v. Campbell,* 28th November 1794, Bell's Fo. Cases, p. 115; and Sinclair v. Sinclair, 3d February 1795, Bell's Fo. Cases, p. 140, but reference to the Faculty Report and to the Session Papers, showed that they did not warrant this position; neither did the latter cases on the same subject.²

On the other hand, the pursuers, on the other hand, had abandoned their averment that the payment so made was known to the defenders, the Lord Ordinary would have felt bound to have given judgment on the point of law which would then be raised for determination. But with the facts of the case unascertained, it appeared to him expedient to pronounce judgment, and therefore he has sought, by the prefixed interlocutor, to fix the points to be proved or settled in order to prepare the case for decision. As a reclaiming note will follow, he may further explain, that had been quite clear that the mere payment to Lang of the sum in the bond subsequent to the subscription of it by the defenders, amounted to a sufficient rei interventus to remove the objection of the bond being improbative under the Act 1681, and could have pronounced a finding to that effect, and so have remitted the case for proof. He has given full consideration to the cases of Hamilton v. Wright, 22d January 1836, affirmed in the House of Lords 12th February 1838, and of John v. Grant, 28th February 1844, the authorities relied on by the pursuers. The result of these cases went on the fact of Hamilton having been the hand through which the money was paid to the primary obligant in the bond, and there was no reason to consider the position of Mr Buchan, the other co-cautioner who joined in the bond, for he being dead and unrepresented, was not sued. In the second of these cases, which related to a letter of guarantee, the decision was given by two Judges under confessed difficulty, and resting greatly on the particular circumstances of the case. The pure question, whether a bond with co-obligants, which is improbative, but the signatures admitted, became operative against the creditor simply by the loan being made to the borrower, though undoubtedly the principle is touched by the latter of these cases, seems to require consideration; it may be that the pursuers shall establish, under the proof allowed, knowledge on the part of the defenders of the bond being acted on by payment made to Lang, but as a question of a different kind would be presented for decision. The Lord Ordinary is not prepared to hold, with the defenders, that the averment of knowledge, as they argued, irrelevant, though it may be a disputable ground on which the pursuers may attempt to sustain the exception of rei interventus, as a reply to the Statute 1681."

and by other evidence, according to the nature of the transaction. If it be a loan of money, or a payment, oath of party will be admitted upon reference not to make writing formal; for the law says it is null and not suppliable, but to prove transaction, and therefore extrinsic exceptions may be added. Party may say—'I acknowledge the subscription, but I paid the debt,' or it is not resting-owing. See as observed by Durie as far back as 1633 and 1634, Dict. ii. 551. This was the irregular practice of allowing writer and witnesses to be condescended and proved, which practice had only taken place in a few instances recently in 1681.

'Condescendence thus offered might be proved in various ways, either by witness, by comparatio litterarum, or by oath. In other words, prout de jure.

'Some instances, at an earlier period, of allowing writings, signed by one party only, to be supplied by oath, Dict. ii. 553, and i. 561; but this was upon the plea that the second notary was not required in the way of solemnity, but only pro forma evidentiæ, and that the right of resiling was barred after the notary signed for the party in presence of two witnesses, and accordingly there is a decision as far down as 1739 upon this principle. Clerk, Home, 4th July 1739, Stobie v. Shiel.

'These suppletory proofs never founded in the real construction of any of the Acts. See Acts 1579 and 1593. The first proceeds on no narrative of forgery, both say that the writings otherwise executed shall bear no faith in judgment, without oath.

And by Act 1681, such suppletory proofs are expressly rejected without any mention of oath of party, comparatio litterarum, or any other mode. A writing is not probative per se, must be laid aside as a written instrument; yet in a substantiated proof it may have great weight where the existence of the transaction subject of proof, and oath of party may, in many instances, be resorted to in proof of the transaction attended always with its qualities.

Oath of party is peculiar to the law of Scotland. Party is made judge in his own cause, but acting as such, he is entitled to judge of the whole matter, and not confine his decision to a part. This attempt to restrict his oath is playing fast and loose with the law. I may have put my name inadvertently to a paper, believing it to be something else. We every day put our names to papers without reading them, having confidence in those about us. It is enough, therefore, to call on the party and say whether is this your subscription, and shall I not be allowed to add, I have entered into such a transaction, and I don't owe this man a shilling?

If the writing be probative per se it will bind me, and I must go to work by the oath. If it is not so, other proofs must be resorted to, and these must be admitted according to their own nature.

So far as to ordinary transactions; and it may be added, that the Act 1681 proceeds on no narrative of preventing forgery, but, on the contrary, supposes that a deed may be in danger from the inattention of witnesses. But the inductive force is of no consequence. The great object is to prescribe certain precise forms, the observance of which a writing shall bear faith, and without which it shall not. An entirely holograph has, by very long usage, been held as completely probative without a testing clause; and this part of the common law is recognised by Act 1669, c. 9, though thereby limited as to their endurance.

Allowing the writing itself to be proved by oath is merely to take off prejudice.

Bills of exchange and letters in re mercatoria have a particular privilege, for the sake of commerce. Other writings require to be subscribed and attested in a particular manner, if the party can write, and in another way, if he cannot write. It matters not what the form is, but if once fixed it must be observed, otherwise the law is loose and arbitrary.

See Kilk, vide Proof, p. 450, and vide Writ, p. 610, where it appears, that although this Court went wrong in 1746 and 1752, in making a groundless distinction between missive letters and other writings, the law was admitted as to these writings.

sum of money, and the sum was paid for delivery of the bond, that payment was merely completion of the transaction, and could affect only the party who received it. The case was quite different from the delivery of a cash credit bond, where the transaction was complete, though nothing were ever advanced upon the strength of it. Drawing money was something that might or might not follow upon the preceding guarantee. To constitute rei interventus more must be done than the mere completion of the transaction, and in both the cases, Hamilton and Johnstone, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, it was held that more had been done.¹

The pursuers, on a review of the whole authorities, maintained the soundness of Mr Bell's doctrine as to the sufficiency of an acknowledgement of subscription,² and farther, that they had relevantly averred rei interventus.

“ ‘ In case of heritable rights, i.e., those connected with feudal property, we are not left to ordinary rules ; for there is another and most important qualification of these rights to be attended to, viz. that writing is necessary to their constitution and that until writing is adhibited there is locus penitentiæ, however solemn the bargain may otherwise have been.

“ ‘ At all periods of the law of Scotland, certain precise forms were necessary in the conveyance or vesting of feudal property. First, the delivery of possession in presence of the pares curiæ, and entering the vassal's name in the court books of the superior. Afterwards a breve testatum, in a short and simple form, the seal standing in place of subscription, and no witnesses or writer named. Afterward other forms, by 1540, c. 117, &c.

“ ‘ But be the form what it will, it is an invariable maxim, that without this form heritage cannot pass, whether by sale, by lease, by wadset, or other lien. See Stair and Craig, and case of Redden, Dict., iii. 222.

“ ‘ Neither can any man bind himself in a bargain with respect to such right without writing. Either party may resile till the transaction be so complete. Writing, therefore, is required, not in majorem evidentiam only, but as a solemnity and as essential to constitute the right.

“ ‘ This is founded on no general principle of common law regarding consensual contracts, but upon the unalterable principles of our feudal constitution.

“ ‘ Is it enough, then, to say any writing, however imperfect, shall be received, and if there be a defect it may be aliunde supplied ? This would be a contradiction in terms. It is admitted that the defects of a seisin cannot be supplied. Neither can those of an heritable bond, a wadset right, a disposition, &c.

“ ‘ A null disposition will remain null as a writing till the end of time, and either party may resile from it while matters are entire ; but if both parties are agreed they will corroborate it. They will carry it into execution rebus ipsis et factis, homologation, &c. ; all which resolves into a different question. But here must take the question as in nudis finibus contractus. Party may admit writing, or resile from the bargain rebus integris, because the writing is null.

“ ‘ Great confusion would ensue if any other rule adopted. A conscientious man might be bound ; a dishonest man free. The heir of original party might either be or not, as he pleased. One cautioner might be bound and another free. It is admitted where third parties have int. (interest ?) ; but this is laying out of view the locus penitentiæ competent to party himself.

but they did not admit that the acts necessary to constitute it must take place between the creditor and the cautioners. The indenture bore that the money was to be advanced on the faith of the obligation, and if so given, that was a sufficient rei interventus, as possession and payment of rent was in the case of a lease. Suppose the deed here had been for payment of a set of annuities, would not payment in successive years suffice? Well, in this case, on the faith of the guarantee and the payments of interest and instalments, the pursuers had abstained from doing diligence against Lang. If the obligation were not good against the cautioners, neither could it be against the debtor, for it was equally informal as regards him. Knowledge by the party against whom rei interventus was pleaded was not necessary. It was enough to make the cautioners liable if the advance was made posterior to the subscription, or even if it was made at the time, if made on the faith of their obligation.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In support of the reclaiming notes for the defenders, it was most earnestly urged that an improbativ obligation was not supported, to any extent, by acknowledgment of the subscription of the party, in cases in which writing was necessary to constitute the obligation, and that the rei interventus averred in this case could not receive any effect, because it was only the completion of the transaction—viz. payment at the time of receiving, and in return for the exchanged writing. On the other hand, the pursuer, not only in answer to that argument, but as a substantive proposition, not excluded by an interlocutor before the case, contended that the acknowledgment of the subscription removed entirely the objection that the writing was improbativ by the law of Scotland, and entitled him to decree. No doubt the pursuer has no reclaiming note against the inter-locutor, or to that effect; but I am not prepared to say that we might not so vary the interlocutor as to find, if such were our opinions, that any proof of the rei interventus condescended on was unnecessary, just as we might, on the plea urged on by the defenders, find that the facts averred would, if proved, amount to rei interventus in the view taken by law as to the requisites to constitute proper rei interventus. But whether we could at once give effect to the argument in the plea of the pursuer, we must not only consider the point with reference to the demand of the defenders to be assoilzied on the ground contended for by them, but also because the point may enter largely into the question of the relevancy or sufficiency of the rei interventus set forth on record. And further, as the question has been elaborately argued, I think it right, if our opinions are adverse, on the point so urged, to the view of the defenders, not to leave it open to the pursuer to renew the demand for decree, if they should fail to prove the rei interventus condescended on. On these grounds I think we cannot refuse to intimate our opinion on the question, whether the acknowledgment of the subscription to an improbativ writing once removes the objection to the writing, and gives it the full effect of a probative writing, so as to be a sufficient and legal ground for decree in terms thereof. As I do not wish to commit myself, so as to preclude me from considering the question in any other case in which it might be more directly and purely raised to judgment, I do not intend at any length to consider the terms of the statute, or to analyse seriatim all the cases on the point. But I have given to them very careful attention. It is important to compare the different reports of some of the cases, as matters very material, in my opinion, appear in some reports, which cannot be gathered from other reports of the same case. The consideration of the cases leads to the conclusion—1. That if the subscription is acknowledged, the party granter of the deed is not at once entitled to absolvitor if the other party can prove that the deed is not entire. 2. That, on the other hand, the acknowledgment of the subscription does not remove the objection to the writing as improbativ by the law of Scotland, so as to entitle the party to whom it was given to judgment against the granter, in the same manner as if duly executed. As to both propositions, I have in view cases in which writing is essential to establish the obligation. I am further of opinion, as the result of all the authorities, that a cautionary obli-

No. 100. Feb. 12, 1857. Church of England Life and Fire Assurance Co. v. Hodges. gation not in a proper re mercatoria is, to use the legal term always employed by Sir Ilay Campbell, strictly literarum obligatio, to be constituted by, or, perhaps, to speak more correctly, to be contained in, and evidenced by a deed executed with the solemnities of the statute. The conclusion which arises from all the cases is, that if the action is laid on the informal document alone, matters remaining in iudicio finibus contractus, and not also on facts taking place on the faith of the document, effect cannot be given to the document as per se a ground of judgment, although the defender should acknowledge his subscription.

I take the note of Sir Ilay Campbell in the case of Brown—(quoted above, p. 417).

He ends his note with saying, that the case of Edmonstone was wrong decided, and in the report he is made to say that he did not know the case, and it seemed to him to be wrong. That seems to produce some confusion on the general point, but is cleared up by this, that in the papers in the case before him, the Ordinary's interlocutor in the case of Edmonstone is quoted, which bore, incorrectly, as it appears, that the tenant had entered into possession on the faith of an improbative missive. Believing that to be the case, Sir Ilay Campbell thought the judgment altering the Ordinary's interlocutor wrong; but the Court altered, because that was a mistake as to the facts, for there was no such rei interventus. Hence the case of Edmonstone is in perfect harmony with all the cases, and proceeded on the new principle stated in the above note of Sir Ilay Campbell. The more the facts of the various cases are considered, it is very clear to my mind that there is not one case in which judgment has ever been given on the improbative writing against the party subscribing, merely in respect of his acknowledgment of the subscription, but the class of cases in which writing is essential, without the occurrence of after facts which, in the judgment of the Court, amounted, in the whole circumstances of the case, and from the peculiar nature of the transaction or agreement, to be rei interventus, so that matters were not entire; but things had been done and fulfilled, had taken effect in reliance on the improbative writing. In some cases the facts held to be properly rei interventus may to us appear slight; but we do not know that we have all the materials which the Court had for deciding that point. But the Court did proceed on the ground that matters were not entire, that is sufficient. And I do not believe that any one can be cited in which that was not, in truth, the sole ground of judgment. Sir Ilay Campbell's note clears away at once the argument raised on the report of the case of Brown. The case of Sinclair—not intelligibly reported—also went on specialties respecting the alleged rei interventus. In the case of Brebner, Mr Penney stated that there was no rei interventus whatever. I sent for Sir Ilay Campbell's Session papers, and on them there is the following note (which I omitted to read during the argument), which shows that, right or wrong, the Court went entirely on the facts which had taken place on the faith of the improbative missive.

“ Obligation of relief.

“ Matter not entire.

“ Case of heritable rights stands on different footing.”

Some doubt was cast on the case of the Dunmore Coal Company, owing, I think, to the loose way in which the judgment is noted in the report, in which the interlocutor is not quoted; but there is a very full note of that case in Lord President Hope's note-book, which distinguishes the case from that of Bill's Creditors v. Dunbar Hutchison, 14th June 1810, in the same Division, and which shows that the principle was held to be fixed, that if there is not proper rei interventus the acknowledgment of the subscription is of no avail.

“ Informal letter of cautionry.

“ Matthew Young was constituted manager of the Dunmore Coal Company. The contract was scrolled, and revised and signed by the parties, and also by Andrew Young, father of Matthew, as cautioner for his intromissions; but it never extended or duly executed. Matthew, however, entered on his office. After some time the company say that they discovered he had been guilty of many malpractices, especially putting the company firm to bills for his own use, and that one L.465 was then in the circle.

“ They arrested him as in meditationes fugæ, but his father interponed, and following proceeding took place. A state of accounts was made out, making a balance of L.470 due by Matthew, besides the bill for L.465. To this state is sub-joined a minute holograph of Matthew, but signed not only by him, but by Andrew, binding them to pay the balance by instalments, and to retire the bill. In consequence of this minute Matthew was discharged out of the messenger's custody.

Hodges.

"Being pursued on this minute, Matthew pleads that the books are before an accountant, and till his report comes in it cannot be known whether any balance is due.

"Andrew not only founds on this plea, but also on the informality of the missive.

"The Lord Ordinary has taken cause to report.

"Mmissive certainly not probative of itself, and will not go back on principle laid down in Paterson v. Wright, and Bill v. Hutchison Dunbar; but said, has been rei interventus.

"In Dunbar's case it was only alleged I might have been arrested, or I might have taken some other step.

"But the Court disregarded this as too remote a consequence. That could be alleged in every case, and would validate every cautionary obligation. But here there was an actual warrant for imprisonment. Debtor has obtained a benefit—immediate liberation—which might be to him and his father worth thousands. It is true that all they could have compelled Matthew to grant under the warrant was caution judicio sisti.

"But as Andrew chose voluntarily to grant more, and Matthew reaped the benefit of that obligation, it seems to be a sufficient rei interventus to support the writing.

"Therefore incline to sustain it, but will hear my brethren."

The decision is not given in an intelligent form in the Fac. Report. The reporter's note on the Session papers is distinct—"Find writing effectual on ground of rei interventus." The interlocutor, which I got from the Register House, is as follows:—

"Edinburgh, 1st February 1811.—On report of Lord Meadowbank, and having advised the mutual memorials for the parties, the Lords repel the defences, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit to the Auditor to examine the same, and report."

The defences for the cautioner Andrew Young were founded chiefly on the plea, that the deed not being executed in terms of law could not receive effect.

I hold, therefore, that there is no authority for the doctrine that the action ought to be dismissed on the ground taken by the defenders, and as little authority in support of the plea of the pursuer, that the acknowledgment of the subscription entitles the pursuer to judgment without proof of the occurrence of any facts having taken place on the faith of the improbative missive. I have been the more anxious to state my decided opinion on that point, because the third proposition stated by Mr Bell on this subject, 248-9, on which Mr Penney relied, is stated in too broad and absolute terms.

The examination of the cases leads to the conclusion, that from the case of Fogo downwards, there has not been a single case in which the judgment has not been founded on facts which, in the opinion of the Court, amounted to rei interventus. I have only to add my hope that the report will contain the notes I have referred to in some of the cases mentioned, especially that long and most instructive note of Mr Hay Campbell, which happens to be the longest record that I know of the opinion of that great lawyer on any subject.

Then we are brought to the question—have facts been averred, which, if proved, will in this case amount to rei interventus? I will not enter at present into the discussion of the point of controversy between the Dean of Faculty and Mr Penney, whether what was termed the fulfilment of counter part of the obligation in return for, and in consideration of receiving the imperfect writing, such as payment across the table, or the deed is signed, is rei interventus. There may or may not be difficulty on that point in the abstract. But the actual facts in the particular case give it a complete and marked character to the act of fulfilment. In this case the writing bears payment at the date of subscription, and the receipt also, yet that the deed was sent to London, and the money afterwards remitted in reliance on this obligation. That it is quite competent to prove that the money was paid after the date of the obligation, although the writing bore that the money had been paid, the case of Grant v. Johnstone fully shows. I allude in particular to the second report of that case after the verdict.

We are not called upon at present to say whether the facts averred will positively amount to rei interventus, for the details may very much affect the character of the facts so averred. Therefore, I only say that enough is averred to go to proof. Neither do I at present enter into the question—whether the knowledge of the cautioner that anything had been done on the faith of the improbativ writing, is necessary in order to make out rei interventus. In many cases it may not be of any importance. But this I think is clear, viz., that the cautioner's knowledge of what is to be done, and of what has been done, may give to facts the undoubted character of rei interventus, and of his adoption of the transaction in circumstances in which it might be doubtful whether the facts otherwise amounted to rei interventus. Hence, I think, the amount of knowledge in this case is important. I give no opinion as to whether the repayment of certain instalments of the original advance is or is not rei interventus. The case of Bill shows that the allegation that the party abstained from diligence on the faith of the writing, cannot be regarded by itself as any rei interventus, unless the writing should stipulate for the forbearance of diligence as the object to be obtained by the obligation in the improbativ writing.

But then I must add, that I wish the Court to have the opportunity of considering all the details of the facts. In the case of Grant, there was the simple fact of the advance of money being made after the cautioner had armed the bank's cautioner with the document, and that case seemed well adapted for a jury. But even in that case the examination of the actual facts, as exhibited on the Judge's notes, came to be important. Now, in the shape in which the Lord Ordinary proposes to put the case, the Court would have certain dry and naked findings in point of fact from the Lord Ordinary, the terms of which might, in fact, decide or exclude the questions of law which arise as to the sufficiency of the facts to establish rei interventus. That is a mixed question of law and fact, which ought either to arise at a trial, or on evidence taken on commission. And I am not disposed to put the case into a shape by which the Court is to part with that question, and to take the judgment of the Lord Ordinary as final.

LORD MURRAY.—I consider this case is of great importance. Indeed it is of the utmost importance to persons in England or Scotland to know what the law is on this point. This case comes to us in a different form from any other that has yet occurred. It is an advance of money by an insurance company to certain persons in Glasgow, and the deed is in the English form. A Mr J. Leitch Lang is the first party, the defenders are the second, and the third party is certain persons residing in England. The deed appears very regular, and may be an excellent one, according to the law of England; but the plea is taken that it is insufficient in Scotland through neglect of the Act 1681, c. 5. Upon this point your Lordship has given an opinion that this is not a good deed. Now I am very unwilling to give a decided opinion on that point, though I am far from dissenting from anything your Lordship has said. I had some difficulties, which have been partly dispersed by the remarks which your Lordship has made.

I agree that there ought to be a proof in this case, which is the great question immediately before us. I feel greatly indebted for the trouble taken by your Lordship, and the research made into the authorities. It is a very nice question, and one that requires deliberate consideration. If there is to be an amalgamation of the laws of the two countries, certainly there is no case where it is more desirable than in the case of deeds, on the faith of which advances are made. I think we should allow a proof before answer of all that has taken place.

LORD COWAN.—The Lord Ordinary has not disposed of any of the pleas urged by either party in the record, but has allowed proof, before answer, regarding certain facts on which the pursuers rely as affording, rei interventus, a good answer to the objection taken by the defenders to the sufficiency of the written obligation libelled to support the action.

Against this interlocutor the defenders reclaim, maintaining, (1.) that a cautionary obligation,—subject to certain exceptions, to which this case does not belong,— can be constituted only by a probative writing, and that the mere acknowledgment of the subscription does not make the document in itself actionable; and, (2.) that the facts alleged and admitted to probation are not relevant to support the plea of rei interventus. No. 100.

and Fire Assurance Co. v.
Hodges.

In answer the pursuers have pleaded, that, as the defenders admit their subscription to the indenture or bond constituting the obligation, this is sufficient to support the writing as an actionable document of debt; but, at any rate, that the facts, of which they are willing to undertake the proof, do amount to rei interventus sufficient in law to obviate the objection to the probativeness of the writing libelled. As no reclaiming note has been presented by the pursuers, the general plea urged by them is not properly before the Court for decision in hoc statu; unless, indeed, we were prepared to say that the facts alleged do not amount to rei interventus, supposing the admission of the subscription to the bond insufficient to support the action. In that case our decision would require to embrace the conflicting views in law which have been so elaborately argued.

Assuming the Court to hold that the facts proposed to be inquired into are such as present, prima facie, at least, a case of relevant averment of rei interventus,—it is perhaps unnecessary to express any opinion on the more general point; but having gone over the decisions that were referred to, with care and anxiety, I may say, that I cannot hold the argument submitted by the pursuers to be by any means satisfactory. The opinion which I have formed is rather this;—that, so long as things are entire, the cautioner, who is not bound by a probative written obligation, is not bound at all, so that no action will lie against him on the document although his subscription to it be acknowledged or proved. This appears, indeed, to be merely a corollary from the more general proposition, that there is, as regards contracts which require writing for their constitution, locus pœnitentiæ dum res sunt integras.

The passage from Mr Bell, on which reliance was placed by the pursuer, is certainly entitled to great respect. He says (Pr. 249, s. 3)—“A writing of which the subscription is acknowledged is good evidence of cautionry.” The decisions cited in support of this doctrine are those of Brown, 1794, and Sinclair, 1795, both reported in Bell’s Fol. Cases. Now, in both, there were facts implying rei interventus, and, consequently, rendering their authority unavailing on the general question regarding the legal efficacy per se of the improbative document. This is manifest on the face of the report of Sinclair; but the same is true of Brown, though the observations stated to have been made by the bench seem to proceed on a different footing. The facts are stated in the report thus, after citing the improbative letter:—“This letter was not written by the defender, but he signed it along with the Scotts; and on the day after the date of this letter, Thomas Brown did subscribe the bond of caution, and the defender signs as attestor,” and this peculiarity of the case is clearly brought out in the report of the decision in the F.C., and in the D., p. 17,058. There was thus an acting on the faith of the improbative writing, and so the Lord President (Campbell) says in his note:—“If matters stood in nudis finibus contractus, and the action was laid upon the writing alone, such action could not be maintained, that writing being improbative. But here the action is laid upon the fact, which admits of being proved prout de jure, or at least (if not by witnesses), certainly by oath of party, viz., that in consequence of the defender’s interference, and granting his letter of relief, the pursuer became cautioner in the suspension, and was obliged to pay the debt.”

Further, that this was the view taken of the decision at the time appears in the report in Hume, of Balfour v. Thomson, 8th March 1806, p. 94-5,—in itself an instructive enough case, although not directly applicable to the present. The claim against the cautioner was on an informal missive subscribed by him, but neither holograph nor tested. The Court decided against his plea founded on the informality in respect of rei interventus. On the part of the cautioner, it is noted by Mr Hume, reference was made to the case of Edmonstone v. Lang, 23d June 1786; while the defender cited in reply the later cases of Brown v. Campbell, 1794; McMillan v. Anderson, 16th February 1802; Brebner v. Freeland, 18th January 1803; and some others, which (he said) had finally and equitably settled it, that the objection of informality is obviated rei interventu; and he maintained that, in this instance, although the sale had been previously made, there was a subsequent

No. 100. and substantial rei interventus by the delivery of the grain on the faith of the missive.

Feb. 12, 1857. This statement of the law is in accordance with the note of Sir Hay Campbell in the case of Brown. Then the prior cases of Wallace, 1782, Walker, 1785, and Edmonstone, 1786, all recognise the rule that cautionary, in the words of Mr Bell, is proveable only by writing, duly executed according to the requisites of the statutes, or recognised as a privileged writ—subject to exceptions which do not here apply. This may be adverse to the case of Fogo, 1746, in one view of that decision; but the inconsistency between it and those later decisions lies not so much in the principle of judgment as in holding missives not within the provision of the statute 1681. There is no intermediate adverse decisions, because it is plain that the case of Henderson, 1765, was one of rei interventus, viz., signing bills on the faith of the informal letter of relief, and it is so treated in subsequent cases. As regards the alleged change in the course of practice after the case of Edmonstone, 1786, I find no trace of it except in the fluctuating opinions of some of the Judges, and in the palpable inaccuracy and incompleteness of the notes taken of those opinions. In truth the element of rei interventus in the cases may explain many inconsistencies. For, after carefully examining the decisions which were relied on in the argument in proof of this change, I have become quite satisfied that there was in all of them what the Court, in sustaining the informal writ, held or might have holden to amount to rei interventus. The cases of Brown, of Sinclair, of Balfour, of Brebner, of Dunmore Coal Company, and of M'Neill, and all the other cases reported by Mr Hume, are of that description. The only exception is the case of Bill's Creditors in 1810; and in that case the principle was enforced, because there was no interventus rei. On this branch of the argument, therefore, I am of opinion that the defenders are right in their view of the law, and that the case of the pursuers cannot be maintained on the informal missive.

The real point in dispute comes to be, whether there be room in the facts of this case, as averred in the record, for the plea of rei interventus.

A great deal was said in the argument, that to admit this plea on such averments would be virtually to set aside the statute 1681. This, in the same sense, might be said of every case of the kind. But the truth is, that the remark is based on an erroneous view altogether. The effect of rei interventus is not to validate the imperfect writing, and to set it up as per se a document of debt. The Act 1681 has its full operation in rendering the writing incapable, by itself, either of being the foundation of diligence, or of supporting an action. The rei interventus must be established before the objection of improbateness is obviated. Being established, then, the informal writing is good evidence of the agreement, and the creditor under it will obtain decree in implement of it. But he could not do summary diligence on the informal document, nor could it be made, like a probative personal bond, the foundation of direct adjudication of the debtor's heritable estate, without being preceded by decree of constitution. To say, therefore, that the Act 1681 is virtually set aside by this plea, is to mistake its nature and effect. It is a good answer to the objection of improbateness, and makes the informal writing good evidence of the contract. This, in substance, is its effect, when it is applicable and can be pleaded, and no more.

The question then, is, whether the facts alleged by the pursuers, and offered to be proved, are sufficient to make out rei interventus? And as to this I am very clear that there exists no good ground for holding the averments so insufficient and irrelevant as to justify the recall of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor remitting them to probation before answer.

The case, in itself, and as stated in the record, is very peculiar. The pursuers carry on business in London, in life and fire assurance and annuities. On the security of a policy opened with them by James Leitch Lang, and on the further security of the defenders, an advance of L.800 was agreed to be made by them to Lang as the principal obligant. An indenture or bond was accordingly prepared at London in the English form, and transmitted to Glasgow, the residence of the defenders. It was sent by the secretary of this English company to Robert Baird, writer there, the agent in that city for the pursuers. The indenture was executed in the English form on 27th October 1852, and was retransmitted on the same day to the pursuers. Their secretary, on 1st November, made the necessary remittance through

Mr Baird; and on 3d November J. Leitch Lang acknowledged receipt of that remittance. Such are the allegations in articles 8 and 9 of the condescendence, which the pursuers undertake to prove; and in addition thereto, they aver and offer to instruct knowledge on the part of the defenders, that the money was received by the principal debtor on the faith, and in respect of the deed of indenture or bond. Can these facts, if proved, be held altogether irrelevant in a question of rei interventus? I am by no means of that mind.

Church of England Life and Fire Assurance Co. v.
Hodges.

No question has been stirred regarding the validity of this English deed in such a transaction as this. The nature of Mr Baird's agency in Glasgow, even, has not been explained on the record. The transaction is taken as a Scotch transaction, and must be so dealt with. Had the transaction been carried through entirely in England, and had also England been the locus solutionis, there might have been room for holding compliance with the Act 1681 not requisite for a deed in the English form, though executed in Scotland, especially if there was no Scotch agency of the company. But I take the deed, as the pursuers themselves have done, to be invalid and informal as a written document of debt by the law of Scotland. Still the specialties of the transaction are very material, as regards the point of rei interventus. This bond in the English form, according to the statements of the pursuers, is sent down from London for execution in Glasgow. It is executed by the defenders in the English form, with the view of its transmission to London, to be there acted on by the pursuers. In reliance on the English deed thus transmitted to them, the money is remitted to Glasgow, and paid over, in terms of the bond, to the principal obligant. And this is done in the knowledge of the defenders, his cautioners. I can scarcely figure a stronger set of facts deserving of consideration in a case of rei interventus, unless the broad proposition which was contended for by the defenders can be entertained, that in no case can implement or completion of the original transaction, even after an interval from the date of execution, in the case of a money obligation, be held in law ground to support the plea.

Were that proposition true in its absolute form, and not confined to money bonds, I shall only say I think that most of the cases in the books under this category must be held to have been erroneously decided. Take as examples the case of Henderson, where the subscription of bills instantly followed the granting of the obligation of relief; or that of Brown v. Campbell, 1794, where the letter of relief was immediately followed by the subscription of the bond of caution, by the party in whose favour the informal missive of relief was granted; or Balfour v. Thomson, 1806, in which delivery of the subject purchased followed immediately on receipt of the informal obligation of cautionry; or those cases already cited, where the liberation of the debtor followed the cautioner's obligation. All these were in implement of the original obligation, and nothing followed but the completion or fulfilment of the contemplated transaction. That the cautionary obligation was not in the same writing as the obligation come under by the principal, cannot affect the question. That that has generally happened is true. But if, on the creditor refusing to transact with the principal on his own credit, he gets a cautioner to subscribe the informal writing along with him, and then gets the transaction carried through,—the same principles are certainly applicable as would have been, had the debtor granted a separate obligation, and then obtained the cautioner's informal obligation, and so got the contract carried through.

It seems to me that the matter of fact which the Lord Ordinary has remitted for proof may—I do not go further—raise precisely such a state of circumstances as are represented by Professor Bell in his Principles, p. 26, to be the foundation of the plea.

I am sensible of the difference caused by this being a money obligation, and of the difficulty on that point which your Lordship seems to have felt in the case of Grant v. Johnstone. It is not necessary at present that this should be disposed of, as we are all of opinion that there should be in the first place inquiry into the facts; and I can very well imagine that such a state of circumstances may be brought out by the proof as to render the peculiarity of little moment. All I shall say, therefore, is, that, according to my present views, I think it ought not to be an obstacle in the way of that course of procedure being adopted which is contemplated by the Court.

Altogether, I am clear for refusing this reclaiming note.

No. 100. LORD WOOD absent.

Wood.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against; but, of new, find that facts are averred on the record which it is important to send to proof before answer; and therefore allow the pursuers to prove before answer the facts averred by them on record, and allow the defenders a conjunct probation; and find the proof ought to proceed by commission: Appoint Mr A. T. Boyle, advocate, commissioner; and grant diligence to both parties to obtain such documents and writings as may seem to bear on the said facts, with power to the commissioner to call for any writings which he thinks material for the information of the Court; reserving all questions of expenses."

No. 101. GEORGE WOOD (Wordsworth's Factor), Petitioner.—Young.

Factor loco tutoris—Power to borrow.—A factor loco tutoris obtained special powers to sell heritage greatly affected by debts. He was unsuccessful in effecting a sale; but being of opinion that the property was worth the upset price, and a creditor being about to adjudge the property,—Power granted to the factor to borrow a sum sufficient to pay off the debts.

The petitioner was factor loco tutoris appointed to the children of the late Samuel Wordsworth, and on 6th March 1856 obtained special power to sell certain heritage, for the purpose of paying off various heritable and personal debts affecting the estate. The present application set forth that, in terms of the authority then granted to him, the factor "immediately advertised Drumbank house and stabling for sale, and also the property at Nottingham Place, at the upset prices fixed by the Court. As stated in the report made to the Accountant, the Drumbank property was sold, but no offer was obtained for the Nottingham Place property, and the factor considered it more beneficial for the interest of the pupil-heir that a sum should be borrowed to pay off the debts, rather than apply to the Court for authority to reduce the upset price. In the factor's own opinion, and that of other parties, he considers the Nottingham Place property worth the upset price, viz. L.6000. That property yields an annual rental of L.455, 7s. 6d., and is only burdened with a feu-duty of L.34, 6s. 3d."

The present application was for powers to borrow a sum of L.5000. There was already a sum of L.3298 heritably secured over the property falling under the factor's management. This security was in existence at the death of the late Mr Wordsworth. Out of the L.5000 to be borrowed, the factor proposed to pay off the present heritable debts, and to grant an heritable security over the whole property under his management. In this way there would only be one heritable creditor; and the party who was to give the loan had agreed to allow it to remain as long as it might be required, while the interest was regularly paid up.

The Lord Ordinary reported the case on 21st November 1856, when the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, on report of Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary, allow this case to stand over, in respect of the case of Maconochie, Graham's factor, now before the whole Court."

A note was now lodged by the factor, stating that since that date the principal personal creditor had raised an action, and obtained decree for L.3000 against the factor, "and may now proceed to adjudge the property, by which a large amount of expenses will be incurred, and the interests of the pupil thereby seriously injured. If the powers craved were granted to borrow a sum of L.5000, the estate would be preserved for behoof of the heir. The annual rental of the whole property under the factor's management is about L.694, 7s. 6d., subject to an annual feu-duty of L.43, 17s. 3d. The deceased Mr Wordsworth, by his contract of marriage, bound himself to pay an annuity of L.100 per year to his widow. If authority was granted to the factor to borrow the L.5000, the only burdens on the estate would be the interest on that sum, and the annuity to the deceased's widow." He therefore prayed the Court to resume consideration of the case, and grant powers to borrow the sum of L.5000.

LORD DEAS.—I have no objection to concur in granting this application, in the special circumstances that the creditor is about to adjudge the property. The whole of this case, from beginning to end, is a very peculiar one, and the Court, as I understand, go entirely on these special circumstances.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Undoubtedly—as creating a necessity.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, on report of Lord Mackenzie, Grant special powers to the factor to borrow the sum of L.5000, and to grant a bond and disposition in security therefor, containing all usual and necessary clauses, over the property under his charge, as prayed for; and decern ad interim."

Factor loco tutoris—Special powers to sell and make up titles.—Authority granted to a factor loco tutoris to make up titles in the person of a pupil with the view of carrying through a sale of heritage belonging to the pupil—the negotiations for the sale having been begun and all but completed during the lifetime of the pupil's father.

THE late Mr Gloag of Perth had been in treaty with the Bank of Scotland for the sale by him to the Bank of certain house property. Before the transaction was completed Mr Gloag died, leaving an only son, a pupil, to whom the petitioner was appointed factor loco tutoris. This petition stated that the Bank were still willing to carry through the purchase, on the footing that a title to the property should be made under the authority of the Court in the person of the pupil by the petitioner; and that, under the farther authority of the Court, the property should be thereafter conveyed by the petitioner to the Bank, on the Bank paying to him the price arranged with the deceased.

The petition farther stated, that before Mr Gloag's death, the negotiations had resulted in the Bank making, and Mr Gloag accepting, an offer for the property of L.560: that the property was very old, and could not be permanently improved by any ordinary repairs, but would require to be wholly taken down and remodelled: that the present income of the pupil was barely adequate for his proper aliment and education, consisting solely of the return from that property. The petitioner, therefore, craved special powers to make up titles in the person of the pupil, to enable him to carry through the sale, which he considered would be most advantageous to the pupil, and beneficial to his estate.

On the report of the Lord Ordinary, whose opinion was also favourable to the powers craved for being granted, LORD PRESIDENT.—At the present stage, we can only grant the power to make up titles, and remit to the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS.—I can only concur in this petition being granted on the footing that the property was substantially sold during the father's lifetime.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"On report of Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary, grant authority to the petitioner to complete a feudal title to the said property in the person of the pupil, Statutes 4 Geo. In a petition for disentail, the three consenting heirs were stated to be resident in America. They had been born there. They were the son and grandsons of a Thomas Stewart of Orkney, a natural born subject of Great Britain, who had emigrated to America, and the question was whether their consents were valid.

The Lord Ordinary remitted to Mr Ross, S.S.C., who reported that had Stewart emigrated and been a citizen of the States, and continued as such at the period of the treaty of independence in 1783, whereby the allegiance of American citizens to the Sovereign of Great Britain was dissevered, "it is apprehended that, upon the authority of the case of Dundas,¹ he and his children would have become aliens, and incapable of succeeding to heritage in Scotland; and if so, it is apprehended the said Archibald Douglas Stewart the elder and his two sons could not now be viewed as heirs of entail entitled to succeed to the said entailed estate of Brugh. Upon inquiry, however, the Reporter has ascertained, from family documents exhibited to him by the petitioner's agent, that the said deceased Thomas Stewart did not emigrate to America before the year 1802, and although he died there, his allegiance to the Sovereign of this country still continued, and consequently his children and grandchildren appear entitled to all the privileges of natural born subjects, in virtue of the statutes 4 George II, chap. 21, and 13 George III. chap. 21." The Lord Ordinary now reported the case, stating at same time that he had himself examined the documents referred to in the report and was satisfied that this person had not gone to America till 1802.

THE COURT therefore approved of the draft deed of disentail.

Ship—Bankruptcy—Arrestment ad fund. jur.—Act 17 & 18 Vict. cap. 104 (Merchant Shipping Act)—Partnership.—Held (in accordance with a majority of both Divisions, diss. Lord Deas), that under the Merchant Shipping Act a certificate of registry is such prima facie evidence of title to a ship, that the registered owners are entitled to unconditional recall of arrestments used by creditors of the former owners of the ship—such arresters averring and offering to prove that the transaction by which the ship was transferred to such registered owners was fraudulent and collusive. In this case the ship belonged to Nova Scotia, and was arrested at Leitrim while under the registry of the debtor. A transfer had been effected by him at Halifax after she had sailed, but before the date of the arrestments. At the date of the arrestments the transfer had not been intimated.

Observed, per Lord Deas, that the circumstances of this case were prima facie not favourable to the supposition of a bona fide transfer of the ship, the bill of sale being dated on the very day that the granter of it, and the company of which he was a partner, stopped payment. No. 104.

THE petitioners, Duffus and Lawson, were merchants in Halifax, Nova Scotia, and were represented in this action by their mandatories, T. and W. Campbell and Company, of Glasgow. This petition stated that Duffus and Lawson were joint registered owners of the barque "Ermina," of Halifax, now lying dismantled in the port of Leith. A certificate of registry was produced, bearing date "12th Sept. 1856—3½ p.m.," but the petitioners alleged that they had acquired the vessel about a month previously. They stated, that on 22d August 1856, the "Ermina" sailed from Richmond, in the United States, for Leith, where she arrived on 6th October 1856; but that, on her arrival, she was arrested ad fundandam jurisdictionem by trading firms in Liverpool and Glasgow. These arrestments were used by A. F. and D. Mackay, of Liverpool, and by other firms, as against the firm of J. E. Greenwood and Company of Liverpool—and John Edward Greenwood, the only partner in this country of that firm, and Simon Fitch Barss, and Daniel Kirkland Harris, merchants and shipowners in Halifax, Nova Scotia, also alleged partners of J. E. Greenwood and Company of Liverpool. The petitioners now prayed for recall of these arrestments. "They owed no sum to any of the arresters, but the arrestments had been used apparently in the belief that the vessel and freight were the property of J. E. Greenwood and Company of Liverpool, or Barss and Harris of Halifax, or of the individual partners of these firms, whereas the fact was, as above stated, that the petitioners became the registered proprietors of the vessel in August 1856." The petition was presented without caution.

Answers were lodged by the arresters. They denied that the petitioners were proprietors of the vessel. They set forth various debts for which decree had been obtained by them against the firm of Greenwood and Company; and they averred, that when these debts were incurred by J. E. Greenwood and Company, "the said Simon F. Barss and Daniel K. Harris were partners of the said company; and when the respective arrestments were used, the barque 'Ermina' was the property of the said company, or of the said Simon F. Barss and Daniel K. Harris, or one or other of them, and liable to be attached for the debts of the company, which suspended payment on or about the 6th day of September last. On learning that the vessel had arrived at Leith, the respondents were, in these circumstances, under the necessity of having recourse to the foresaid arrestments to secure payment of their respective debts." The answers also contained the following averments:—"It does not seem to be disputed by the petitioners that the said vessel was at one time the property of the firm of J. E. Greenwood and Company, or of one or other of the individual partners of that firm; but it is said that the petitioners are now the owners of the vessel, and that it became their property in the month of August last. Of this the petitioners have not produced any evidence. No bill of sale has been produced, and the pretended certificate of registry is not evidence of ownership. It is not framed in conformity with the requirements of the statute 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, by which all such matters are now regulated; and even if it had been so framed, and were proved to be a true certificate of what it purported to contain, it would be altogether insufficient of itself to prove that any transfer of the ship had been effected in favour of the petitioners.—Scott and Gifford v. Kerr, November 25, 1853.

Not only, however, has there been no bill of sale, or other legal evidence of the transfer produced, but it is averred that no such evidence exists, as no transfer of the ship was ever effected in favour of the petitioners. The vessel was not the sole property of Simon F. Barss, and he had no title to sell or assign, a transfer thereof. But further, if any bill of sale or deed of transfer passed between the parties, it was not a bona fide transfer for

The petitioner Mr Duffus stands in the relation of father-in-law to Mr Harris, and neither he nor Mr Lawson were creditors of the company." At 6th October, the date of the arrestments, the change of registry had not been communicated to the captain. This petition was not presented till 18th November, by which time the new certificate of registry had been transmitted. The transfer did not bear to include the freight, and it was not alleged that it did so.

Duffus and
Lawson v.
Mackay and
Others.

On 23d January 1857, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—
"In respect that the Judges of this Division of the Court are equally divided in opinion, direct this cause to be judged by the Inner-House Judges of both Divisions; and appoint the same to be heard, by one counsel on each side, before the Judges of this Division, with the addition of three Judges of the other Division of the Court."

The case was heard on 7th February. The petitioners pleaded;—That little harm could result, in ordinary circumstances, from arresting a debtor's funds in the hands of a third party, more especially if that third party did not hold any property of the alleged debtor, for the arrestment attached no specific subject, but merely the funds, if any, in the custody of that person. But it was very different with regard to a ship. Arrestment of a ship partook more of the nature of poinding. It was not followed out by a forthcoming, but by action and decree of sale, and the sale was immediate. It attached the subject, and laid a nexus upon it, and the right of ownership was at once transferred. For that reason, the proceedings must be rigidly scrutinised. Here the petitioners were not stated to be debtors of these arresters. There was not even a prima facie case here to the effect that this ship was truly the property, not of the petitioners, but of the debtors of these arresters. Nor could there be, for Duffus and Lawson were registered owners, and that of itself was sufficient to entitle them to have these arrestments recalled. Under the Merchant Shipping Act,¹ a ship could not be dealt with without a written title. The person entered in the register was so much owner that a vendition by him to a third party—the transaction being in good faith—would be good, and a reduction would not deprive that third party of his property. In a word, the registered owners were the owners of the ship. It must therefore be held prima facie that Duffus and Lawson were owners.

But it was said that the registry was not sufficient to prove their title—that the bill of sale must be looked at, and that the bill was informal. But in a summary proceeding the registry was conclusive, and it was incompetent to go to its acts and warrants. But the bill itself was unobjectionable. It bore to be executed "in the presence of J. W. Ritchie." The objection was, that this witness was not described: also, that the body of the deed was not in conformity to the statutory form. Admittedly, the body of the deed was not in strict conformity to schedule E of the Act, but section 90 empowered the Board of Trade to alter the forms, and this bill of lading was in strict conformity with the form issued by the Board of Trade. Such a document was not intended to be filled up by lawyers but by merchants and it would be too rigid to hold that such a critical objection as this would render the bill null, and all that had followed on it. On the contrary, the object of the Commissioners was to relieve the public of forms which were found to be inconvenient. This bill of sale had been received by the Registrar in England as a good bill of sale. Farther, bills of sale, such as this, were daily received by the custom-house officers in Glasgow, Liverpool, and London, although the witnesses were not designed. They were received a not liable to any defect.¹ But none of these documents could be got at till the certificate of registry was cut down. It was prima facie evidence, and could only be cut down in a proper rescissory action. The presumption could not be overcome in a summary process.² Therefore the arrestments were incompetent, and ought to be recalled.

Pleaded for the arresters;—This vessel was originally part of the stock of Greenwood and Company, and was registered in the name of Barss, a partner of Greenwood and Company, and debtor of the arresters. Unless there was proper evidence that the vessel had properly passed out of his ownership, she was arrestable by his creditors. The petitioners averred that she had so passed out of his ownership by virtue of an onerous contract of sale on 14th August 1856, and that they registered the transfer on 12th September 1856. The arresters averred, and were prepared to prove, that there was no such onerous sale—that the whole proceeding was collusive, and an intended fraud on the part of Greenwood and Company, and that in place of there being a sale on 14th August, there was in reality an assignation in trust for certain favoured creditors, made no doubt on 14th August, but being the day also which the arresters were prepared to prove was the date of the bankruptcy of these people. There was nothing to prevent the arresters proving these statements, or to compel the Court at once to recall these arrestments, and so let these parties take the vessel out of the jurisdiction of the Court. Nor were the documents founded on by the petitioners in terms of the Act. Therefore the Court could give no effect to them. But supposing them to be unexceptionable, the Registry Act did not bar the arresters from impugning them. The Registry Act had not in view to regulate the private title of proprietors but the privileges of vessels, and the certificate of registry was not conclusive evidence of ownership—neither on principle nor authority—so as to warrant the Court to declare the mere production of it a sufficient title in a disputed transaction. It would lead to the greatest injustice even if held prima facie evidence of ownership, for it would enable a party easily to defeat the rights of creditors where a transaction was most collusive. There was no declaration in the Act that such a certificate should be prima facie proof of ownership. It was only prima facie evidence of registration.³ The petitioners had no case unless they could shew that the ownership of the vessel had been competently and effectually taken out of the hands of the original owner.⁴ The bill of sale must be in terms of schedule E of the Act. The words of the Act were imperative. It must be executed in presence of, and be attested by one or more witnesses.

But it was said that the Commissioners had power to alter this, and so had issued a form in accordance with which this bill of sale was executed. There had been an intentional alteration by the Commissioners of the schedule, requiring that the residence and description of the witness should be inserted. Section 96 first directs the Commissioners to issue forms in accordance with the statutory schedule, and second, to make alterations with consent of the Board of Trade, and after due public notice. This form was issued under the first duty imposed on the Commissioners as a statutory schedule. It was issued in April, the statute took effect in May, and this schedule had been acted on ever since. The statutory requisition contained in the schedule, requiring the description and place of residence of the witnesses to be inserted, was not inserted in the form. But why? not because the Commissioners intended that the description and place of residence of the witness should be omitted, but because in the blank the actual description and place of residence itself were to be inserted. It would be absurd to say that the statutory directions were to be inserted in that blank, which was left, not for the direction, but for the description itself. And so with other details—e. g. the word “signed,” was not in this blank, because the signature itself was to be there; but it might just as well be maintained, that because the statutory direction to sign was not there, that therefore the Commissioners had done away with the necessity of a signature. This was a mere schedule to be filled up, but to be filled up according to the instructions of the statute; and if the registrar had received bills of sale in which these formalities had not been observed, he was either neglecting or misunderstanding his duty. The description and place of residence of the witness was not a form, but a statutory requisite. The bill of sale, therefore, being defective, was no evidence of title. The ship stood in the person of Barss; and when these arrestments were asked to be recalled at once, on the ground that the petitioners had acquired the ship from Barss, the first requisition was to give evidence of the transfer. The only evidence could be the statutory evidence, and that was altogether defective.—A correspondence was also produced, to shew that the averments of the sale being collusive were not made at random; and it was stated that a furthcoming, containing rescissory and declaratory conclusions, had been raised.

Of this date the case was advised.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a petition to recall arrestments of a ship as incompetent, and to free and disburden the ship thereof. In disposing of that petition I cannot proceed on any other rules than those which regulate this Scotch diligence, and which, in particular, are applicable to the necessary remedies for rendering that diligence effectual.

This ship, sailing from the Port of Halifax, is by the certificate of registry stated to be, in terms of the statute, the property of the petitioners. The certificate is issued by the proper party, the registrar of the port. It is complete in all its particulars, and is regular in point of form. It states the former owner and seller, the date of the bill of sale, with which the registrar had been satisfied. The certificate bears, which is its object, to certify that it is a complete copy of the register-book of transactions relating to ships registered under the Act of Parliament referred to. The petitioners are thus the registered owners of the ship, and so the certificate vouches and authenticates.

The respondents have asserted their ship as the property of other parties, said to be their debtors, and maintain the competency of such an arrestment.

In the ordinary case of moveables, to which there is no written or statutory title it is no objection to the competency of an arrestment that the arrestee says he has no funds of the common debtor, or that the same thing belongs to himself by virtue of preference, compensation, or otherwise. For, in the furthcoming, he can appear and assert and make good his right; and, if he is confident of his right to the money, may use it in the meantime.

But, when there is an actual written title to a subject, say rents of lands, vesting the right so long as it stands unchallenged in A B, and especially if that title is statutory title, no arrestment can competently be used, according to rules applicable to such diligence, in direct contradiction to that title. The competency of an arrestment will generally be found to be well tested by the competency of settling the matter of right, and making the arrestment effectual in a furthcoming. Now in the case of Loudon and Company v. Young, 21st May 1856, in which a party arrested for the debt of a husband the rents of land vested by a feudal title in the wife, it was found, without any hesitation, that, in a furthcoming, it was competent to challenge the title to the property, or to convert that action into reduction or declarator, and to establish that the property had been bought with the husband's money, or was a fraudulent transaction to protect his property against his creditors; and, hence, that the arrestments were wholly ineffectual.

Now the question here is,—is there a title to this vessel sufficient to protect it from arrestment de plano, on the averment that it is the property of other persons? The attempt to deny that effect—indeed any effect whatever—to the register of the vessel has been to me matter of the greatest astonishment. The vessel can have no other sailing title than that produced. It is a statutory title, and her only sailing title. The property is not disowned by the parties registered as having been made up without their consent or knowledge. They claim the vessel as the registered owners. In no other way can the ship be stated to be the property of any one. It has received this statutory stamp of ownership. Then is this title denied effect by the arrestment or not? The pleas of the party put that beyond doubt; for, in support of the arrestment, they propose to go back even on the bill of sale, and desire the Court to refuse effect to that,—1st, on account of alleged ex facie objections to the bill of sale, but chiefly that it was a false and fraudulent transaction; the ship, again, not being truly the property of the former registered owners, whose title is also to be challenged; or that, at all events, the sale was one in trust for the behoof of a body of creditors, and that the petitioners now fraudulently claim it as their private property; and, in order to sustain the arrestment, they ask for proof of their averments, the bare mention of which shews at once, to the satisfaction of my mind, that the arrestment was wholly incompetent, and that they must establish and make out a great deal indeed before the prima facie and only title to the ship is to be disregarded.

That the petitioners are registered as the owners of the vessel is not disputed. The certificate, indeed, is declared to be prima facie evidence of what is in the registry. Hence, having the registry in this way before us by the certificate, the question is a very simple one, is the registry not a good prima facie title in favour of the party registered by the officer on evidence complete to his mind as the owner?

The attempt to go back on the bill of sale, and then on the right and title of the seller, in defence of this arrestment, illustrates most emphatically to my mind that the arrestment used in disregard of the registry is incompetent, for we now see what must be made out in order to have the slightest appearance of a warrant to deny effect to the registry. I say to the registry, for the certificate is declared to be prima facie evidence of what is on the registry.

I give no opinion as to whether an action may be brought to cut down or to find the registry cannot receive effect; whether by challenging the transaction as a fraud by the seller as not the true owner, or because the petitioners hold in trust for creditors, or on any other ground—or whether an arrestment might at once proceed on such an action, or whether the title by the register would not equally exclude any such summary diligence. Such questions are not before us. I abstain the more, because there may be very nice questions, not only whether the allegations are competent in any shape, but also whether these questions can be tried and adjudicated upon in this country, or only in the Courts of Halifax. We have only to deal with an arrestment upon action raised against third parties, and on the assumption, in direct face of the registry, that the ship belongs to these parties, and can at once be attached as their property. I never saw a more flagrantly incompetent proceeding.

Something was suggested as to the respondents' finding caution, as the condition of sustaining the arrestment,—1, That can only be done if the arrestment is competent; and, 2, if competent, the party is entitled to have a judgment to that effect reversing the petition.

An attempt has been made to induce the Court to sustain the arrestment by the use of letters and papers; which, it is said, raise a suspicion or distrust of the honesty of the title on the face of the registry. There is nothing more hazardous a question than the competency of diligence or the effect of regular titles, than to allow the Court to entertain suspicions that there may be,—for it is only the suspicion of the mind—something wrong, what it is we cannot tell, at the bottom of the title. The Court would be in a strange position if we acted on such suspicions in sustaining the arrestments, and then, when the challenge is tried in a regular action, evidence, it was found that there was no ground whatever for the suspicion.

The Court would be in a strange position if we acted on such suspicions in sustaining the arrestments, and then, when the challenge is tried in a regular action, evidence, it was found that there was no ground whatever for the suspicion.

I give no opinion on that apparently anomalous furthcoming, because it is still a furthcoming, intended to render effectual the arrestments before us, and, if these are incompetent, we cannot refuse to recall because a furthcoming has been used. The other conclusions ex concessis of the theory of such an action must proceed and receive effect before the furthcoming can be effectual, and this exhibits strongly what is necessary to render the arrestment competent. If these arrestments shall be sustained, there is not a ship sailing under the British flag and under the British Registry Acts, which may not be at once attached as somehow the property of, or because it ought to be found to be the property of, some unknown parties, debtors to the users of the diligence,—notwithstanding the perfect regularity of the registry, exhibiting one party as owner in his own right.

I am not prepared to face that result.

LORD MURRAY.—This case is entirely a question of averment. The real question is, whether there is a good ground of arrestment? It does not appear to me that this arrestment is competent. No sufficient ground has been shewn for it. To say that this is a fraudulent conveyance is not enough. If it be fraudulent there are means of redress. But we must give effect to the petitioners' title till it is laid aside.

LORD COWAN.—The first of the arrestments sought to be recalled was executed ad fundandam jurisdictionem on 9th October 1856. Of same date, arrestment in security followed on proceedings instituted by the respondents, Mackay and Company of Liverpool, and Mandatory, directed against Greenwood and Company of Liverpool, and the individual partners of that firm, viz., Mr Greenwood of Liverpool, and Messrs Barss and Harris of Halifax, Nova Scotia.

The arrestment of the ship sets forth that these parties, or one or other of them, are the owners of the vessel; and the arrestment of the freight proceeds on the same assumption.

The arrestments used by the other respondents, which are of later date, are in similar terms.

The petitioners ask for recall of the arrestments on the ground that the vessel thereby attached is not the property of Greenwood and Company, or of any of the individual partners of that firm, but belongs exclusively to them; and their plea is that the arrestments used by the respondents are for that reason illegal, and ought to be recalled without caution.

The petitioners maintain not only that the respondents have failed to prove their allegation of ownership, but they refer to the certificate of registry, which bears that the original owner of the vessel, Simon F. Barss, had transferred to them the vessel by bill of sale, dated 14th August 1856, which was followed by an entry in the Registry at Halifax, dated 12th September 1856, 3½ P. M. No objection is taken to the correctness of the entry in the Registry or of the certificate produced, but the formality of the bill of sale has been objected to, on grounds to be afterwards noticed.

Supposing the objection to the bill of sale not fatal to the formality of the title, I am unable to discover any sufficient legal ground for refusing to it effect in the question; and if it is to receive effect, then these arrestments must, in my opinion, be held illegal, as an attachment of property not belonging to the debtors of the respondents.

A party who comes into Court asserting ownership in British shipping, and advancing claims on that footing, is bound to instruct his title as owner. The cases Walker v. Pollock, 5th March 1825, and other cases, establish that proposition. But where creditors seek to attach shipping property as belonging to their debtors, the same onus lies upon them. They must instruct the legal right and title under the Registry Acts to be in their debtor. And if, instead of satisfying this onus, the Registry, when produced, or a certified copy of it under section 107, shews that the legal title is in other parties, the attempted attachment of the vessel cannot be challengeable.

The allegation is, that the transfer to the petitioners was not in bona fide, but collusive and colourable only, and in fraud of the creditors of Greenwood and Company, or of Mr Barss, one of the partners; and hence it is maintained that the title relied on by the petitioners is to be disregarded. In some of the letters which reference is made in the summons, it is not disputed that an assignation transfer took place, but it is asserted that this transfer, though ex facie absolute, was for behoof generally of the creditors of the original owners. The proceedings taken by the respondents, however, are for their own individual behoof.

Duffus and
Lawson v.
Mackay and Others.

From the dates it will be observed that the completion of the sale to the petitioners by entry in the Registry took place on 12th September 1856, about a month before the first arrestment of the vessel. It is stated in the petition that she sailed from Richmond on 22d August, and arrived in Leith on 6th October. The bill of sale bears to be dated 14th August, and the entry in the Registry having been delayed until 12th September, must have been made when the vessel was on her voyage. The fact of the sale having been thereby completed, had, however, been communicated to the master; and so soon as the first arrestment ad fundandum was laid on, his agents in Leith intimated on same day—9th October—to the agent of the respondents, that the property of the vessel was in the petitioners; and that any farther proceedings with the view of attaching her as for the debt of Greenwood and Company, or of Mr Barss, would be objected to as illegal. This intimation would not in itself justify interference with the respondents' diligence. But there has since been transmitted the certificate of registry to which I have referred, with the relative deed of sale.

There may or may not be ground for the allegations of the respondents as to the fraudulent and collusive nature of the transfer to the petitioners. That question, as it appears to me, cannot be entertained in these proceedings. Effect must be given to the legal title of ownership ex facie in the petitioners—to whatever challenge their title may be exposed on competent grounds and in any Court of competent jurisdiction.

The entry of ownership in the Register, especially when supported by a bill of sale, is not to be got the better of in the summary manner proposed by the respondents. The 107th section of the recent statute may be held to support that view. But, irrespective of that special provision, I apprehend it to be the rule in all cases such as this, in which the property in shipping behoves to be instructed, to hold the Registry, until regularly impugned, good evidence of the title. Now, neither the bill of sale nor the Registry gives the slightest support to the allegations of the respondents. Ex facie, the transaction purports to be a completed transfer from the original owner Mr Barss to the petitioners, in consideration of the sum of £3000, whereof the receipt is acknowledged. I apprehend that to get behind the title, so as to bring back the vessel into the condition of being truly the property of their debtors, and attachable for their debts, the respondents must institute proceedings against the petitioners. It is out of the question, without proceedings of any kind directed against the holders of the legal title, to attach property for the debts of parties who were, prior to the date of such attachment, divested of it. The ex facie title must be reduced and set aside, or in some competent way rendered unavailable, before the rights of the party claiming under it can be interfered with in the manner attempted.

The respondents did not in their argument refer to any authority sanctioning the proceedings they have adopted. I am not aware of any case in which an attempt like this has been made to get beyond an ex facie regular title, without substantive or declaratory proceedings directed against the party vested with the property under that title. In a recent case, which occurred in the Second Division of the Court, this principle was given effect to, as has been explained by the Lord Justice-Clerk. The case is Loudoun and Company v. Young and others, 21st May 1855.

I do not express any opinion whether arrestments taken as in proceedings against the petitioners, would, or would not, be effectual. The question which would then arise for the decision of the Court would be in many important respects different from the present. No such proceedings have been instituted. This being so, I think it is clear that the arrestments are incapable of support; and that it would be a serious, and, as I think, a perilous precedent to entertain this diligence with the view of attaching the vessel pointed at by the respondents. There are, in truth, no termini in these proceedings.

The respondents have alleged that the bill of sale produced by the petitioners is a forgery, and ought not to be sustained as legal evidence of their title to the vessel. I do not wish to express any opinion on the alleged invalidity of the bill of sale. It seems to me sufficient for the decision of this case, that it has been framed by the public officers in Halifax, and been held sufficient evidence to justify the entry of the transfer in the Registry in favour of the petitioners. They must be taken hoc statu as in the right of ownership.

No special case has been made with regard to the arrestment of the freight. The vessel had sailed on her voyage from the United States before the completion of the transfer by entry in the Registry. But that took place before completion of the voyage. Till then—i. e. arrival of the vessel at Leith—the freight of that voyage was not earned, and it is that freight which has been arrested. Farther, it would seem that the only arrestment to found jurisdiction was of the vessel. At any rate no distinction has been taken. The arrestment of the freight must therefore follow that of the ship, and be recalled.

LORD IVORY.—I cannot say that I have a very clear opinion upon this case. I formerly thought that we should have a better statement of facts. But we have not got that; and therefore resuming consideration of the merits on the averments of parties such as they are, I have come to be of opinion that the arrestments should be recalled, in the first place, on the competency; in the second place, on the special circumstances in which the arresting parties are now before the Court. This vessel was originally registered in name of Barss, and the arrestments are laid on the ship as his property; but, at that date, a change had taken place in the registry, and the ship stood as the property of Duffus and Lawson. In that simple view of the matter, it is not necessary to ask whether the title of Duffus and Lawson be a good title of property. The entry in the registry is a requisite without which there could be no title of property; and the more important consideration appears to be this, that the party arresting the vessel as the property of Barss must be prepared to show that it is the property of Barss. Now, as against the registry no such conclusion can be incidentally or indirectly arrived at. It may be arrived at by cutting down the certificate of registry, which is prima facie evidence of right; but until it is made good that Barss is the owner of the vessel, arrestment of the vessel as against him seems to be incompetent. Much more am I disposed to hold this opinion; for, so far as the case has gone, no step has been taken to call the certificate in question. And that leads me to the second ground, that these arrestments are taken out so far back as 30th September 1856. The first arrestment 9th October 1856. We are now at the 13th February; and after the lapse of so many months, no proceeding has been taken to clear up and explicate the rights of the parties as arresting creditors. There ought to have been something done in that course of time. It is not proposed that these arrestments shall stand over indefinitely. There has been time at least to begin to challenge the right; and on that ground of expediency, in the exercise of the discretion of the Court, I am disposed to recall the arrestments. As to some matters, however, I am still puzzled. On 6th October, the change in the register had not been intimated to the captain or any one else. This voyage, therefore, was under Barss's registration; and before the bill of sale or registration was communicated to the arresting creditors, they have laid on their diligence with reference to the faith of the existing registry. It is not till the 7th November that the new certificate is communicated. It is very true, that in a letter of the agents of 9th October, it is stated that the shipmaster had heard something of the sort. But there is no evidence of that, nor anything which could have affected the movements of the ship. I am not prepared to say that this could affect the weight of this judgment. But it is awkward that the Court should be left so ill informed.

LORD CURRIEMILL.—The arrestments, in virtue of which the ship in question has been detained in the port of Leith since October last, at the instance of the respondents, merchants in Liverpool and Glasgow, were executed as the initial steps of legal diligence for securing payment of debts said to be owing to these parties either by a company called J. R. Greenwood and Company, merchants in Liverpool or by a company called Barss and Harris, in Halifax, Nova Scotia. The petitioners, who are not alleged to be liable for these debts, have applied to the Court to have the ship relieved from this diligence, in respect that she belongs exclusively to them; and, in support of this application, they have produced not only the existing certificate of registry, bearing that they have been the registered owners of her since the 12th day of September last, but also a bill of sale dated the 14 of August, on which that registry proceeded. The arresters resist this application, on allegations which, as stated in their printed answers, are not quite intelligible or consistent, but which, as explained at the oral debate, come, as I understand, to this, that the grantor of the bill of sale was a Mr Barss, one of the partners of the company above mentioned,—that the consideration for which it was granted was not the payment of a price, as is set forth in the document, but to satisfy or secure debts previously owing to the petitioners and others; and that Barss, and the companies of which he is a partner, stopped payment about that time. Duffus and Lawson v.

Mackay and
Others.

The question is, whether, in the face of the title which the petitioners have produced to the ship, the respondents are entitled to insist on her being still detained under diligence which authorises them to attach only the effects of their own debtors? It must be kept in view that the question now before us is this, and not whether the respondent, in a proper possessory action, would be entitled to an interdict. If they had instituted proceedings for rescinding the transfer from Barss to the petitioners, and for having the name of Barss restored to the registers, and had applied to this Court to interdict the petitioners from removing the vessel during the dependence of such an action, the case would have fallen under a different category; and it might have been in the discretion of the Court to regulate the interim possession or custody of the vessel on such conditions, or caution or otherways, as might have appeared to them to be proper in the exercise of a sound discretion.

But with reference to the only question now before us, I am of opinion that, at the dates of the arrestments in October last the ship was not attachable by arrestment or otherways, as being the property of Barss, or for payment of his debts; because, ex facie of the then existing register, he was not an owner of her or of any part of her. According to the provision of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, no party can be recognised by a Court of Law as being the owner of a British ship, unless he be entered as such in her register. But Barss' name did not appear on the ship's register, as it existed at the date of these arrestments, and as it still exists. This appears from the official certificate produced, which, by the 107th section of the statute, is legal evidence of the contents of the register. On the contrary, on the face of that register, the petitioners then stood, and still stand, as the only owners of the ship; and, as such, they, in terms of the 43d section of that statute, had "power absolutely to dispose of her, and to give effectual receipts for any money paid or advanced by way of consideration for her." I therefore think that the Court cannot competently, in this state of matters, sustain the diligence which has been commenced by the creditors of Barss for attaching this ship as being his property; and that the enquiry into which the respondents propose to enter in support of this diligence is inadmissible.

Even if they had alleged that the petitioners held the vessel under a latent trust for Barss, or either of the companies of which he is said to have been a partner, such an inquiry would be inadmissible in the face of the register. This would have been incompetent under the former Registry Acts, according to the cases of Macarthur's, 20th Jan. 1844, and Ord v. Barton, 3d July 1846. And it is at least equally incompetent under the provisions of the existing statute.

It may be observed, that in these two cases the question in legal effect was—Whether the ships were arrestable for the debts of companies for whose behoof they were said to have been held by the individuals whose names were on the register? because the claimants were the trustees under sequestrations of the estates of those companies, and these sequestrations were by the Bankrupt Act to be equivalent to completed arrestments? If, in virtue merely of these statutory arrestments, the trustees, or arresters, had caused the ships to be dismantled and detained, application by the registered owners to have the ships released from such attachments could not have been successfully resisted on the allegations of the trustees that the vessels belonged to other than the registered owners, since such allegations were held to be inadmissible in the face of the register in ordinary judicial procedure. I think, therefore, that the prayer of this petition must have been granted, even if the petitioners had produced nothing more than the certificate of registry. But they have produced that title by producing also the bill of sale in their favour. The contents of that document is not disputed. No objection is stated to it, except that the subscribing witness is not designed in the manner directed in the schedule annexed to the Merchant Shipping Act. But in the present discussion, at all events, I do not think that effect could be given to that objection, even if the question turned, not upon the register, but upon the validity of the bill of sale, in respect that the 55th section of the statute, although it requires a bill of sale to be attested by one or more witnesses, does not expressly enact that the designation of these witnesses must be inserted,—that although the bill of sale is directed to be according to the form of a schedule in the appendix, or as near thereto as circumstances permit, and in that schedule there is a direction to insert the description and place of residence of the attesting witness or witnesses, there is no enactment that the omission of that direction shall nullify the bill of sale,—that, on the contrary, by the 96th section, the Commissioners of Customs are authorised to supply forms of bills of sale, with such alterations thereon as they, with consent of the Board of Trade, might think proper to make,—that the bill of sale in question, which consists of one of the schedules so issued by the Commissioners of Customs, differs in several particulars from the schedule in the appendix to the Act, and inter alia in not containing the direction above mentioned as to the insertion of the description and place of residence of the subscribing witness or witnesses,—that, accordingly, the Registrar himself held the bill of sale as it stands to satisfy the requirements of the statute, inasmuch as he not only entered the names of the vendees in the register as the owners of the vessel, but made the statutory indorsement on the bill of sale itself,—and that he did so, although, in terms of the 11th section of the Merchants Shipping Act Amendment Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 91), he could not have been required to do these things without the express directions of the Commissioners of Customs, if the transfer had been in any form other than that prescribed and approved by, or in pursuance of, the Merchants Shipping Act 1854.

Even if the inquiry offered by the respondents had not been incompetent in this application, I would not have been prepared to sustain the relevancy of their allegations. These allegations, as stated in their printed answers, are vague, unintelligible, and inconsistent; and their import, even as stated by them at the oral debate, was not that the ship had not been truly transferred to the petitioners, nor even that the consideration for which she was transferred had not been onerous, but only that the transfer, instead of having been an absolute sale to the petitioners, for a price paid down at the time, was granted in satisfaction or security for prior debts owing by the vendor to themselves or others of his creditors. And even assuming the truth of that statement, and that, moreover, Barss and the companies of which he is said to have been a partner stopped payment about the time when the bill of sale was granted, yet, as neither he nor these companies are alleged to have been rendered bankrupt, would these allegations be sufficient, according to the law of Nova Scotia, to have entitled the respondents to have that bill of sale declared to be a nullity, and Barss's name restored to the register, so as to entitle them, by separate diligence at their own instance, to acquire a preference over the other creditors? This was not alleged by the respondents, either in their answers to the petition or at the oral debate. And as the decision of such a question would depend on the law of the colony, I think that, in the absence of such an allegation, the grounds upon which the respondents oppose the recall of their attachment of this vessel by legal diligence are irrelevant as well as incompetent.

LORD DEAS.—The ship here in question arrived at Leith on 6th October 1856. She was then sailing under a certificate of registry which bore that she was the property of Simon Fitch Barss, a debtor of the respondents. She had no papers except this certificate of registry. In this state of matters, the respondents, availing themselves of their legal rights as creditors of Barss, used arrestments of the ship and freight, for the double purpose of founding jurisdiction against their debtor, who was out of the kingdom, and of attaching the vessel in security and for payment of their debt, for which they afterwards obtained decree. Their actions and arrestments were also adapted to cover the case of Barss holding the ship as trustee for the company of which he was a partner. But that makes no difference here,—the simpler view being to take the case as if the actions and arrestments had been against Barss alone. The agent for the respondents Duffus and Lawson intimated an objection to these arrestments on 9th October, on the ground that the master “has received notice from Barss and Harris of Halifax that the vessel now stands registered there in name of John Duffus and William Law son, their assignees." At this time there was obviously no evidence of the alleged transfer in this country. Neither the master nor the agent had seen it, and consequently it is misdescribed in this letter as flowing from Barss and Harris, whereas it was granted by Barss alone. Accordingly, in his letter of 11th October 1856, the agent for Duffus and Lawson writes, "The vessel having been transferred and registered after she left Halifax, we cannot show you any indorsement on the certificate of registry." About a month after the first arrestments had been used, the master seems for the first time to have obtained possession of the certificate of transfer from Barss to Duffus and Lawson, and thereupon this petition was presented for recall of the arrestments. The respondents resist that recall (unless caution shall be found) on the twofold ground—1st, that the bill of sale is ex facie defective and disconform to the statute; and 2d, that it is collusive and fraudulent.

Now, if we were here in an action of forthcoming, or in an action of sale, the question would arise, Whether and to what effect the grounds of objection to the transfer could be competently investigated and decided in such an action? But that is not the position in which we are now placed. The question at present is, Whether, by the instant and unconditional recall of these arrestments, the arresting creditors are to be deprived of all opportunity of establishing, in such form of action as may be requisite, that the ship, which, but for this transfer, unquestionably was and would still be the property of their debtor, truly is and has all along been his property; and that this freight, which, for anything I see, never was in any way assigned over by him, is still also his property? For this purpose, the respondents have stated they intend forthwith to adopt all necessary proceedings, and have already raised an action of reduction and declarator, to negative and set aside the transfer. Now, however clear it may come to be, by the result of these proceedings, that the ship and freight remain, as before, the property of Barss (whether for himself or his partnership), any judgment to that effect will be of no avail, if in the meantime the arrestments are unconditionally recalled, the freight uplifted, and the ship carried (as of course it will be) out of the jurisdiction of this Court. Arresting of new, as the property of Duffus and Lawson, even if there should be opportunity for doing so, will not prevent this injustice,—for, if the ship and freight be not the property of Duffus and Lawson, such arrestments will be inept. The only safe course seems to me to be to allow the existing arrestments to stand; and although other arrestments should be used, upon the footing that the ship and freight belong to Duffus and Lawson (to meet the event of this being so found), there would be no incompetency in that course, which was the course followed in Connon v. Ballinten, 14th Nov. 1848, where both sets of arrestments were allowed to stand—the one set being used upon the footing that the ship still belonged to the bankrupt, who, prior to sequestration, had conveyed it by a transfer said to be collusive and fraudulent; and the other upon the footing that the ship belonged to the vendee, who there, as here, had obtained himself entered in the registry as the owner.

If the arrestments are allowed to stand, justice may ultimately be done. The parties using them are responsible for the consequences, if they have used them mimiously and illegally. If your Lordships think these parties ought to find caution, I have no objections to their being called upon to do so. Those of them who are within the jurisdiction could have very little motive for declining to do so, for their responsibility will be the same either way. But, although that question was put expressly to Duffus and Lawson, it has never yet been put to the respondents. They have not even had an opportunity of making and meeting averments in the ordinary form of condescendence and answers. The material allegations of fact, and the pleas in law, rest equally upon verbal statement at the bar. And in this state of the case, it is proposed to sweep away, at once and unconditionally, the whole arrestments, including even those used to found jurisdiction against the debtors, who have not been made parties to this application,—the consequence of all which will be, that, if this transfer be actually fraudulent and collusive, justice never can be done, at least by this Court.

I cannot concur in that course. If indeed it could be shewn that the existence of this transfer, and its entry in the registry, rendered the arrestments incompetent, there would be a great deal to be said. But I am not prepared to hold that every debtors, by a transfer of this sort, at once to render the diligence of arrestment by his creditors incompetent, although the transfer may be a mere juggle, and the ship all the time truly remains his property. I think the creditors here, who found the ship sailing in this country as the property of their debtor, who had been the registered owner of her for years, were entitled to arrest her as such; and that when a transfer, granted as this was, is produced against them, they are entitled to reasonable time and opportunity for setting it aside; the effect of which would be (if they proved successful), to sweep that transfer away as if it had never existed. If there shall be undue delay in following out proceedings for this purpose, the Court may recall the arrestments on the ground of mora;—but that is not a ground which as yet enters, or is alleged to enter into this case. A creditor may have a material interest that his diligence shall stand as of a particular date. He is not bound, in all circumstances, to sweep away every colourable and collusive title before resorting to that diligence. He may point the moveables of his debtor in the possession of a third party, although possession usually presumes property; and he may arrest the moveable property of his debtor, although the debtor has given a collusive and fraudulent written title to it to a third party. No doubt, if your Lordships think that there are no grounds even prima facie for suspecting the bona fides of the vendee's title, you may, in the exercise of your discretion, recall the diligence so long as that title shall not be set aside. But the diligence is not necessarily incompetent. And, if we are to go upon the circumstances, we ought to see what the circumstances are. Here, even as the case stands, they are prima facie not favourable to the supposition of a bona fide transfer of the ship. The bill of sale is dated on the very day that the granter of it, and the company of which he was a partner, stopped payment. It bears to be absolute, and for a price paid of L.3000. One of the partners says, he understood it to be for the benefit of all the creditors. Barss and Harris say, on the other hand, it was a purchase long ago made from them, and that, if the Scotch law favours the attachments, the purchasers will fall back upon their estate for the price, and cause them a loss of L.5000. One of the alleged purchasers is the father-in-law of Harris, the partner of Barss the seller. And, in short, there is no reason to think that the respondents are in mala fide in maintaining that the transfer is something different from what it ex facie purports to be, or that Duffus and Lawson are in bona fide in alleging that the ship has become theirs by a fair and absolute purchase. There is thus no ground for holding this to be an abuse of the diligence of arrestment, any more than for holding the diligence to be incompetent; and, in this state of matters, even apart from any technical objection to the bill of sale, I should not be for interfering without caution with parties using their legal rights by resorting to the ordinary diligence of the law, which is all that has been done here. The objection to the bill of sale, however, appears to me to be prima facie well founded,—the bill of sale being disconform to the statute,—and this, of course, strengthens my objection to the unconditional recall of the arrestments against the ship.

As regards the freight, which is not alluded to in the bill of sale, I do not see even an allegation that it belongs to the petitioners. The vessel had sailed, and consequently the contract of affreightment had been entered into before she left the foreign port; and the petitioner's statement (in their agent's letter of 11th October) is that the vessel had been transferred while at sea, whether before or after the contract of affreightment was made, is nowhere stated. There is no explanation whatever of the grounds on which the freight is said to belong to the petitioners, and no averment even that it does so.

I have only to add, that I am not satisfied that this application should in any view have been disposed of without making up a record, and without bringing into the field the respondent's debtors, before proceeding on the footing that the ship and freight, which have been attached as their property, are truly the property of other parties. If it were clear that these parties ought to be in the field, I have no doubt it would be pars judicis to order them to be called, as was held by the House of Lords in Bell v. Willison (1 Shaw's Ap. p. 220), and by this Court in Bennet and M'Farlane v. Burgess, &c., 27th May 1828. But I do not say it is clearly necessary to call these parties, and I do not rest my opinion upon this ground, but upon the other and more substantial grounds already stated.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I retain the opinion I formerly entertained. These arrestments should be recalled. The case of a ship is a peculiar one. It is peculiar as affects the nature of the property itself, and peculiar also as regards the nature of the title to that property. It is peculiar as to the manner in which the arrestments once laid on are to be followed up. Therefore, it is a case in which we are not to be led into the ordinary course of in dubio requiring caution. We must see our way more clearly in regard to the arrestment of a ship than in the ordinary case of arrestment, and parties residing in the colonies, at a distance from caution, are more especially entitled to every consideration in a question of arrestment.

Now this ship appears, in the title produced to us, to be not the property of Greenwood and Company, or any partner of them, but of Duffus and Lawson. Upon the face of that title I see no clear nullity, nothing which shews an attempt to transfer the vessel improperly and ineffectually from the original owners to these persons now in possession. On the contrary, the certificate of registry and bill of sale are ex facie good; and that being so, I cannot listen to these vague allegations of a collusive transaction, whereby it is said there is something improper in the apparent transfer to these parties. If we were to enter into an inquiry as to the nature of the right in this ship, and to have proof of the facts adduced from Halifax, and then to inquire as to the law of that country, and its effect upon this transaction, we would in effect expose these petitioners to all the evils which could arise from this vessel being detained till an ordinary action should dispose of this question. There is nothing in their title to lead me to hold that this vessel did belong to a debtor of the arresters at the date of the arrestments, but to another party, and I am for granting that party his demand to have the arrestment recalled. Nothing was said to us about the freight, and therefore I do not farther allude to it.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords of the First Division of the Court having, along with three Judges of the other Division of the Court, heard the counsel for the parties, their Lordships of the First Division, after consulting with the other Division of the Court, and according to the opinion of the majority of the Judges present at the hearing, recall the arrestments mentioned in the petition, free and disburden the ship and freight mentioned in the petition of the said arrestments: Appoint the arresters, at least Canard, Brett, and Austen and mandatory, mentioned in the petition, to restore the rudder and apparelling of the said vessel, and authorise the master, Elisha Card, mentioned in the petition, to resume the direction, possession, and control thereof, as if no such arrestment had been used, and decern: Find the arresters liable to the petitioners in the expenses of process," &c.

ROBERT KENNEDY, Defender.—D. F. Inglis—Gifford.

Lease—Rei interventus—Proof.—A tenant sublet part of his farm, and made in his note-book a jotting, which was signed both by himself and the sub-tenant. Possession followed in terms of that jotting. Held (abs. Lord Wood), that the tenant, who averred that the jotting produced in an action against him for the rent, was not the one he signed, but was false and fabricated, must undertake an imputation of it; and having done so, held, on the evidence, that he had failed to prove his averment.

Writ—Pencil writing.—Question, Whether pencil writing is entitled to be viewed as favourably as writing in ink?

THE WILLIAMSONS, a father and son, brought, in the Sheriff-court of Dumfriesshire, an action against Robert Kennedy for L.40, "being the debt owing for the pasturage of a portion of the farm of Clockclowie."

The pursuers had been tenants of this farm, which consisted principally of moorland, but they had taken a farm in Ireland, and had already removed part of their stock thither, when the junior pursuer let to the defender, they

A memorandum of the agreement was at the time made by the junior pursuer in his note-book, and was subscribed by him and by the defender. As produced in process, it was in these terms:—"Kirkconnal, 1853.—I have let to Mr Robert Kennedy the whole of the south side of Clockclowie, except the meadow, from 1st April till Whitsunday 1853, for L.40 sterling. (Signed) R. WILLIAMSON. ROBERT KENNEDY." The defender had entered into possession with a stock of sheep, which he finally removed without paying any rent, and hence the present action.

The defence was, that the writing did not truly represent the bargain made; and, with the exception of the date and place, and the defender's signature, was false and fabricated; the rest of the original writing having been rubbed out and obliterated, and the present fabricated and substituted in its place. The whole lands, and not merely the south side, were said to have been let to the defender, and been represented as capable of feeding forty scores of sheep; but, when he had sent shepherds with thirty-four score, they were only allowed to occupy the south side, which was not worth more than about L.15, and would not feed above eighteen score. The defender had, accordingly, been obliged to take other pasture for his sheep.

A proof having been allowed pro ut de jure, the junior pursuer and the defender were examined, and respectively deponed in terms of their allegations. Parties, too, who had been present at the making of the bargain, deponed that what was let was "the grass of Clockclowie," without any specification of north or south, and that it had been represented as carrying forty score. This was admitted and alleged to be the fact by Williamson. Shepherds were also adduced to prove that, when Kennedy's sheep were put on the land, Williamson's servants told them they must confine them to the south side. This was accordingly done, and Kennedy gave as the reason for his not having complained, that Williamson was from home, having gone to Ireland.

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:—"6th June 1854.—Finds that the memorandum written on the book No. 2, being written in pencil, and challenged as vitiated, cannot bear faith in judgment: Finds that the agreement betwixt the parties as to the set of the pasture was a verbal agreement, not reduced to writing, and therefore proveable by witnesses: Finds that, in terms of said verbal agreement, the pursuer let to the defender the whole pasture on the farm of Clockclowie for the sum of L.40, but that he gave possession to the defender only of the south side of said farm: Finds that said defender is liable to the pursuer in payment of such part only of the said sum of L.40 as effeirs to the value of that portion of the farm of which he obtained possession," &c.*

On appeal, the Sheriff-depute (M. Napier) altered this interlocutor, find-

* The note upon the first point was as follows:—"It is apprehended that a pencil memorandum, such as that produced in No. 2, can in no sense be looked upon as a writing binding on the parties whose names it bears. An agreement written in ink, if written on erasures, is null; an agreement written in pencil, the marks of which may be so easily effaced, and different writing substituted, may be considered as wholly erased and altered. In an ink writing, the erasure is necessarily visible to the eye; in a pencil writing, it is in general impossible to detect the erasure; and it is equally possible that such a writing may be either vitiated or not vitiated. The Sheriff-substitute is not aware of any authorities on the point; but he apprehends, that before an agreement can be held to be reduced to writing, so as to exclude parole testimony, it must be a bona fide writing in ink, and not a mere jotting or memorandum in pencil. Such a jotting may be good quantum valeat, as an adminicle of evidence; but to hold that it is such a writing as wholly excludes all other evidence, would in most cases leave the rights and interests of parties to rest upon a very mutable and fragile basis."

ing that the document could bear no faith till it was stamped, which it was not, and therefore he allowed it to be stamped.* And of a subsequent date, after the document had been stamped, and farther procedure had taken place before the Sheriff-substitute, the Sheriff pronounced this interlocutor:—"20th July 1855.—In respect that the defender alleges the writing produced and founded on is not the writing so written out and subscribed, but is, (with the exception of the place and date written on the first line thereof, and the defender's signature bearing to be subscribed thereto), a false and fabricated writing: Recalls the interlocutor appealed against, and, before farther proceeding in the cause, ordains the record to be opened up, and allows the defender to propone improbation." †

The defender thereupon proponed improbation, and lodged a condescendence in the following terms:—"The paper, parchment, vellum, or other material on which the document, No. 2 of process, founded on by the pursuers, is written, had been written on, from the date down to the signature of the defender, before the writing now appearing on it was written. And the writing which had been so written on it previously had been rubbed out, obliterated, or effaced."

A proof of this condescendence having been allowed, the defender adduced two doctors, the Sheriff-clerk-depute, and a watchmaker, who deponed generally that the fibre was disturbed, except where the dates and signatures were written; but one of them expressed a decided opinion that there was no disturbance of the fibre where the word "south" was written.

The pursuer produced three doctors, two watchmakers, and an engraver, who admitted the roughness of the page, which seemed to them caused by much fingering; but deponed that, with the aid of the microscope, they could discern no trace of former writing.

The Sheriff-substitute held that the evidence was sufficient to improbate

* "NOTE.—The agreement to set, produced by the pursuer, cannot be judicially regarded until it be stamped. The Sheriff is not aware of any such law in Scotland, as that the fact of a writing being in pencil instead of ink rendered the same vitiated, and null and void. Whether it suffices, in any given case, to prove the will and intention of the writer is another question depending on the circumstances. Pencil may be a fragile and unsatisfactory material; but it is not an incompetent material. In England the point has been expressly decided. Chief-Justice Abbot, in Gear v. Physic, 1826, said—'There is no authority for saying, that where the law requires a contract to be in writing, that writing must be in ink.' Judge Bayley said—'I think that a writing in pencil is a writing within the meaning of that term at common law; and that it is a writing within the custom of merchants. I cannot see any reason why, when the law requires a contract to be in writing, that contract shall be void, if it be written in pencil.' Another Judge concurred: 'There are several other cases to the same effect.'—See Ross's Leading Cases in Commercial Law."

† "NOTE.—The missive in question contains, or does not contain, the terms of the bargain into which the parties entered as to the set of the Clocklowie pasture; not according to whether it be written with pencil or in ink (a material, by the way, which is susceptible of being as completely erased by a forger as is pencil writing), but according to whether the fraud and forgery averred by the defender was really committed. The interlocutor now recalled would give the defender the full benefit of that averment, without any explicit finding or decision that his plea of forgery (and a very strong one it is) has been completely established by proof. The Sheriff cannot deal with so serious and consequential an averment in the shape now presented to him. The defender, unless he chooses to withdraw his averment of forgery, must propone improbation in proper form. Accordingly the Sheriff has opened the record, and remitted the case to be dealt with on that footing, exclusive altogether of the proposition stated in the Sheriff-substitute's note to his former interlocutor, of date 6th June 1854—'That, before an agreement can be held to be reduced to writing, so as to exclude parole testimony, it must be a bona fide writing in ink.'" the writing, but on a reclaiming note the Sheriff-depute altered that judgment. *

The defender brought the case by note of advocacy before the Second Division of the Court, maintaining.—The onus lay on the pursuers to prove their case. Had they done so? The document produced was not sufficient to do so. It was not probative, nor was it even holograph of the party against whom it was proposed to be used. It was altogether worthless, but for the defender's admission of his signature, and that must be taken with the qualification attached to that admission, viz., that he never signed the writing now prefixed to it. Moreover, pencil writing was in a less favourable position than ink—rubbing of pencil was equivalent to erasure in ink. There could be no doubt but there had been rubbing here:

The pursuers replied;—The onus of cutting down the writing lay on the defender. There was no foundation for a distinction between a writing in pencil and one in ink, and till this memorandum was set aside, the position of matters was this:—Rei interventus had followed on a written contract acquiesced in during the whole period during which it was operative, and no objection stated till the defender was called upon to fulfil his part of the contract by paying rent. The kind of evidence necessary to set aside the writing was such as would be required to convict of forgery. Unless the defender could bring his case up to this, he must fail. His evidence did not even approach to such a case.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur entirely in the view taken by the Sheriff of this case. It is admitted, and is not matter of dispute, that the agreement for the sub-lease was written in the pocket-book of the pursuer, and signed by both parties, and therefore I dismiss from consideration the question of the value or authority of an agreement written in pencil alone.
